Lafayette and Louis Philippe,

OR,

HISTORY OF THE EVENTS AND THE MEN OF JULY, 1830.

BY B. SARRANS, JUN.

AIDE-DE-CAMP TO LAFAYETTE UNTIL THE 26TH OF DECEMBER, 1830.

Preface to the first American edition.

The following work by M. Sarrans constitutes a portion only of the two octavo volumes which have just appeared in Paris and London. The original is divided into three parts; the first is a biography of Lafayette previous to the date of the late French Revolution, and is a compilation from the Histoire of America by Dr. Ramsay, Marshall's Life of Washington, &c. This portion we have omitted, its contents being a repetition of what must be familiar to every reader. The second part "Lafayette and Louis Philippe during the Revolution of 1830," we have inserted as the most valuable, containing an accurate history of the events it records, with many new details not before made public.

The third division relates the politics of France, and the struggles of the peaceful war parties since the revolution which hurled Charles X. from the throne, and includes an account of the cases which led to the resignation of the Lafayette ministry. It makes frequent and honourable mention of Lafayette, whom the second portion of the work, now published, follows to the period of his resigning the command of the National Guards. His conduct in that important post is made to appear strictly in accordance with his well known principles. The subsequent events related, the work, in which he has not been so prominently gaged, form a distinct period in history, and will be appropriately be the ground work for a future volume, when their result is known—shall we say after the next revolution?

The honourable name of Lafayette is intimately interwoven with the history of the United States, whose citizens will rejoice at every event which raises him in the estimation of the world at large. They now have to thank M. Sarrans for his successful efforts to exhibit the hero of three revolutions in his colours.

INTRODUCTION.

I am going to speak of the great men and affairs that we are living amongst, as they were already far remote from our own time.

I shall represent the events such they have appeared to me, the men such as I have seen them. I shall say nothing but the truth, but I shall speak it without reserve.

However, the nature of the fact which I am about to exhibit, requires that I should early state the sources from which my information has been drawn.

I entreat, then, that on reading the title of my book, its veracity may not hastily be doubted, nor the project of it attributed to those to whom it does not belong.

The fact is, and I confess it at once, that I am guilty of an indiscretion, perhaps will be said, of a breach of confidence. And yet I find my conscience glories in it, as an act worthy of a citizen.

The fact is, that it is chiefly made up of unpublished letters, thoughts privately expressed, made with closed doors; and those letters, those thoughts, these reports, will frequently be found to attain to the two men into whose hands the July Revolution first of all cast the destinies of France. When, can it have been, that documentary matter, of such great importance, should have found its way to me, a humble journalist! A few words respecting my individual position before and after the July revolution, will, I hope, be sufficient to explain this origination.

Honoured, from my youth, with the invaluable friendship of M. de Lafayette, I had long gathered from his lips, or borrowed from his written recollections, notes relative to the most important occurrences and most characteristic features of his long and noble career.

My object was to supply, in some degree, the immense void which the absence of his memoirs will perhaps leave in the annals of our country. For neither the case of his own fame, nor the interests of history, nor the pressing solicitations of his friends, have hitherto induced him to undertake that important task. The clearing up of some points in his political life, which had been either unknown, or known but imperfectly; the rectifying of a few historical errors; were all that our urgent entreaties could ever procure from his active, matter-of-fact, but self-neglecting patriotism.

The notes which I have mentioned were lying unarranged in my portfolio, when the explosion of July placed Lafayette, for the second time, at the head of a great revolution.

That wonderful event increased the frequency and intimacy of the intercourse which the general's kindness had allowed to be established between himself and me; and, to crown all the other marks of his good will, he did me the honour to appoint me his aide-de-camp. The friend and aide-de-camp of Lafayette, from the days of the Hotel-de-Ville down to that of his resignation, it will easily be conceived how much I must have seen and learned. What I saw, and what I learned—such are the materials of my book.

This favour, however, imposed upon me only incidental duties; my vocation as a writer was not altered; my personal views remained the same; and the desire of sketching the character of the great citizen whom I had before my eyes, naturally increased with the new facilities which I found in being thus temporarily placed about his person.

Besides, I perceived that the events which were about to unfold themselves, would become the salient point, the essence of my work. Half a century, and two revolutions, were about, as I then believed, to be summed up in a few weeks; monarchical legitimacy and the sovereignty of the people, slavery and liberty, were once more to be opposed to each other; salutary lessons might be struck out of that conflict; I was a writer by profession; those lessons were to my purpose; I seized them on behalf of my country.

I enriched myself, then, with all the documents the existence of which my incidental functions revealed to me; I loaded my tablets and my memory with all the materials for history which a continual contact with the persons highest in power brought under my observation.

My communications, as the reader of my book will be convinced, extended beyond the circle of the staff of the national guard. Other persons of distinction honoured me with their confidence. Thus, for example, it is to a well known friend of the imperial family that I owe the possession of the correspondence between Prince Joseph and General Lafayette; to an accidental communication, that of three letters from the general to Louis Philippe; and to different members of the cabinet of the 3d of November, the discovery of some private scenes of deep interest.

Thence, and thence only, the knowledge of political transactions which I now communicate to my fellow citizens; looking forward to other periods of leisure, to enable me to offer to their indulgence more lengthened and deeper investigations.

Have I, in all this, abused the confidence of M. de Lafayette, or of any other person? I feel no apprehension of having done so: my book divulges nothing that has been confided to me; I say only what I have seen, read, and heard; neither more nor less.

Can I have been so unfortunate as to displease the general himself by my plain speaking? No, assuredly; for, whose principle it has been, all his life, to think aloud, and to have no secrets with the people, can be offended only at a falsehood—and I say nothing but the truth.

If, however, contrary to all expectation, these volumes were to give the slightest uneasiness to the man in all France whom I venerate the most, my sorrow would be extreme; yet I should find some consolation in the very consciousness of the sacrifice I should have made to the fulfilment of a duty; for there are duties to which every thing, even the friendship of a great man, ought to be sacrificed.

Furthermore, General Lafayette and some other exalted personages will, perhaps, blame my indiscretion; but their strict honour is my security that they will not contradict any one of the facts concerning them in this work.

One word more. In rapidly traversing the great revolutions which have changed the face of the modern world, in looking back to those stormy and difficult times which accomplished the regeneration of one hemisphere and prepared that of the other, Lafayette has appeared to me as the most exalted and purest personification of the principle of order and liberty. In America as in Europe, in all times, in all places, I have found him erect and respected, wherever liberty has had need of assistance, weakness of support, justice of defence, the laws of devotedness and firmness, and wherever the people have sought to repossess themselves of their primitive sovereignty.

CHAPTER I.

Lafayette at La Grange—Glance at the politics of the restoration—Progress of the counter-revolution—Villèle ministry—Fouquier ministry—Ministry of the 8th of August—Situation of France at the moment of the publication of the ordinances of the 25th of July.

Since 1800, the period of his return to France, Lafayette had passed the greater part of his time on his estate of La Grange, the inheritance of his mother-in-law the Duchess d'Ayen, immolated on the scaffold of the Reign of Terror. The decree which ordained the restitution of the property of condemned persons, had restored to him that wreck of a large patrimony, of which the revolutionary whirlpool had swallowed up all that he had not himself sacrificed to the interests of liberty, which he was always determined to serve with his fortune as well as his life. There, in the bosom of his numerous family, happy in the happiness which his paternal care diffused upon all around him, surrounded with friends, and rich in the blessings of the poor, Lafayette indulged his ruling taste for agriculture, as much a stranger to the Tuileries of the Restoration as he had been to those of the Empire.*

I shall not attempt to describe that ancient residence of La Grange, open to all the unhappy, and at the door of which misfortune never knocked in vain. So many patriots, philanthropists, friends of humanity, of all opinions and all countries, have, like myself, been seated at M. de Lafayette's fireside, that the simplicity, the open-hearted hospitality, the continual but always silent acts of beneficence, the progress of agricultural industry and domestic economy, enjoyed so deliciously in that happy abode, are known to every one: the patriarchal hospitality of La Grange has become proverbial.

I come now to that sudden convulsion of the frame of society, in which we shall see the man of the two worlds showing himself, as he had ever done, no less zealous in defence of order, than ardent in promoting the liberty of his country. But before we follow him in the new career which is opening before him, let us cast a rapid glance upon those events so unforeseen and so momentous as to be beyond all ordinary rules of comparison.

Never had more humiliation and insults inflamed the anger of a people and expanded the feeling of liberty in their breasts. Neither memory nor imagination depicts to me any thing more dishonouring, and at the same time absurd, than the fifteen years' reign of those Bourbons whom France had covered with her mercy, and

* Charles X. used often to say, "There are but two men in the revolution, Lafayette and myself, that have remained unshaken in their principles." And, indeed, the revolution of July has afforded a fresh proof of the tenacity of the principles of those two contemporaries. The last words, too, which the fallen king addressed to the captain of the vessel which carried him to England, were, "It is that old republica Lafayette that has done all this." It is, in truth, a characteristic of that incorruptible party, to see nothing but the names of individuals in movements of the popular masses.

beheld once more, without hatred as without love, seated on one of the greatest thrones upon earth. And if it was the first time in the world that, after fifteen years of patience, a nation of thirty-two millions of men, distributed over an extensive territory, diversified in their manners, their desires, their faults, their virtues, and above all in the degrees of a very unequal civilisation, have found themselves united in one unanimous feeling of reprobation, it is but just to say, that never, either, was there seen a sovereign family more solicitous to insult the public reason, and to disclose in itself a nation foreign to the age of its existence. How many old prejudices were revived, how many plots meditated, how many iniquities committed, in that space of fifteen years! So much turpitude and vanity seems really almost super-human. Let us revert to the period of the first restoration of the Bourbons: what an admirable opening was there for a peaceful and reparative reign!

France, such as Louis XVIII. found it on his return, was no longer that nation, excited by triumph and revolutionary movement, which the year 1793 had left suspended between the sovereignty of the people, which had not yet come into existence, and the monarchical despotism, which existed no longer. The spirit of democratic turbulence had been exhausted by its own violence, republican radicalism had been modified in the rapid movements of popular opinion; and the only feelings that had survived entire the weakness of the Directory, the deceptions of the Consulate, and the glories of the Empire, were, the purified love of the revolution of 1789, the hatred of the excesses of 1793, and a general reprobation of the brilliant yoke of Bonaparte. That fortunate soldier found power at issue with anarchy; and his despotism, might, to a certain point, rest itself upon the necessity of terminating that sanguinary struggle. The Restoration had, on the contrary, found liberty at issue with despotism, and all understandings, all interests, at work to return to the principles of 1789, and take their stand upon the constitution of 1791. God forbid that I should seek to reconcile mischievous concessions with any duty as a patriotic writer! Napoleon betrayed the sacred cause of liberty; that is a demonstrated fact. However, it is but just to make allowance for the circumstances, and to say that there were at least these pretexts for his usurpation of the popular sovereignty; there was anarchy to be stifled, order to be restored; there were fears to be set at rest, parties arrayed against each other, and all the elements of civil war, about to be crowded, perhaps, by the ravages of foreign invasion. But in the case of the Bourbons, humbled, the ambition of a few disappointed, were all the obstacles which they had to overcome; while on the other side were the whole moral strength of France, the stream of opinion, and the universal longing for tranquillity after twenty-five years of agitation. What was necessary to be done, in order to adapt liberty to that admirable disposition of the public mind? Nothing more than to espouse sincerely the generous principles of a revolution from which the people had hitherto experienced yet more violence than benefit. But, on the contrary, what was done? No sooner were they seated on a throne secretly yet dry from the blood of Louis XVI., than the family of that prince began to produce factions and public calamities: all the old prejudices, all the interests founded in error, rose up again in all their insolent pretensions; a barefaced progress was commenced towards all the iniquities of the past age; such was the object of all the arts, such the spirit of all the speeches and writings, that marked the brief existence of the first Restoration.

The nature of things brought about the result which plain good sense had clearly foreseen. A skill appeared upon the coasts of Provence; and that throne with its roots of eight centuries, surrounded by a people and an army, crumbled away before a single man, favoured by military glory, but no longer called for by the national assent. I shall not speak of the hundred days' reign. Liberty, a second time disowned by Bonaparte, would no longer range herself under his dictatorship: the nation retired from him; and one day, one unsuccessful conflict, effected against that great captain what three years of reverse and the loss of twenty battles had secretly been able to do, so long as the nation had lent him any support. This perished the fortune of Bonaparte, as will ever perish in France the work of selfishness and ambition.

We come now to a new order of occurrences, of which it is necessary to glance at the most prominent, in order to the understanding of the crisis, which has determined our emancipation. I shall not dwell upon those first years of sanguinary reaction and terrorism, during which the purest blood of France flowed upon the scaffold. It is but too well known with how many wounds and chains the Bourbons then covered our unfortunate country; and the image of the Most Christian King, like the Saturn of the Carthaginians, devouring his children, is not so soon to be effaced from the memories of Frenchmen. I will only advert to the general features of that extensive plan of counter-revolution to which the ordinances of the 25th of July were only a supplement.

The first blow aimed at the charter of 1814, an imperfect consecration of the principles proclaimed by the Constituent Assembly, was the ordinance by virtue of which Louis XVIII. changed, of his own authority, the primitive conditions of electorship and of eligibility. Thenceforward, each day gave birth to some fresh revolutionary project. First of all, two distinct governments were set up in the state; the one ostensible, and designed to exhibit the forms of representative government; the other occult, and acting despotically upon every branch of the administration. However, the counter-revolution was as yet only marching gradually to its object: it was resolved to precipitate it. Then was formed the Ville ministry, for the evident purpose of accomplishing the counter-revolution, by strengthening it with all the energy of seven individuals broadly stigmatised, and devoted to the party.

Then, also, was waged that impious war, which presented to the world the spectacle of a French army engaged in smothering in Spain the first germs of the liberty for which it had itself so long combated. From that instant, the reactionary policy of the Restoration observed no bounds. The ordinance of Andujar was revoked as soon as published. The Revolution had stricken fanaticism to the heart, in compelling the clergy to confine themselves within the precincts of the Scriptures. They were assailed by a law of blood, the law of sacrifice. The Charter had solemnly pronounced that the sale of the national domains was irrevocable: a milliard was thrown to the voracity of the emigrants. It guaranteed the liberty of the press; an endeavour was made to abolish it by the loi d'amour. The trial by jury was the sole palladium of the life and honour of the citizens; its suppression was attempted by a project of law, which took from it the cognizance of the crimes of barter and piracy. Another project of law relating to the schools for medicine and to medical juries, left no doubt of the intention to crush successively all the liberal professions. And some symptoms of independence having been manifested in the Chamber of Peers, in all haste it was overwhelmed with creatures of the Restoration, and with the most servile of the remnant of the senate of the Empire.

Things were at this point when, the counter-revolution being openly avowed, every interest threatened, the indignation of every honest mind roused, and, above all, the cry of public opinion, created apprehensions in the ministry that it could no longer command the majority in the Chambers which it had obtained by means of so many frauds and corruptions. It called together the electoral colleges, from which issued, in spite of all its efforts, the more popular chamber of 1828.

Deceived in the elections, the Restoration turned hypocrite; the Ville administration was dismissed; the king came, at the opening of the session, to stammer out some words about liberty, to promise better things in future; and France, ever unwisely confiding, believed in his promises, forgave, and hoped. The Martignac administration brought back the ostensible policy of the government into more liberal courses; and it is but just to say, that its first care was to give to the country some of those guarantees which it had long claimed in vain. The electoral law, calculated to repress the ministerial frauds which had so deeply corrupted the purity of the national representation; the law on the liberty of the press, though imperfect, since it abated in this matter the powers of juries; and the ordinances of the 16th of June, against the religious congregations, gave to this session of 1829 a restorative character, and conciliated to the government the influence and support of the nation. The journey to Alsace is in the recollection of every one; during which the population, forgetful of their most just resentment, came and rendered homage for the evils which had ceased to be inflicted upon them. This simple changing of the administration appeared to have restored the nation to the exercise of its rights, and the throne to the affections of the French people. There yet remained many legitimate points to be gained: but the representative government evinced the essential characteristics, and the people were persuaded that these now required only to be developed.

Nothing then appeared easier than to confirm ourselves in the national courses into which the legislature and the ministry had returned. But if the Chambers and the depositaries of authority were sincere, not so was the court. Constantly swayed by one fixed idea, it had only postponed its favourite project of counter-revolution. Suspicious and dissembling, it saw only enemies in the ministers whom the force of circumstances alone had imposed upon it: out of the cabinet, councils prevailed that paralysed their efforts, and rendered their progress undecided and painful. The session of 1829 passed in new trials of strength, in which it was easy to detect the conspiracies which were brewing in secret. The promulgation of the Chambers left the field free to the counter-revolution party; and in fact, the deputies had scarcely reached their departments, when the formation of the administration of the 8th of August, prepared long before in the street of the Tuileries, struck all France with amazement. Never had France been so barely betrayed, and as M. de Béronger has said, "it was reserved for our heroic nation to receive from its king more outrages in one day, than any foreign power had ever dared to offer her."

Nevertheless, in this imminent danger, the country rising into an imposing attitude, indignantly and courageously confronted the impious faction to whose hands its destinies had just been committed. A universal anathema was pronounced against this reviving generation of favourites, mistresses, and flatterers, which had fastened upon power. Then, public opinion reviewed one by one the members of the new administration, and beheld in each the frightful image of the most grievous vices which had afflicted France during three centuries. And in fact who were these ministers? A Roman pince, (M. de Polignac), brought up in ultramontane maxims, and whose pitiable destiny it was to live and die in the practice of conspiracies; the man of the bloody catacombs, (M. de la Bourdonnaye); the gentle prêtre, who, holding from his windows the guillotine perambulating the plains of the Rhone, said that the errors of governments should be buried in the bowels of the earth, (M. Chabrol); the spoiled child of the Congregation, whose incapacity had become proverbial, (M. de Montbel); the promoter of prevotal courts, (M. de Courvoisier); traitor, a deserter, whose sword had stigmatised the Fuch name, (M. de Bourmont); and then—a Mangin.

Of such men was this cabinet composed: in one, hypocrisy and fanaticism; in another, violence; in a third, treason, servility in all, bad faith and hatred of our institutions. Why followed was in exact conformity with the men. Very aristocratic passion was let loose; no resentment at was not revived; no senseless hope that was not renewed at this signal.

How much to dread how little to hope, from a situation like this! It poised to the country nothing but a frightful future of lod; for it was evident that despotism was absolute/necessary to men totally incapable of working the machinery of a representative government. In such crisis, inaction had been death: whence a generous salutation seized every citizen. On every side preparations were made for combating to the utmost that contempt of all civilisation, and horror of all liberty, all natural improvement, which was the animating soul of the cabinet of the 8th of August. In vain was it that, amid the cries of indignation which assailed the throne as on a general calamity, the new minister hesitated resort at once to arbitrary measures; in vain did they affect unconcernedness amidst the apprehensions which tormented them; in vain did they protest that a nation had nothing to fear: the nation, knowing its fears were never better grounded, prepared on all sides to defend its menaced rights. An association, fixed by a small knot of persons for the purpose of retarding the payment of taxes, spread with prodigious rapidity: the press, assuming its highest functions, was incessant war against the unveiled projects of the government, awakened the apprehension of coups d'état, filled all ranks with the presentiment of a great imminent danger. In short, every one who loved his country prepared for resistance. Nine months passed recriminations and in preparations for attack and defence. But after all, the nation must be encountered face to face; the Chambers were summoned.

Up to this point the faction had worn a mask of patriotism, and distasteful the nation with its praises; its language was changed: Charles X. came, at the opening of the session, to denounce France as a hotbed of revolt and sedition; the counter-revolution began to think aloud in the royal speech:—"If culpable expectations are resorted to," said the king, "for the purposes of raising obstacles in the way of my government, which I will not, which I cannot foresee, I shall not want resolution to put them down."

Of all the sessions, none had commenced under such unfavourable auspices. The faction which, after fourteen centuries of continued rebellion against the rights of the people, had passed in obscurity the period of the Republic and that of the Empire, now displayed itself in full life and vigour: it was now no longer a question of fears more or less vague, of reports more or less well founded; the counter-revolution had divulged its secret; and it became evident that henceforward either liberty must put down an insolent oligarchy, or that the oligarchy would extinguish liberty; in one word, it was clear that what the 8th of August administration had begun by fraud, it was preparing to carry by main force.

In the royal speech, so much tainted with hatred and contempt for the rights of the nation, France saw only an additional reason for never treating with enemies whom it was necessary to vanquish, and to persist with her utmost energy of purpose in seeking to drive from her men whom so many plots and so inveterate an aversion to liberty, pointed out, to her consternation, as the most irreconcilable enemies of representative government.

The Chamber of Deputies fully comprehended the danger of the position: it felt that this was not, as was maintained, a personal question, a quarrel amongst individuals; for if, when strong and vigorous institutions have been long established, the administration of public affairs may pass without much risk into perverse or unskilful hands, because it is no longer possible to destroy them, it is not so when organic laws are as yet only a question of right rather than of fact, and when the institutions which are the very life of liberty have yet to be obtained: then the question of things resolves itself into a question of men; and the existence of a bad administration, were it only for one twelvemonth, one month, one day, becomes a public calamity.

The majority of the chamber felt it their duty to lay before the monarch this truth:—"The intervention of the country in public transactions," said they, "renders a constant concurrence of the political views of your government with the wishes of the people, indispensably necessary to the well conducting of the public business. Sire, our loyalty, our devotedness, compel us to declare to you that this concurrence does not exist."

"Between those who ill understand a nation so calm and faithful, and us, who with a profound conviction come to deposit in your bosom the griefs of a whole people, let the superior wisdom of your majesty be judged."

What answer did the superior wisdom of Charles X. give? That the resolutions announced in the speech from the throne were immutable.

From that moment, the symptoms of an approaching crisis succeeded one another with frightful rapidity. The prerogative of the chamber, and soon after, its dissolution; the most criminal employment of all kinds of frauds to vitiate the elections; an extensive and atrocious plot, spreading conflagration through our provinces; a great military enterprise conceived and executed in the sole view of creating a diversion in the public mind favourable to the counter-revolution; the appointing of a commander-in-chief covered with an indelible opprobrium; the expending of enormous sums without the control of the chambers; the return of M. de Peyronnet to the administration, and the appointing of MM. Casse and Chantelauze, in place of two ministers who had shrunk from the counter-revolutionary projects; the royal proclamation; the adjournment of twenty electoral colleges; the news of the capture of Algiers; the triumphant strains of the administration; the reelection of almost every one of the two hundred and twenty-one; the triumphs of the constitutional opposition in an immense majority of the electoral colleges; the defeat of the ministers; the sending of secret letters for the purpose of collecting together the deputies at Paris, with a view, undoubtedly, to facilitate the securing of their persons; in fine, the publishing of a memorial in which the emigrant faction solicited Charles X. to have recourse to coups d'état: such were the events which preceded the ordinances of the 26th of July, the active expression of the purposes of the 8th of August.

The first of these ordinances, a direct attack on the national representation, pronounced the dissolution of the chamber before it had assembled: the second annulled the existing electoral laws; reduced the number of deputies from four hundred and thirty to two hundred and fifty-eight; left to the colleges of arrondissement the right only of recommending candidates; abolished the vote by ballot, the intervention of the thirds, and the jurisdiction of the royal courts in matters relating to elections: the third convoked the new colleges for the 6th and 18th of September, and the chambers for the 25th of the same month; finally, the fourth ordinance abrogated the laws which guaranteed the liberty of the press, and revived the provisions of that of the 21st of October, 1814.*

These ordinances appeared in the Moniteur of the 26th of July.

CHAPTER II.

Effect produced by the Ordinances—Aspect of Paris—Awful calm during the day of the 26th—Conduct of the Press—Meeting of the journalists at M. Dupin's—First meeting of the deputies at M. de Lafayette's—Conduct of the representatives—Party of M. Pons—Meeting on the 27th at M. Pons's—Conduct, collective and individual, of the deputies at this meeting.

Here commences a new series of occurrences, which brings me back to the principal subject of this work, the conduct of Lafayette and his co-operation in those great events.

Patriots still shudder when they call to mind the first effect produced by the ordinances: it was a gloomy amazement, amounting almost to incredulity. The Moniteur had been circulating for several hours: the citizens of the capital had read over and over again the insolent manifesto; and could not yet bring themselves to believe in so much audacity and insinuation. The public places remained open as usual; the inhabitants of Paris were attending to their business; no symptom of insurrection was manifested; in short, the most breathless tranquillity prevailed in that vast city, in the bosom of which the government alone was organising its means of attack and defence.

The periodical press, however, the first object struck by the ordinances, which, by blow upon blow, were breaking up its existence, boldly took refuge in insurrection. Having to choose between slavery and revolt, the opposition journals, with very few exceptions, were faithful to their doctrines. Their proprietors and principal editors met in the first place, but to no purpose, at M. Dupin's the elder; then at the office of the Notionnel, where was discussed, and, after some strange resistance over which I gladly throw a veil, was adopted, that energetic protest which was to put arms in the hands of the citizens, and determine them to resist oppression.

This courageous protest, printed in contempt of the ordinances, and profusely distributed in spite of the efforts of the satellites of tyranny, produced an electric effect upon the whole population. From that moment, the public opinion recoiling upon itself, astonishment was succeeded by anger and indignation. The interests most immediately attacked made the first explosion. The journeymen printers showed themselves in arms with incredible daring. The scholars of the Polytechnic school heroically headed the revolted citizens; those of the schools of law and medicine marched in their train; and this example raised the whole capital. Every thing was then in motion; every thing was tending to insurrection; a magnificent defence was prepared in a few hours; the soldiers of absolutism presented themselves on the field of battle of the public liberties; the contest commenced to the cry of Vive la Charte! Vive la Liberté! blood began to flow; all hope of conciliation was destroyed; and it was now for victory alone to decide between liberty and despotism.

The struggle between the people and the royal troops had thus commenced on the evening of Tuesday, the 27th of July; and then was raised the true cry of insurrection. But the events of that day, the prelude of the greater ones of the following days, had no result beyond two or three charges of gendarmery and the dispersion of a number of groups of youths and workmen which had gathered together in the Rue Saint-Honoré, the Place Vendôme, and the neighbourhood of the Palais Royal. The people were yet only stirring themselves up to the conquest of their liberties, and preboding to the conflicts of the 28th or 29th, to which I shall return, after devoting a few words to the conduct of those deputies who were at Paris on the 26th and 27th of July. A witness of the facts which I relate, I shall concede nothing to party spirit; and should I happen to make any misstatement, it will be the fault of my memory, never of my will; but my memory, I am convinced, cannot in this case present to me any but faithful and inflexible impressions.

The first member of the chamber who ventured to declare himself and risk his head, in the first stage of the struggle, that is to say, at the moment when the insurrection had as yet on its side only the probabilities of defeat, and the scaffold in prospect, was Count Alexandre de Laborde. On the 26th, Monday, that honourable and courageous deputy presented himself amongst the journalists, and accepted the presidency of that meeting, at which the principle of protestation, and that of resistance to the ordinances, were loudly and publicly decided upon. Not one of my old colleagues but remembers with admiration the answer which he gave to a deputation from the school of law, commissioned to urge upon us the necessity of having recourse to arms. "Gentlemen," said M. de Laborde, "you are right: our country no longer claims from us empty words: unanimous action, vigorous and powerful, can alone save her liberties. Go and tell your comrades that you have found us animated with the same sentiments as yourselves, ready to fulfil the same duties and incur the same dangers. Go, gentlemen; assemble in greater number at ten o'clock to-night; and we will send you word what we shall have resolved upon."

On the breaking up of the meeting of the journalists, at which each one engaged upon his honour to use all the means at his disposal in order to induce to resistance, and make the insurrection general, M. de Laborde called at a meeting of the deputies present at Paris, to take place at seven o'clock, at the honourable deputy's own residence. At eight, a few members only had answered the call of honour; amongst whom were Messieurs Baveux, Daunou, Vassal, Marschal, De Schonen, Levevre, Bernard, and Villennin. Feeling the urgency of the circumstances, and, perhaps, also tired of waiting in vain for the arrival of his other colleagues, M. de Laborde opened this memorable debate. After representing the disposition of the public mind, and relating what he had seen and heard at the meeting of the journalists, he showed the necessity of an energetic declaration in answer to the ordinances, and warmly urged that the members present should draw it up, as in full sitting, in the name of the Chamber of Deputies. M. Baveux proposed that the deputies present in the capital should constitute themselves a national assembly: the venerable M. Daunou spoke with noble fervour of the duties which this aggression by oppressive power imposed upon the mandatories of the country; he said, that even the dangers that might attend the fulfilment of those duties, made them only the more imperative and the more sacred; that since the liberty of the tribune was violated, an appeal to the people was the only means of public safety that tyranny had left at the disposal of the country's representatives; and that they must use it without hesitation, or forfeit their honour, and betray the confidence and the dearest interests of the nation. M. de Schonen spoke to the same effect; and said that it was necessary, on this great occasion, to prove themselves capable of laying aside all consideration of self, and, if need were, to cry To arms! Such was the opinion of all the members of that meeting; and already, I believe, had M. Villennin received directions to draw it up in the form of a protest, when M. Péricr was announced. His ear had just caught M. de Schonen's concluding words, "to cry Tu arms!" and the strongest anxiety was depicted in his countenance.

"Ah! gentlemen!" said he, "what imprudence are you going to commit? Have you thought well of it? What! constitute yourselves a national assembly! cry to arms!"

But too many legitimate resentments now pursue the memory of the President of the Council, for me not to feel it a part of my historical duty to cast aside the feelings which such recollections revive in my breast. I will not relate the words in which he opposed the noble stance of his colleagues; I shall merely sum up his opinion. He thought that the chamber was legally dissolved; that the ordinances were only the exercise of a prerogative recognised by the charter; and that, since the publication of the Moniteur of the day, there were really no longer any deputies. Supposing that the prerogative asserted by Charles X. was questionable, which he did not admit, he asked where was the judge between the supreme power and the people. He declared that in any case, the Chamber ought to refrain from anticipating events; that to urge to insurrection would be an act of madness on its part; that it was impossible that the king should not consent to the resolution of withdrawing the ordinances; and that only in view should the declaration be drawn up, if they persisted in the project of making a declaration at all, which, however, had not his assent. As to the confidence which seemed to be entertained in the power of public opinion, he, M. Périer, did not share it. Accustomed to express itself in a legal manner, that opinion, said he, would never again arm itself with brute force; and if it ventured to do so, it would be vanquished, annihilated; as witness the result of the events of 1820, 1821, and 1827; as witness all the conspiracies which had been attempted and defeated for the last fifteen years. In short, M. Périer thought that wisdom and patriotism prescribed to the deputies to wait the course of events, and regulate their conduct according to the results.

During these debates, and on the motion of M. de Laborde, three of the deputies present had gone to the meeting of the journalists, which had been joined by a great many of the Parisian electors. These deputies, viz. MM. de Laborde, Villennin, and de Schonen, had found all those worthy citizens animated by the most ardent patriotism, and more than ever determined to oppose a vigorous resistance to the invasions of power. M. de Laborde, fresh from the impressions which he had there received, said warily to his colleagues, that a longer hesitation on their part would be fatal to liberty, that the victory of the people depended upon the concurrence of the deputies with the citizens who had been the first to devote themselves, and that they ought immediately to repair to the meeting of the journalists. This opinion was concurred by M. Périer, who repeated his former arguments against every attempt tending to any other object than that of bringing back Charles X. into a better course. Despairing, however, of prevailing upon his colleagues to adopt this opinion, he had recourse to a means of hindrance which he found successful. He observed, that there would be levity and impropriety in coming to a determination of that nature without consulting the other deputies then in Paris; and he engaged to call them together to a meeting at his house at a very early hour the next morning. Letters of convocation were accordingly addressed by M. Périer to a number of members of the Chamber. But, no doubt, seeing the constantly increasing irritation of the people, and the hostile preparations which they made during the night and in the morning, M. Périer lost no time in intimating to his colleagues that he had convoked, not to attend his invitation of the day before.

Such, during the day of the 26th of July, was the attitude of the deputies present in Paris.

The day of the 27th began under no better auspices. A very small number of deputies again assembled at M. de Laborde's, appointed to resemble at M. Périer's, at two in the afternoon. This choice of their place of meeting inspired visible uneasiness in some of the members; but the imminency of the dangers which threatened the liberties of the country, was thought powerful enough to restore the tone of M. Périer's patriotism, some little altered for two years past. It was known that the ardour of that deputy's liberalism had been softened down by contact with the royal gracioso; but it was hoped that the tribune of the people would revive in him all the contumaciousness of the dangers of his country, and that Desmoulières' cold would not retard the action of a July sun.

This meeting was preceded by a scene of carnage. A great many young men, attracted into the Rue Neuve de Luxembourg by the rumour of the meeting of the deputies, were there hemmed in, and sabred by two detachments of cavalry. Being obliged to seek refuge in the neighbouring houses, they knocked in vain at the doors of M. Périer's mansion. Caution kept them shut against every one who had not the name of a deputy to send in. A number of those young patriots, severely wounded, were conveyed to the office of the minister for foreign affairs.

Meanwhile, what was passing in the interior of M. Périer's mansion? The deputies, assembled this time very numerously, under the presidency of M. Labry de Pompières, had, from the opening of the sitting, been divided into two opposite camps. The one asserted the constitutionality of the dissolution of the Chamber, advocated the maintenance of the royal power of Louis Philippe, urged the necessity of keeping within the bounds of legality, and simply soliciting the recall of the ordinances, by respectful remonstrances grounded on the manifestation of public opinion. The opposite party maintained that the character of deputy had not been destroyed by the ordinance of dissolution; that moreover Charles X., in violating the Charter by all and each of the ordinances, had stripped himself of the prerogative of dissolving the Chamber at all; and that the deputies remained ipso facto invested with all the plenitude of the electoral capacity; that it was absurd to invoke legality in favour of a power which had just burst asunder all its ties; and that when the question was, whether France should be free or enslaved, under a representative government or the tyranny of an individual, the safety of the commonwealth was no longer to be found in any thing but the success of an open resistance to oppression.

The former of these two opinions had for its champion M. Dupin; the latter was energetically supported by M. Mauguin. MM. de Laborde, de Puyraveau, Béard, Labry de Pompières, Persil, Milleret, Borin-de-Vaux, and Villennin, followed on the side of M. Mauguin; the two latter contending, however, that they ought to respect Charles X. from his ministers, and not confound them in one common reprobation. MM. Sebastiani and Casimir Périer had ranged themselves under the banner of M. Dupin. It is, however, but just to say, that M. Périer declared himself at first only by mute signs, in which it was easy to discover the perplexity which tormented him.

These debates were growing warm on either side, when an unforeseen occurrence interrupted the discussion, and gave it a new turn. A deputation from the electors of the city of Paris requested to be introduced. M. Périer at once beholds the glorieux of the Bourbons and the popular dagger suspended over the parliamentary heads. "Observe in what a position they are placing us!" exclaimed he. "If we receive the deputation, it will be known at the Tuileries; it will perhaps give provocation there, and who knows what measures may be taken against us! If the deputation is not received, its members will complain; they may go and mix among the people, and in the present exasperated state of men's minds who can answer?"—"Messieurs Dupin and Sebastiani likewise opposed with all their might, the reception of this deputation, which, added to the appointment of a president, said they, converted a mere private meeting into an actual deliberative assembly.

However, the deputation was introduced. It was composed of the most respectable citizens of the capital, who came to declare to the deputies, by the mouths of Messieurs Méhiliou and Boulay de la Meurthe, that every tie which attached France to the throne of the Bourbons was broken; that the nation ought not, could not any longer appeal to any thing but insurrection against an authority which had trampled upon every law; and that the people relied upon the courage and patriotism of their representatives. The declaration was succeeded by an isolated debate; the deputation withdrew into a neighbouring apartment, that the deputies might be left to deliberate in full liberty. In the mean time another deputation, consisting of young men, asked to be admitted. M. Périer hastened to them, and conjured them not to persist in a step which he considered as most highly imprudent; he represented to the young men the folly of their efforts against the measures of repression which the government would assuredly not have failed to take; and exhorted them to return within the bounds of legality, and not seek in the streets a victory which they would not find. The young men, fully resolved no longer to rely upon any thing but the energy of the people, withdrew; and M. Périer went back to his colleagues.

The deputies had entered into deliberation—they deliberated at great length—whether it would not be appropriate and prodigiously patriotic to write an epistle to Charles X., supplicating his clemency to be so good as to change his ministry, and revoke the fatal ordinance. This opinion, advanced by Messieurs Bertin-de-Vaux, Dupin, Sebastiani, Périer, and Villennin, prevailed, without, however, leading to any result. The assembly separated without having done any thing, without having attempted any thing for that heroic people whose blood was already flowing in torrents in the streets of Paris. But I mistake—they did something—for they agreed to meet again the next day, AT NOON, at M. Audry de Puyraveau's, who, on M. Périer's refusing to throw open his mansion a second time for an assembly of the deputies, promptly offered them his house, adding, that they should there be under the safeguard of the people.

The hostilities between the people and the royal troops, began in the evening of the 27th, were renewed on the morning of the 28th, and from the first time assumed that character of combination and pertinacity which became a warfare on the issue of which would depend the life or death of French liberty. From that moment, also, Lafayette bound up his existence inseparably with the vicissitudes of that struggle. The country was once more about to place itself in the midst of storms, under the agis of the great citizen, whose laurels, gathered in both hemispheres, had ever been those of liberty, courage, and philosophy. As in the early days of the revolution of 1789, as in every period of his long career, we shall find the authority of his name overcoming despotism, and repressing anarchy.

CHAPTER III.

Lafayette's arrival at Paris—His first steps—The resistance of the people becomes general—First meeting of deputies at the house of M. Audry de Puyraveau—List of names and species of MM. Lafayette, Mauguin, Laflitte, Charles Dupin, Sebastiani, Gaizot, Puyraveau, &c.—A deputation sent to the Duke of Ragusa—M. Périer proposes a meeting to present Marmon with several millions—First meeting at the house of M. Béard—Decision of the people by almost the whole of the deputies present—Various combats—Weakness of Messieurs Villennin, Sebastiani, and Bertin-de-Vaux—A fresh meeting of deputies at the house of M. Audry de Puyraveau—The number of the patriots deputies is now reduced to eight—Night between the 26th and 27th.

Lafayette was absent from Paris when the ordinances first made their appearance. The Moniteur of the 26th reached him at La Grange on the morning of the 27th. His resolution was taken at once: he took post, and probably owed it only to the celerity of his journey, that he was not arrested on the way; for it is impossible that in such a crisis the counter-revolutionary government should not have had its attention fixed on him, whom they styled the revolution man. Be that as it might, the first care of Lafayette, in the evening of the 27th, was to offer to the insurgent patriots the support of his name and his person. As early as four o'clock in the morning a deputation of the pupils of the polytechnic school had assembled at his house, and a few hours later this swarm of young heroes were fighting and dying at the head of the people in every quarter of the capital.

Resistance was making at all points, with various success; some barricades began to be raised, and blood already flowed abundantly, when, conformably to their agreement of the previous evening, the deputies began to assemble at the house of M. Audry de Puyraveau. It was mid-day; the sun shone forth in full splendour; the sound of the tocsin, mingled with the report of the cannon, and the echoes of the musketry, announced that the people were aroused; the representatives of France, at least so it was believed, were about to decide the fate of their country; an indescribable feeling of dread and of hope agitated every breast.

An immense crowd of citizens, some variously armed, and others without any arms, choked up the approaches to the house of M. de Puyraveau, endeavouring to coquet with the countenance of each of the deputies as they passed before them; how much of courage and devotion for their country possessed each manly heart: Lafayette was greeted with the liveliest acclamations; he was the hope of liberty. He and M. Laflitte were among the first who arrived at the place of meeting. Soon, the deputies took their seats—silence succeeded to individual discussions—they were, at last, about to apply themselves to the preserving of that liberty for which the people had been instinctively fighting and dying during the last six-and-thirty hours.

I shall now retrace my recollections, and relate that which, with my head leaning on the edge of a window-frame, my ear attentively listening, and my eye fixed on that large ground floor apartment, where are debated the destinies of a people, or rather the destinies of all Europe, I saw and heard at that awful moment; I am at the bar of my country; I shall speak without hatred and without fear; I shall tell the whole truth.

M. Mauguin spoke first. He is the man to confront danger; he is the orator of revolution; nature has made him a tribune of the people. He traced in broad outlines a frightful picture of the situation of Paris; he spoke of the wicked attempts of the court, the resentment of the people, their combats, their successes, their reverses, their fears, and their hopes. "Listen," said he, with enthusiasm, "listen to the roar of the cannon, and the groans of the dying; they reach you even here; it is a great people effecting a revolution which you ought to direct; it is no longer permitted us to hesitate; our place, gentlemen, is between the popular battalions and the phalanxes of despotism; beware of losing time; the royal guard loses none, be assured; once more, I say, this is a revolution which calls upon us to act."

At this word—revolution—several deputies rose and threatened to retire immediately. It was an explosion of all the fears that had found their way to this assembly. Messieurs Charles Dupin, Sebastiani and Guizot distinguished themselves among the most zealous advocates of legal order. "I protest against every act that goes be-you the bounds of legality," exclaimed M. Dupin.—"What! speak you of resistance?" said M. Sebastiani, with heat and precipitation; "we have only to consider how legal order may be preserved." "The slightest imprudence," added M. Guizot, "would compromise the justice of our cause. Our duty is not, as is asserted, to take part either with or against the people, but to become mediators, to check the popular movement, and convince the king that his ministers have deceived him."

A voice well known to the friends of liberty now made itself heard; it was that of Lafayette, always equally courageous and skilful in bringing back questions to the French people. He confessed, smiling, "that I find it difficult to reconcile legality with the Moniteur of the day before yesterday, and with the firing for the last two days." Then assuming the calm and solemn tone suited to the solemnity of the occasion, he declared that a revolution certainly was at hand; and proposed the immediate creation of a provisional government; an idea which was adopted subsequently, but which as yet was too decided and patriotic not to be regarded by a good many of his colleagues as at least premature.

At this moment, it was announced that the people had carried the Hotel-de-Ville after a terrible carnage; but the conflict continued; the royal troops received reinforcements, and it was feared that they might again be victorious. This incident, however, seemed to revive the drooping courage of some of the champions of legality. M. Guizot condemning the respectful letter proposed to be written to his majesty, Charles X., was willing to incur the risk of a protest of which he read the outline, and in which fidelity to the king was still preserved.

This protest was the cause of the courageous observation of M. Laffitte, who declared it to be insufficient and below the rightful claims of a people who had already poured out so much of its blood.

M. Prier proposed to send a deputation to the Duke of Ragusa, to obtain from him a truce, during which the deputies might carry their complaints to the foot of the throne;* but Lafayette demanded that the deputation should confine itself to ordering Marmont, in the name of the law, and upon his personal responsibility, to put an end to the firing. However, this deputation was appointed; it was composed of MM. Prier, Laffitte, Mauguin, Lobau, and Gerard. Lafayette, visibly indignant at all these delays, whilst the blood of so many citizens was streaming around him, declared to his colleagues that his name was already placed, by the confidence of the people and with his consent, at the head of the insurrection; that he ardently wished his determination should obtain their approbation; but that happen what might, he considered himself as pledged in honour to establish on the following day his head-quarters at Paris.

Thus ended this first sitting; its whole result, a proclamation without energy, without meaning, and which was to be published—ON THE MORROW. It was two o'clock; they adjourned to four at M. Berard's.

At four o'clock the deputies re-assembled at M. Berard's. Here my historical task becomes more painful. I have to retrace scenes which it would probably be better to obliterate from our parliamentary annals, but that they must be preserved for the instruction of posterity. My pen shall do its duty. In the short interval of time between the first and second assembling of the deputies on the day of the 28th, affairs had taken another turn. The patriots had been beaten at several points; the Hotel-de-Ville, already twice taken and retaken, had remained, at last, in the power of the royal troops, with whom some brave citizens were again contesting it, but the combatants began to feel discouraged; their energy, for want of proper direction, was becoming exhausted; anxiety was at its highest point, and the defeat of the people generally seemed inevitable. Shall I declare it? Scarcely one half of the deputies who had been present at the meeting in the morning, attended at that in the afternoon. The deputation sent to the Duke of Ragusa now reported to the assembly the insolent reply of that cut-throat, who required the submission of the people as a preliminary to any negotiation. This answer excited the indignation of those deputies who were faithful to their country; but it froze with fear the greater number of those gentlemen who, in the midst of the misfortunes of France, thought only how to escape individually the consequences of the ordinance which declared Paris in a state of siege. At this moment was brought in the proclamation agreed upon in the morning, and which several of the journalists had printed after divesting it of the servile expressions in which fear had clothed it. And here I have first weaknesses to record: this protest, so feeble, so unmeaning, was rejected, through the consternation which had seized upon MM. Villemin, Sebastiani, and Bertin-de-Vaux—not one of these gentlemen now dared to entertain it; they withdrew, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of several of their colleagues, who implored them not to abandon their country on the brink of a precipice. At that moment, Lafayette declared, as he had already done in the morning, his firm resolution to throw his life and fortune into the movement; and to establish his head-quarters, at day-break, at the Hotel-de-Ville, or at some other point in possession of the people.

The patriots had now succeeded in regaining possession of the Hotel-de-Ville; the Swiss and the guards had retreated over the bodies which strewed the Place-de-Grève, the quays, and the bridges. The number of the deputies assembled was reduced to ten, when this happy intelligence was brought them. It revived some nearly extinguished patriotism; and even M. Guizot proposed to affix to the proclamation the names of all the deputies, whether absent or present, whose opinions were known to be liberal. This gave rise to fresh protestations on the part of M. Sebastiani, who had again made his appearance; and this dilatory measure might again have been rejected or postponed, but for M. Laffitte, who, with that truly civic disinterestedness and courage for which he is distinguished, cut the question short, by saying, "Let us adopt this proposal, gentlemen: if we are vanquished, they will charge us with falsehood, and prove that we were once eight in number; if we conquer, be assured they will be emulous to acknowledge the signatures."

The declaration was adopted, and subscribed, on presumption of patriotism, with sixty-three parliamentary names, out of the four hundred and thirty which compose the Chamber of Deputies. The name of M. Dupin was inserted at first; but it was erased on M. Mauguin's observing, that it would only be exposing themselves to certain and disagreeable remonstrances.

Another meeting was appointed for eight o'clock in the evening, at the house of M. Audry de Puyraveau. This meeting reproduced all the proofs of courage and all the symptoms of weakness that had marked those which preceded it. A contest, which will never be effaced from my recollection, was waged between MM. Lafayette, De Laborde, Laffitte, Mauguin, and Audry de Puyraveau, on one side; and Messieurs Sebastiani and Melchior on the other. The former demanded that, cutting short so many shameful tergiversations, the deputies now at Paris, clothed in their parliamentary costume, and mounting the tricoloured cockade, should place themselves boldly at the head of the people; the latter ventured again to speak of legal order, of mediation, and of concessions to be obtained from Charles X. This was more than the citizen soul of Lafayette could bear; he rose, and demanded of his colleagues, what post they assigned him in the name of the country; for that he was ready to occupy it on the instant. The seceders had departed; and the patriot deputies, now reduced to five only, but resolved to raise again gloriously the tricoloured flag, separated, after appointing to meet again at five the next morning, at M. Laffitte's: it was then midnight.

What a night was this between the 28th and 29th of July! Not an eye was closed in the great city; and were stirring; all arming or working at the barricades; and as yet the deep silence which reigned in Paris was interrupted only by the dull noise of the tearing up of the short rails, the sighs of the wounded whom some friendly arm was reconveying to the paternal roof, the qui vive of the citizen soldier, or that long "sentinelle, prenez garde à vous" which one hundred thousand men, on foot for liberty, passed from one to the other every quarter of an hour. No, the people never appeared under no sabbat an aspect.

Lafayette devoted this solemn night to the inspection of the barricades, which the instinct and foresight of the people had established at all the threatened points; and before each of these hastily-raised fortifications, he could not help exclaiming in admiration of a combination of military dispositions which would have done honour to the sagacity of Vauban. "Who is it, then," repeated he with transport,—"who is it that has taught them the art of war in one day, in one night?" Between the hours of one and two in the morning, an old man, walking with difficulty, presented himself, supported by two or three persons, before the barricade which closed up the Rue Oudot, on the side of that of the Faubourg Montmartre. Here passed a scene, of which I borrow the picturesque recital from a journal (La Tribune) which has related it with admirable truth. "Halt," cries the sentinel; "corporal, come and reconnoitre." ('The corporal was a working man.') "You must come to the post, you fellows there; and you shall tell us what keeps you abroad so late." The group tall toward the post. There each of the unknown undergoes an examination. First, a man, well stricken in years, of venerable countenance, and for whose passage it had been necessary to make breaches in two or three of the barricades; then, three other persons, who appeared to be under his orders, as aides-de-camp. All this appeared very suspicious to the commandant, who sharply interrogated the old man. The latter replied to him: "Commandant, you see me moved to the very soul at the spectacle which you make me witness; embrace me, and know that I am one of your old comrades!" The commandant hesitated. "It is General Lafayette!" said some one. Every one flew into his arms; but the commandant, resuming all his gravity: "Gentlemen," said he, "o brave men!"—and immediately all fell into line, and the General reviewed the post, as in the most regular army."

CHAPTER IV.

Combats in the morning of the 29th—Aspet of Paris—Heroism, probity, and humanity of the patriots—Lafayette lemmied in by the royal troops—Meeting at M. Laffitte's—Victory declares for the people—The deputies whom this intelligence converts to the cause of the city—Appearance of M. Laffitte; passion—Some internal details—Lafayette repairs to the Hotel-de-Ville—Picture of this new head-quarters—Installation of the Municipal Commission—Its first measures—Lafayette's proclamation to the army.

The combat had recommenced at daybreak. Lafayette, in returning to his residence, through the Rue de Surène, was blocked in there for a few minutes by the royalist corps which occupied the church of La Madeleine, and kept up a constant fire upon all that presented themselves. The general, however, contrived to escape this danger; and availing himself shortly after of a retrograde movement effected by one of the enemy's posts, he made all speed to M. Laffitte's, whither he was accompanied by his grandson Jules de Lasterie, M. Audry de Puyraveau, Colonel Carbonel, and Captain (now Colonel) Poque. The cannon and musketry were roaring in all the streets contiguous to that through which Lafayette was passing on foot. It was an affecting circumstance to see the people recognising the transport of the citizen of liberty, but saying only, in a low voice, Vive Lafayette! for fear of pointing him out to the soldiers of Charles X., and hastening to open the shop doors, in order that the barricades might not obstruct his passage. Thus through many dangers, and abundant proofs of the popular solicitude for his safety, the general arrived at M. Laffitte's, whither also repaired a number of his colleagues, and various deputations of brave citizens who came to take him and conduct him to the Hotel-de-Ville, recently carried and definitively occupied by the patriots.

I have said that at daybreak the people and the royal troops had, on either side, recommenced hostilities with great fury. In order to understand what is now going to take place at M. Laffitte's, and the new posture in which we shall find the gentlemen of the Chamber putting themselves, it is requisite to call to mind the turn which the military operations had taken in the course of the previous day, and even before the assembling of the thirty-five or forty deputies which met at the mansion of their worthy colleague M. Laffitte, at eleven o'clock.

A great number of partial conflicts had been resumed with the dawn; and, with the exception of the Hotel-de-Ville, the approaches of the Place-de-Grève, and the Boulevards St. Denis and St. Martin, from all which the enemy had been repulsed the day before, the struggle continued during the day of the 28th. There, around the barricades, in the streets, in the houses, under the porticoes of the churches, every where, were profusely repeated that multitude of acts of heroism, magnanimity, and contempt of death, which had already so distinguished the preceding days. There we find barricades rising, as if by enchantment, behind the soldiers occupied in attacking the barricade which intercepts their progress; there we see women hurrying from the windows dashing paving stones, furniture, burning brands, in condems paying stones, furniture, burning brands, in contempt of the balls which strike them beside their infants' cradles; children waving the tricoloured flag amid the volley of grape-shot, and rushing amongst the enemy's squadrons to penard the horse of the cuirassier whom they cannot reach: I have seen them go gliding under the horses, and find out the lower extremity of the cuir

* My impartiality requires that I should add here, that M. Prier had already proposed in confidence, to offer several millions to Marmont, to draw him over to the cause of the people; he even urged that M. Laffitte, who had had pecuniary transactions with the Duke of Ragusa, should undertake this negotiation.

ness of one of the enemy, and thus kill one of those soldiers cased in steel, the weight of whom alone was sufficient to crush them: I have seen others hook themselves on the stirrup of a pike, and get themselves hacked in that position, while endeavouring to discharge a pocket pistol at his breast.*

And how many instances of generosity and humanity were seen among these miracles of heroism! Who can ever forget the conduct of those excellent females belonging to the lower classes, who either in their houses, or at the corners of the streets, and exposed to the grape shot, hastened to bind up the wounds of the workman struck by a royal bullet, and the soldier who had mutilated a brother or that friend! And then, when fortune had declared in favour of the people, what an affecting sight to behold the number of dwelling houses, churches, and theatres, which the piety of the citizens had transformed into hospitals! Here you would see the moustached, wounded Swiss lying between two beds in which were young patriots who treated him as a friend, and to whom the surgeons afforded the same assistance.

However, after a few hours' deadly strife, every probable chance of victory was on the side of the people. Already several battalions of the line had separated from the royal army; the guard and the Swiss alone fought with spirit; but successively driven from the situations they occupied the previous day, in the centre of the capital, they retreated towards the Louvre and the Tuileries. On the other hand, the patriots finding themselves abandoned by the deputies, whose courage they had so often, but so vainly, endeavoured to excite, came to the bold determination, on Wednesday evening, of proclaiming a provisional government, which, by their own private authority, was composed of MM. Lafayette, Gerard, and Choiseul. Some credulous citizens having presented themselves at the Hotel-de-Ville, to hold a communication with this fictitious power, the sentinels repulsed them with these words: No one must pass; the provisional government are in conference. This government, which, in reality, only existed in the imagination of a few patriots, produced upon the public mind the most beneficial effect. Whole companies of the national guard made their appearance, in uniform, with arms and drums at their head; the people, emboldened by these rallying signs, and now being convinced that they were no longer abandoned to themselves, rushed with confidence upon the forces of despotism; the popular attack assumed regularly on all sides, numerous columns formed and marched to attack the army, under the command of the students of the Polytechnic school, generals of twenty, as a citizen post has appropriately termed them; in short the Parisians rushed on to the combat as to a certain victory; the event was no longer doubtful.

Such was the situation of affairs on the 29th, at eleven o'clock in the morning. At that hour the meeting appointed at M. Lafayette's took place; and it may be easily conceived that it was more numerously attended than those of the preceding days. The reflections of the night had operated wonders on the minds of many; such or such a deputy, who the preceding day was a determined legislative, now returned with feelings of indignation, and pierced to the quick by the horrible obstinacy which the Bourbons manifested in spilling the blood of their subjects: the act was atrocious! Thus successively reappeared M. M. Sebastiani, Bertin-de-Vaux, Gerard, Dupuy, the elder Guizot, and many other of the champions of the respectful complaints (doléances respectueuses), the revocation of ordinances, and legality at any cost.

From daybreak, or rather from the commencement of the night, M. Lafayette's hotel had become the rallying point of the patriots, the centre at which all the rallying dictory and confused intelligence of the events passing in different parts of Paris arrived, and whence they few measures taken were communicated in different directions. It was a surprising sight to behold those magnificent apartments filled with riches, those tables covered with plate, the chest containing millions, a crowd continually renewed of strangers, workmen, soldiers, rich and poor, moving about in the midst of all this, day and night, and at a moment when society appeared in a state of dissolution; yet not a crown piece, nor a tea spoon, was carried away by men who could have done so with perfect impunity. Even without a coat or shoes, worn out with fatigue, trembling with anger, the soldiers were liberally asked for cartridges, for orders for commanders, and sometimes for a morsel of bread; but they saw neither the gold nor the other precious objects scattered on all sides, seeming to tempt their heroic poverty. Once again, the people, the true people, those of the barricades, never appeared to such advantage.

It was also at M. Lafayette's that the patriots of the departments nearest to the capital had proceeded, to ask instructions, which the honourable deputy issued in this abridged form: Urges to insurrection, and, if need be, come to the assistance of Paris. Such were, for instance, those received by the mayor of Rouen, who, on the first intelligence of the ordinances, had come to offer to the capital the aid of the patriotic city over which he presided. This brave citizen immediately set off, accompanied by the honorable M. Carel, to insurrectionise the city of Rouen, the inhabitants of which had manifested, on this occasion, so prompt, so noble, and so determined a spirit. The despatches intercepted by the patriots, the demands for safe-conducts and passports made by the foreign ambassadors, were also addressed to M. Lafayette, to whose house some prisoners belonging to the royal troops had been brought. Of this number, among others, were three staff-officers, MM. Roux, de Seran, and another, who, grateful for the hospitality which had been granted them, and for the care which had been taken to spare their lives, acknowledged to their host that at the very moment they had fallen into the hands of the Parisians, the staff were deliberating upon what measures should be taken to send two hundred soldiers, in the disguise of working men, to seize upon M. Lafayette, and bring him to the foot of the column of the Place Vendôme, where he was to be instantly shot. After remaining forty-eight hours in the dwelling of the man they had condemned to death, these expeditionary judges were pressed, by means of which they were enabled to leave his mansion and mix unobserved among the crowd.

It was in the midst of this tumult that the meeting of the 29th took place, at which thirty-eight or forty deputies were present. M. Lafayette presided, and having explained the situation of the insurrectionary movements, insisted upon the necessity of giving them a proper direction; he then requested M. Mauguin to express his opinion. The latter spoke with the same patriotism, the same energy which he had shown on the preceding days, and concluded with saying, that as the deputies had remained behind the people, they must now at least endeavour to overtake them by organising without delay a provisional government. A great number of citizens continually arriving from the Hotel-de-Ville, pressed for this measure, which was necessary to prevent the wheel of fortune from again turning; but there still were timid persons who hesitated. At length Lafayette arose, and, having offered to accept the command of all the military forces, the question was at rest. I must also state, that General Gérard immediately declared, that from this moment, he should be happy to serve under the orders of Lafayette: it was agreed that the direction of the active operations should be immediately confided to him.

Lafayette requested that a civil commission, composed of deputies, should be formed, but he declined the honour of naming them himself. His colleagues then appointed MM. Mauguin, Lafayette, de Schoen, Audry de Puyraveau, Lobau, and Casimir Perier, as Municipal Commissioners, entrusted with the direction of general affairs.

The Louvre and the Tuileries had just been carried, after an obstinate resistance on the part of the guard and the Swiss, and prodigies of valour on the side of the people. This people, still the same, walked as conquerors, through the palace of kings, and there, as at M. Lafayette's, at the Hotel-de-Ville, as at Saint Cloud, in every place, it was a Spartan army in the palace of Xerxes. As the price of their victory this people only wished to place a corpse upon the throne of Charles X; not the smallest article was abstracted from this splendid habitation. At another point, the fifth and fifty-third regiments of the line, prevailed upon by the entreaties of one of M. Lafayette's brothers, who had the boldness to throw himself into the midst of the soldiers, had just detached themselves from the royal troops and returned to their barracks, on condition of keeping their arms, and that they should not be compelled to fight against their comrades.

The combat no longer continued except against the guard and the Swiss, who were retreating in every direction, when this meeting of the 29th terminated; it was then that Lafayette, honoured with the confidence of the people and the approbation of his colleagues, proceeded to the Hotel-de-Ville. This march, half triumphal, half warlike, presented a superb spectacle. Imagine an immense crowd of citizens armed, or without arms, pressing to their breasts the veteran of liberty; the mingled shouts of Vive la nation! Vive Lafayette! the noise of numerous partial combats which were still taking place at the barricades, in the streets, in the houses; hear the acclamations of a people abandoned for three days to their own direction, and now seeing a generalissimo who reminds them of fifty years of combats in favour of liberty; five hundred thousand men, women, and children lining the streets, leaning from the windows, standing upon the roofs, waving their handkerchiefs, and making the capital resound with shouts of happiness and hope; imagine all this, and you will have but a faint idea of the popular excitement which greeted the passage of Lafayette.

When the procession, slowly advancing in the midst of these dense crowds, had arrived in the Rue aux Fers, a shower of tricoloured ribbons entirely covered the party that surrounded Lafayette. The general immediately mounted the three colours, and all those who could obtain a portion of the patriotic gift followed his example. At the Grève, the people presented some wounded persons to Lafayette, and he pressed them to his bosom. Having, at length, arrived at the Hotel-de-Ville, where he was received by General Dubourg, who had taken possession, and by Colonel Zimmer, who had already organised a staff, his first care was to hoist the tricoloured flag upon the tower of that ancient edifice, and the following proclamation was placed upon the walls of the capital:—

"My dear fellow-citizens and brave comrades, "The confidence of the people of Paris calls me once more to the command of the public force. With joy and confidence I have accepted the power that has been entrusted to me, and now, as in 1789, I feel myself strong in the approbation of my honourable colleagues, now assembled in Paris. I shall make no profession of faith; my opinions are known. The conduct of the Parisian population, during these last days of trial, renders me more than ever proud of being at its head.

"Liberty shall triumph, or we will perish together. "Vive la liberté! Vive la patrie!"

"LAFAYETTE."

Lafayette was now within the walls of that same Hotel-de-Ville, where, forty years before, another generation had placed him at the head of the revolution of 1789. Some one wishing to show him the way; "I know all about the place," he said, with a smile, and continued to ascend the great staircase. What a picture these new head-quarters of liberty presented! What mighty recollections were intermingled with others yet more grand! Those immense halls, filled with crowds of citizens, of every class, of every age; those combatants, intoxicated by victory, interesting by their wounds; those hangings covered with fleur-de-lis, coolly torn to pieces; the bust of Louis XVII. thrown upon the floor; that of Charles X. dashed to atoms; those citizen soldiers arriving from all sides to announce the defeat of the enemies of liberty, the carrying of the Louvre, the Tuileries, and the barracks of Babylon, bringing the colours and dragging along the cannon which they had forcibly taken from the soldiers of Charles X.; orders dictated in haste, and despatched in every direction; to pursue and harass the royalists in their retreat; those guards with naked arms; military posts forming at every point: the Place de Grève covered with ammunition wagons and broken arms; the whole Polytechnic school in battle array; elsewhere pious hands already digging the grave of the heroes of liberty; in short, this compound of a popular tumult and a real battle against experienced troops and generals, resolving itself into a multitude of attacks of posts and partial successes; all this, red and vivid and animated by the consciousness of a great triumph, presented a spectacle worthy the pen of a Tacitus or a Salust.

The commission arrived at the Hotel-de-Ville, and occupied themselves about the most pressing wants of the service, while Generals Gérard and Pajol were in-

* It was a boy of sixteen, armed with a double-barrelled gun and a pair of pistols, that first opened the gates of the Louvre to the people.

Another boy of the same age, a pupil of the Orphan Hospital, named Pierre-Charles Ponce-Pere, was the first to scale, in spite of the fire of the royal guards and the Swiss, another of the iron gates of the Louvre.

Near him another young man, of eighteen, named Charles Bonaparte, a bachelier of Rennes, in the department of the Ardennes, climbed upon the colonnade, armed with pistols without loading (for his powder was expended) to plant there the tricoloured flag. Five Swiss men passed him, and wounded him with their bayonets, but did not molest him killing him.

The loss of the royal troops could never be exactly estimated. That of the patriots amounted to about six thousand; of whom from a thousand to twelve hundred were killed, and the rest wounded.

speaking the different points of defence, as a general and decisive attack from the enemy was still expected. And such, indeed, was the intention of the court, whose columns began to move, and they only abandoned this new attack on observing the measures taken by the people to give them a warm reception. In the night between Thursday and Friday, the bivouacs of the people were again disturbed by the appearance of some troops; but fighting had ceased in Paris; and hostilities were only continued, and that but faintly, in the Bois de Boulogne and on the line of retreat of the royal troops, which were concentrating at Saint-Cloud.

One of the first cares of Lafayette was then to address a proclamation to the army, in order to tranquillise it respecting the feelings entertained towards it by the nation.

Thus ended the active operations within the circuit of the capital. I now return to the Hotel-de-Ville.

CHAPTER V.

The Orleanist party—M. La Fayette is at the head—His efforts during three years to place the Duke of Orleans on the throne—His secret communications with Neully, on the night of Tuesday and on the following days—The Duke of Orleans passes the night in a summer house (kiosque) in his park to avoid being murdered—Arrival of the envoys of Charles X. at the Hotel-de-Ville and at La Fayette's meeting—in what manner they are received—The Friday meeting at M. La Fayette's—Presence of some deputies—Deputies assemble at the Palais-Bourbon—They invite the Duke of Orleans to become Lieutenant-general—He does not accept their offer until after privately consulting Prince Talleyrand—Anecdote.

The only real government was at the Hotel-de-Ville, the only lever which could work, the only authority that possessed the confidence of the people, the only one that could settle society, shaken to its very foundations. The combat was over, and it was now only necessary to consolidate the victory, were the victors robbed of its fruits? My readers will decide; I do not determine; I relate events. But, in order to understand subsequent occurrences, it is indispensable to return for a moment to the preceding days.

On the first appearance of the ordinances, some persons devoted for many years to the interests of the House of Orleans, had conceived the project of overturning the elder branch by means of the younger, and all their actions during the three days' struggle tended to that result. This termination was more particularly the ruling view of M. La Fayette. The Duke of Orleans was at Neully, between the court, which committed an error in not summoning him to Saint Cloud, and Paris, to the insurrection of which he was a complete stranger. As early as Wednesday, at eight o'clock in the morning, M. La Fayette, who had only arrived a few hours before, sent for the secretary of the Duchesse of Orleans, M. Audart, desired of him to proceed to Neully to inform the prince of the meeting of the deputies which was to take place at noon, in the house of M. Armand de Puyraube, and to supplicate the royal highness to be on his guard against the attempts of assassins. This overture, which undoubtedly did not confine itself to simply prudential advice, was made on the Wednesday morning, at a time when nothing had yet been decided: his highness reflected, but gave only slight utterance to his thoughts. The Duke of Orleans, however, was alive to the tender solicitude of M. La Fayette, and merely through condescension to his banker, he put himself to the inconvenience of passing a whole night in a summer house (kiosque) in a retired part of his park, and around which vigilant and faithful friends were watching. On the Thursday morning, M. La Fayette again sent M. Audart to Neully; his advice was of a more pressing nature; he informed the prince of what had taken place at the meetings of the previous day, of the exasperation of the people against the elder branch, of the development of events, of the momentous state of affairs, and the necessity that the Duke of Orleans should make up his mind, within twenty-four hours, either to wear a crown, or receive a passport.

It is said, that he said, that his royal highness no longer hesitated, but explained himself this time in such a manner as to convince his partisans of his determination to make the very cruel sacrifices which he required of his patriotism; in fine, the die was cast, and the Duke of Orleans condemned himself to place upon his citizen head that crown of thorns to which, as every one knows, he had never raised his ambition. Thus M. La Fayette, who had exchanged several messages with the Duke of Orleans in the course of Wednesday and on the Thursday morning, had already adroitly prepared the minds of the deputies and some members of the provisional government in favour of the lieutenant-general of the Duke of Orleans, at the time when Lafayette and the municipal commission established themselves in the Hotel-de-Ville.

While the military chiefs were taking measures to consolidate the victory gained by the people alone, and the municipal commission and the commissaries charged with the different departments were recognising the general service, a small portion of the Chamber of Deputies, assembled at M. La Fayette's, was occupied in settling the new order of things. A deputation composed of MM. d'Argout, Semouville, and Vitrolles, had presented itself at the Hotel-de-Ville, to treat in the name of Charles X. and announce to the commission the revocation of the ordinances and the appointment of a new ministry, of which MM. Casimir Perier and Gérard formed a part. These envoys were introduced to the municipal commission, and Lafayette was requested to be present. The answer was not delayed: the people had fought to the cry of Down with the Bourbons! it was now too late; those Bourbons had ceased to reign. This is what M. La Fayette, Audry de Puyraube, and Mauguin declared in a formal manner to the ambassadors from Saint Cloud, in the presence of M. Perier, who remained silent. The royal commissioners were going to retire, when M. de Semouville, having addressed Lafayette, the latter asked him if the Bourbons had adopted the tricoloured cockade; and upon his answering that it was an insignificant step, the general replied, that if they felt any reluctance they might dispense with so doing, as it was now too late; or that all was over.

On the following day, M. de Sussy, bearing a letter from M. de Mortemart, Charles the Tenth's newly appointed prime minister, together with the revocation of the ordinances, found Lafayette surrounded by his officers and crowd of citizens. "We may put ourselves quite at ease," said he to M. de Sussy, "I am here with my friends, from whom I have no secrets;" and opening the packet, the contents of which he read aloud: "Well," said he to the people, "what answer shall we give?" "No more transactions with them," was the cry on all sides! "You hear," continued Lafayette; "it is too late." Shortly after, a flag a truce in the patriot cause, who had been sent to the regiments that defended the court, had returned to say, that the commander of the royal troops at the bridge of Saint Cloud, complained that no explanation had been entered into since the revocation of the ordinances, and demanded a categorical answer. Lafayette instantly sent him back with a note couched in these terms:

"I am asked for an explicit answer respecting the situation of the royal family since its last attack upon the public liberty, and the victory of the Parisians; and I will give it frankly; it is, that all reconciliation is impossible, and that the royal family has ceased to reign."

"LAFAYETTE."

Seeing that their proposals had been resolutely rejected by the men of the Hotel-de-Ville, the commissioners of Charles X. had hoped to meet with a more favourable reception at M. La Fayette's. On the 9th, at ten o'clock in the evening, M. d'Argout had presented himself to the members of the Chamber who were assembled at that house, and had declared to them, that he came in the name of the king, his master, to announce to them the revocation of the ordinances, and the formation of a ministry composed of persons well known and acceptable to the country; that things being now brought back to the state where the violation of the charter had forced them, Charles X. did not doubt that the national representation would mediate, in order to place the people again under his authority. The answer of M. La Fayette was as peremptory as that of Lafayette at the Hotel-de-Ville had been: "War has settled the affair," said he, to M. d'Argout; "Charles X. is no longer king of France." M. d'Argout withdrew after in vain insisting upon the guarantees of inviolability with which, in his opinion, the constitutional order still environed the king's person. A few minutes after, M. Forbin-Janson, came to announce that his brother-in-law, the Duke de Mortemart, requested a safe-conduct in order to appear before the meeting of deputies. This demand was complied with, and M. La Fayette alone remained charged to answer the overtures of the new president of the council of Charles the Tenth's ministers; but M. de Mortemart did not make his appearance.

From this moment, the cause of the elder branch of the Bourbons was irrevocably lost, not only by the will of the people, but moreover by the determination of the two centres of action that had taken possession of and directed the movement. The Hotel-de-Ville and the La Fayette meeting agreed as to the definitive expulsion of the reigning family, but not so as regarded the form of government hereafter to be adopted, nor as to the new dynasty to be elected. These vital questions were warmly debated at the Hotel-de-Ville, while, at M. La Fayette's, the deputies were almost unanimous for choosing the Duke of Orleans; or rather for procuring that choice, already prepared by the efforts and secret manœuvres of the honourable banker.

Before I return to Lafayette and to the municipal commission, I must relate what had taken place at M. La Fayette's, in the interest of Louis Philippe. Already, on the Friday, at a very early hour, several intimate friends, such as MM. Thiers, Laroque, and Mignet, had repaired to his house to concert measures to ensure the success of this grand intrigue. It was there, even before the wishes of the deputies had been consulted, that a proclamation was drawn up, calling the Duke of Orleans to the lieutenant-general; there also the most proper means were determined upon to induce the influential journals to enter into this combination. This little comité of a new kind only left the saloons of M. La Fayette, in order to work upon a meeting of patriots assembled at the restaurateur, Lointier's, and in which the general opinion that prevailed was, that as the people alone had conquered, the people ought to be consulted of all.

About ten o'clock, almost all the deputies present in Paris assembled at M. La Fayette's, some peers also repaired thither; among them was the Duke de Broglie, who spoke at great length upon the excited feelings of the people, and the dangers of a republic. These dangers, intentionally exaggerated by M. Dupin, produced general anxiety, of which M. La Fayette skillfully took advantage, in order to propose the election of the Duke of Orleans, as the only means of settling uncertainties, and arresting the torrent. This opinion expressed for the first time in an official manner, produced some astonishment, and met with opposition; but M. Dupin supported it with so much eloquence and energy, that from this moment it became evident that the measure which had the appearance of being merely deliberated upon, was nothing less than a plan already settled between the prince and a party at the head of which M. La Fayette had placed himself. Nevertheless, much indecision still prevailed, and the discussion was becoming more animated, when the dexterous champion of the house of Orleans observed, in a solemn manner, that the proper place for the deputies of France, reconstituting the government of a great empire, was the Palais-Bourbon, and not the cabinet of a private individual. This advice prevailed; it was settled that in two hours they should meet in their ordinary place of sitting, and the Orleanists took advantage of this interval to redouble their efforts and bribes.

However on the opening of this memorable sitting, opinions appeared more divided than ever; every system, with the exception of a republic, found partisans; they spoke, by turns, of the Duke of Orleans, the Duke de Broglie, the Duke of Angoulême, and even of Charles X., who, incredible as it may seem, still had a violent minority in his favour. It was this decisive moment that M. Sebastiani was heard to exclaim, speaking of the tricoloured flag that had been hoisted at the Hotel-de-Ville: "The only national flag at this time is the white flag!"

It was also upon this occasion that M. de Sussy, unsuccessful at the Hotel-de-Ville, came to present to the Chamber the revocation of the ordinances and the formation of a new ministry, insisting, but to no purpose, as it may be supposed, upon M. La Fayette's delivering these appointments to those for whom they were intended. The principal object of this meeting was to pass the declaration which was to call the Duke of Orleans to the lieutenant-general of the kingdom. A committee had been appointed to present a report to the Chamber upon this important measure, and they had added to their number several members of the Chamber of Peers, among whom was the Duke de Broglie. A warm discussion arose in this committee, composed of deputies and peers, as to the principle upon which the throne was to be declared vacant; the peers insisted that it was insisted upon the absolute necessity of taking as an exclusive basis the abdication of Charles X., and the renunciation of the Duke of Angoulême.

Violent agitation prevailed without as well as within the Chamber. New machinations, darkly preparing, were rumoured about, in order to make the Chamber postpone its decision; it was asserted that an important personage, recently raised by Charles X. to the presidency of the council of ministers, had been met upon the road to Saint Cloud; and indeed this report had been confirmed at the Hotel-de-Ville, by different patriots, upon whose depositions a warrant was issued against M. Casimir Perier. Whatever may be the truth of this circumstance, general uneasiness prevailed, when the President of the Chamber, M. La Fayette, informed of what was taking place in the Commission, and yielding to the public impatience, sent a secretary to invite them to repair immediately to the meeting, informing them that if they deferred any longer, the deputies would commence the deliberations without them. This bold and skilful measure put an end to the importunities of the legitimists, and to the uncertainty of the apprehensive. The proclamation was determined upon, exactly as it appeared in the Moniteur of the following day.

M. de Mortemart, with whom an appointment had been made to repair to the Chamber, did not come. The parliamentary mind was, however, so much disposed to Calism, that it may be inferred, had this deputy been present, he could still have drawn a majority into a determination that would have destroyed for ever the Chamber or the revolution. The address, however, of the deputies, calling the Duke of Orleans to the lieutenant-general of the kingdom, was signed, and the victory remained to that prince.

A deputation was appointed to present this message to the Duke of Orleans. It repaired to the Palais-Royal about eight o'clock in the evening: the prince was still at Neuilly. The deputation wrote to him, informing him of the mission with which they were entrusted, and communicating to him the decision which the deputies had just come to. His royal highness immediately proceeded on foot to Paris, where he arrived at eleven o'clock, accompanied by Colonel Berthois, now aide-de-camp to his majesty. At eight o'clock the following morning, the deputation were informed that the prince was ready to receive them. At nine they were admitted into his presence. They were MM. Gallot, Berard, Sebastiani, Benjamin Delessert, Duchaffau, and Mathieu Dumas.

I must call the attention of my readers to all the circumstances of this interview, because they are of undoubted authenticity, and of a nature to throw a strong light upon subsequent events.

M. Berard addressed him, and developed, at full length, the motives of general interest as concerned the nation, and of private interest with regard to the prince, which, according to the orator, made it imperative on the Duke of Orleans to accept the reins of government, under the provisional title of Lieutenant-general of the Kingdom.

M. Sebastiani maintained a different opinion, and taking for his argument the respect due to legitimacy, the precarious state of affairs, and the possible event of the return of the royal family, he asserted that the Duke of Orleans ought to decline, without hesitation, the offer that was made him. M. Benjamin Delessert, adopting the opinion of M. Berard, whose arguments he enforced by entreaties, conjured the prince to save France from the anarchy and civil war with which she was threatened, and his own family from the imminent ruin which his refusal would not fail to produce. Never had M. Delessert spoken with so much conviction and persuasion.

Hesitating, and evidently overpowered by fear and by hope, the Duke of Orleans spoke, at great length, of his family connections with Charles X. He wound up his speech by saying, that he could come to no determination until he had consulted a person who was not at hand; and his royal highness went into his cabinet, where M. Dupin already was, and whither M. Sebastiani was soon summoned. Who was this personage by whose great wisdom the destinies of France were to be saved? It was M. de Talleyrand.

Accordingly, M. Sebastiani repaired secretly to the ex-grand-chamberlain of Charles X., become, as is here seen, the sovereign arbiter of the July revolution. There also he found a brave admiral, of whose royalist sentiments there was no doubt, but whose heart, nevertheless, bled at the sufferings of his country. M. Sebastiani presented the declaration of the deputies to M. de Talleyrand, who answered, "It is well; it must be accepted;" and the Duke of Orleans accepted accordingly. These facts, I repeat it, are here given with rigorous exactness.

Now, let these early private understandings be considered in conjunction with the motives which afterwards determined M. Lafitte to resign; and a key, will, perhaps, be found to many things over which there has hitherto hung an impenetrable mystery.* At all events, after an interval of three quarters of an hour, the Duke of Orleans, attended by Messieurs Sebastiani and Dupin, returned to the deputation, and declared that he accepted the lieutenant-general.

CHAPTER VI.

Repugnance of the Hotel-de-Ville to the nomination of the Duke of Orleans to the lieutenant-general—Lafayette's advice upon this occasion—His wish that the primary assemblies should be convened—His reasons for not proclaiming a republic—For rejecting Henry V. with a regency, which was offered him—For rejecting Napoleon II.—Correspondence between Joseph Bonaparte and Lafayette.

And now what was taking place at the Hotel-de-Ville? There, the men who had just made the revolution, and particularly the young men, who still had arms in their hands, loudly demanded a republic, with Lafayette for its president. Numerous bodies of patriots pressed him to seize upon power before the intrigue, which they saw at work, should have laid hold upon it. But, although touched with gratitude, Lafayette nevertheless persisted in his adherence to those principles of disinterestedness which had been the rule of his political life; he repelled in an affectionate but determined manner the solicitations which met him on all sides. I even remember that amidst the throngs which successively surrounded him, and the contradictory offers that were made him, some men, less republican than the worthy general, came and said to him, "Well, if we must have a king, why not you?" "I will answer you," returned Lafayette, "in the words of the Marshal de Saxe, when it was proposed to him to become a member of the French academy—'That would sit as well upon me as a ring upon a cat's paw.'"

Lafayette's explicit wish, that which he had repeatedly expressed, was for the appointment of a provisional government until the primary assemblies should have been convened, agreeably to the form indicated by the Constituent Assembly, and the nation should have declared its will as to the form of government it considered suitable for it, and as to the dynasty to be founded—in the event, he it well understood, that that will should be pronounced in favour of the monarchical system. But such was not the opinion of the deputies; and it must here be borne in mind that they represented eighty thousand of the most respectable class of citizens in the country, and that the fixed principles of Lafayette imposed the obligation upon him to bow with deference before this national representation, however incomplete and vicious it might otherwise appear in his eyes; neither ought the electoral events which had preceded by a few days only the revolution of July, to be overlooked.

The press, the patriotic societies, all the liberals in short, had united and directed their efforts towards one end, and the re-election of the two hundred and twenty-one who had voted the address. The fate of France seemed to depend on this result; and to attain it, these principle-men had in some sort been deified, without, however, overrating the intrinsic civism of a great many of them: it was an urgent necessity of the time; but this necessity had acquired for the re-elected an unlimited confidence, the feeling of which powerfully swayed the public mind at the moment the ordinances appeared. The whole of France was then in a manner under the spell of the enthusiasm excited by the election proceedings. Now, the two hundred and twenty-one, themselves the objects of that enthusiasm, which was still at its height, would have neither the provisional government nor the primitive assemblies called for by the wishes of Lafayette.

What was to be done? was he to disavow the authority, at least the moral authority, of the Chamber, and come to a rupture with it? But, in the general disposition of men's minds, would not this have exposed him to quarrel with the greater number of the departments, and to see perhaps the revolution limited to Paris? Reject to-day, as unworthy, those very men who but yesterday had been borne triumphantly on the shield of liberty as her firmest supporters! In acting thus, who would not have dreaded to appear as insulting the national understanding, as separating the cause of the provinces from that of the capital, and as provoking a civil war which might then have smothered the revolution in its cradle?

These paramount considerations the patriots too frequently lose sight of, when, judging from after events, and without recurring to original circumstances, they blame Lafayette for having remained faithful to his political creed, in not forcibly overcoming the resistance of a Chamber in which, in the absence of all other national representation, he beheld the chosen of the people. A minister of Charles X. had asked for a monarchical 5th of September. Well then! to have tramped on the will of the Chamber of Deputies, in the crisis into which the country had been so unexpectedly plunged, would have been considered by France as a republican 25th of July. And who, at the time, would not have shrunk from the possible consequences of a national reaction? Doubtless, the people had been robbed of the fruits of their victory by intrigue; but that intrigue was clothed in the senatorial gown, and it was not for the sword of Lafayette to attack it in the very sanctuary of the national representation.

Besides, it is true, that, considering the lieutenant-general of the Duke of Orleans as merely a form of government essentially provisional, this choice was more satisfactory to Lafayette than any other. Indeed, when interrogated as early as the Friday morning, by the friends of his royal highness, he had told them that, without knowing much of that prince, he esteemed his personal character, and the simplicity of his manners; that he had witnessed his ardent patriotism in his youth; that he had found him a man of great understanding; and that these considerations sufficed to induce him to offer no opposition to his being entrusted with the lieutenant-general.

Independently of this arrangement, there were three other alternatives; a republic; Henry V. with a regency; and Napoleon II. or a regency in his name. These three systems had each its partisans, and here it is proper to reply with candour to the reproaches with which they have all assailed Lafayette.

It is certain, and Louis Philippe himself then acknowledged it, that the republic, which engrosses all the affections of Lafayette, was essentially the best form of government to be adopted. But, in the circumstances of the country, was it possible to overlook the force of the painful impression which the word republic had left in France, and the dread which that name still inspired in the contemporaries of the reign of terror, and in the sons of the numerous victims who had perished under it? Fatal recollections of every kind. They saw, doubtless, that it was not the republic which they were ready to avow of those revolutionary tribunals, in which counsel were forbidden to defend, and in which a jury, self-styled republican, composed of thirty, forty, and then of sixty, judicial murderers, made the guillotine stream with blood, amidst cries of Vive la Liberté! and sent indiscriminately to the scaffold all that was conspicuous for merit, for talents, for services performed, or even for beauty; for beauty itself was then a title to proscriptions. The republican marriages of Nantes were not forgotten; the horrors of famine, bankruptcy, the maximum, the mutual denunciations, the confiscations, and those frightful days, when terrorism, in a state of madness, had established it as a principle of government, that the tree of liberty ought to be watered with blood, and that money must be coined on the Place de la Révolution. These reminiscences of an epoch too near our own times, terrified many minds, which reflected not that almost all these horrors were committed by the counter-revolutionists, and at the instigation of foreigners, to pollute the sacred names of Liberty and Equality, and which, as we remembered, too, that even under the Republic, when brought back to better principles by the constitution of the year III., and likewise under the Directory, France had still groined under many acts of violence, dilapidations, and corruptions; and that, in short, the country had been reduced to consider the transaction of the 18th Brumaire as the only means of preventing the return of Jacobin terrorism. Such, it must be confessed with pain, were the events which, giving rise to a prejudice as ridiculous as it was unjust, and to a lamentable confounding of the Republic with the excesses to which it had served as a pretext, had left in men's breasts a decided aversion for that denomination of government. It was useless to urge that it, in ancient times, and more recently in France, in Venice, and in Genoa, the term republic had denoted ideas of terror, and even of slavery, it was quite otherwise when applied to the American states, where, on the contrary, it expresses principles, and established facts, diametrically opposite to the foregoing recollections. But the prejudice was, it is true, prevalent; and it is undeniable, that with the exception of a very few old republicans, and of a great many young men, who, though enamoured of that form of government, had not yet perhaps very settled notions as to the democratic arrangements that would suit them—it is, I say, undeniable, that with few exceptions beyond these, the proclaiming of a republic would have given rise to almost universal alarm and opposition in France. And again, would the army have been as favourably disposed for a republic, as for a prince raised to the throne by the voice of the Chamber of Deputies? I think not.

* This was the term given to the 4 owners of Nantes, which consisted in binding together a man and a woman, and then precipitating them into the waves, by means of a vessel with a valve in its bottom.

Next came to be considered Henry V., with a regency. Placed as I was, fortunately, about Lafayette's person, and honoured with his confidence in these trying moments, I can affirm that to the last instant, and even while the deputies were deliberating on the lieutenant-general, proposals were made him on that subject; and that the regency was repeatedly offered to him. But it was evident the Carlist party, both clergy and nobility, sought in this arrangement a truce only, as a medium through which to return again to another state of things. Besides, the principle of legitimacy would have ill accorded with republican institutions: the answer of Lafayette was as it ought to be.

And finally, there was a third alternative, which consisted in calling to the throne Napoleon II., or constituting a regency in the name of that young Austrian prince.

On this subject I cannot better unfold the motives that swayed Lafayette, than by producing the letter which he wrote to the Count de Surville, Joseph Bonaparte, in answer to an overture which that prince made him on behalf of his nephew. I ask pardon of the noble general for having availed myself of my situation about his person, to copy these important documents; which, however, I should have abstained from publishing, if the letter to which his was in reply had not been inserted in an American journal, by the special care of Prince Joseph himself. At all events, I offer these papers to the partisans of the Napoleon dynasty, as the apology for the conduct observed by Lafayette in regard to them, and as the expression of his individual sentiments towards that imperial family, between whom and himself there has always existed, and still exists, an interchange of kindnesses. But how was it to be expected that he, who in the course of a long life had sacrificed his dearest affections to his political duties, should in this instance allow private considerations to outweigh that which he deemed necessary for securing the liberty and happiness of France! [Here follows the correspondence which has already appeared in almost every newspaper in the Union.]

CHAPTER VII.

Lafayette takes two great measures.—The Hotel-de-Ville and the Chamber of Deputies on the 2d of August.—Lafayette insists that every thing shall remain in a provisional state.—Order of the day.—Visit of the Duke of Orleans to the Hotel-de-Ville.—Opposition to the Lieutenant-general.—Lafayette's edicts to suppress this opposition.—The popular throne and the republican institutions.—Charles X. seeks to re-tire into La Vendée.—Expulsion to Rambouillet.

Lafayette waited until the representatives of the country should take that first step, in the name of the people, which none but they had a right to take. His accession to power, however, was marked by two great measures, which France would most certainly not have obtained either from the government or the legislature, had they been submitted to their decisions. He hastened to proclaim, in a solemn manner, and as an absolute preliminary to every future arrangement, the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, which Napoleon and the Bourbons had placed, for thirty years, among the number of political chimeras, and even of wicked intentions. He laid down as a principle, and carried into effect, the arming of the whole nation, town and country, themselves appointing their officers; a principle which dated from 1789, but which the despotism of the last thirty-two years had also rejected as the most dangerous of institutions, the most incompatible with public order and the maintenance of power. The reception which the announcing of such doctrines had encountered in the Chamber whenever Lafayette ventured to profess them, had made him feel the necessity of establishing them as a right, and putting them in action before either the Chamber, or king, could have an opportunity of combating or modifying them. And, indeed, who can now doubt, had these two capital institutions been methodically submitted to the king's council, or to the deliberation of the legislature, but that they would have been mutilated? Is it not, above all, evident that a projet to compose the national guard of all the citizens, and to invest it with the right of choosing its own officers, would have been, without remorse, thrown out by passing to the order of the day? This is so true, that Lafayette often had to contend for the preservation of the principle which he had put in vigour, and that, upon one occasion, a short time after the first days of the revolution, he was obliged to contradict, by an order of the day, a publication of the government which tended to reduce the arming of the national guards to towns containing three thousand or more inhabitants.

I now return to what took place on the 2d of August, in the Chamber of Deputies and at the Hotel-de-Ville.

The members present in Paris had raised the Duke of Orleans to the lieutenant-general of the kingdom. A deputation of the Chamber repaired to the Hotel-de-Ville, to inform Lafayette of this legislative decision, to which he did not hesitate giving his assent, expressing, however, his perfect conviction that all that had taken place must only be provisional, and that nothing was yet definitive but the victory and sovereignty of the people. This opinion was distinctly repeated in an order of the day which he published on the 2d of August, and in which he said:

"In the glorious crisis in which Parisian energy has reconquered our rights, all yet remains provisional; there is nothing definitive but the sovereignty of those national rights and the eternal remembrance of the grand work of the people."

The proposal of the lieutenant-general had been transmitted to the Duke of Orleans on the Friday evening. The prince, on his return the same day to the Palais-Royal, hastened to send and compliment the Hotel-de-Ville and General Lafayette. On the Saturday morning he caused his visit to be announced to him.

Meanwhile the nomination of the Duke of Orleans had met with a strong opposition among the combatants of July. No complaints were made against this prince; but his being a Bourbon was a circumstance invincibly repugnant to the majority of the citizens who had shed their blood during the three days. This name excited his recollections and a violent irritation, when the lieutenant-general of the kingdom arrived at the Hotel-de-Ville, where he might hear a few shouts of Vive le Duc d'Orleans! drowned by the cries, a thousand times repeated, of Vive la Liberté! Vive Lafayette! This opposition was renewed yet more strongly the moment the prince entered the hall of the throne. Young men still covered with perspiration and dust, answered the cries of Vive le Duc d'Orleans! uttered by the deputies, with a very significant cry of Vive Lafayette! Proclamations which spoke of the prince with eulogy, had been torn down, and the agents who had placarded them had been seized and ill treated by the people. The Place of the Hotel-de-Ville was filled with an immense crowd, among whom a great many were heard to exclaim: No more Bourbons! The reception which Lafayette was about to give the lieutenant-general was impatiently expected; all eyes were turned towards these two personages: a deputy, M. Vinet, read the declaration of the Chamber, which excited no sensation; but when Lafayette, holding out his hand to the Duke of Orleans, delivered to him a tricoloured flag, and conducted him to one of the windows of the Hotel-de-Ville, the enthusiasm was renewed, and shouts less infrequent of Vive le Duc d'Orleans! mingled with universal cries of Vive Lafayette! Circumstances, however, were assuming a serious aspect: in the interior of the Hotel-de-Ville, and even under the eyes of the prince, discontent was expressed in unequivocal terms; General Dubourg, (since violently persecuted by the ministry of Louis Philippe,) opening a window and showing the people to his Royal Highness, even went so far as to say: "Monsieur, you know our wants and our rights; should you forget them, we will bring them to your recollection." In fine, it was to be feared that the people would resume their arms and again take possession of the field of battle.

Then did Lafayette make use of his all-powerful authority with the leaders of the insurrection, and obtain from them a promise that tranquillity should not be disturbed, engaging on his part to obtain from the new powers the guarantees which the revolution had the right to exact, and which he summed up in the words, a popular throne, surrounded with republican institutions; that is to say, the adoption of the fundamental doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, the abolition of the hereditary peerage, the abolition of the property qualification for deputies, the most extensive application of the broadest electoral principle to the municipal and communal organisation, the re-establishment of the national guard according to the principles of the constitution of 1791, and the suppression of monopolies contrary to the general interests of commerce and manufactures.

Lafayette, adopting these bases as the expression of his own opinions, went and presented them at the Palais-Royal, whence he returned with the assurance that such was also the settled opinion of the lieutenant-general. "You know," he had said to the Duke of Orleans, "that I am a republican, and that I consider the constitution of the United States as the most perfect that has ever existed."—"I think as you do," answered the Duke of Orleans; "it is impossible to have passed two years in America without being of that opinion; but do you think, in the situation of France, and according to general opinion, that it is proper for us to adopt it?"—"No," answered Lafayette; "what is at present necessary for the French people, is a popular throne surrounded with republican institutions."—"It is exactly so that I understand it," replied the prince.

All that was said upon this occasion by the prince and Lafayette, breathed the same republican opinions on the part of His Royal Highness, whose liberal professions even went beyond the hopes of him by whom he was addressed.

Lafayette hastened to make public the engagement which the lieutenant-general had entered into with him; and to use his own expressions, this engagement, which people will appreciate as they please, finally rolled around us both those who wished not for a monarch, and those who wished for any other except a Bourbon."

It is necessary, in the history of this revolution, here to point out one of the great avocations which must have prevented Lafayette from paying a very strict attention to the first steps of the new government and of the Chamber of Deputies. While, at his head quarters, they were incessantly occupied in restoring order in the capital, and organising extensive means of defence or attack, in the event of a prolonged resistance, the court and the royal army were retreating on Versailles and Rambouillet, where Charles X. had resolved to take up a position and defend himself. From this point the de-throned king hoped to raise La Vendée and the western departments, with which he had already opened a communication. Lafayette, foreseeing this manœuvre, hastened to form a corps of fifteen or twenty thousand volunteers, the command of which he entrusted to General Fajol, appointed Colonel Jacqueminot head of the staff, with his son George Lafayette as his aide-de-camp. This army, exhibiting so fantastic an appearance in its diversity of costumes and arms, in the number of omnibuses, fiacres, cabriolets, and vehicles of every kind, which were to accompany them to the field of battle; but at the same time so interesting by its ardour and patriotism; began its march to Versailles, after being reviewed by Lafayette in the Champs-Elysees. The previous day, a weak advanced guard, commanded by Colonel Poque, had been directed towards this point, in order to follow the enemy's movements, and to claim the crown jewels, which the royal family had carried off. This mission occasioned the exchange of some flags of truce, and it was while acting in this capacity that Colonel Poque, whose sacred character was so shamefully disregarded by a general now in active service, was fired at by a Swiss platoon; his horse was killed and this brave officer's foot was shattered. In the night after the departure of the patriot army, Lafayette received, at the Hotel-de-Ville, a visit from a general officer, who, having been at Rambouillet at the time when Charles X. was reviewing his troops, had availed himself of the opportunity to collect the most exact particulars respecting the strength of the royal army.

This army still consisted of forty pieces of cannon and twelve thousand effective men, including three fine cavalry regiments. Lafayette, without uneasiness at the thought that this artillery and cavalry, which he was informed were animated with the very worst spirit, might, in the plains of Rambouillet, attack the patriot forces with advantage, the formation of which had been so spontaneous and so incomplete. He immediately transmitted the accounts he had just received to General Pajol, directing him, in the event of an attack, to repair to the woods, where the volunteers would not fail to recover their superiority. Fortunately, the rapid and bold movement of the Parisian army had overawed the royal family, and the apprehended collision did not take place. [The three commissioners from the provisional government, MM. Maison, Odilon-Barrot, and Schœnen, arrived at Rambouillet, when it was agreed that the crown jewels should be restored, and that the royal family should withdraw by short stages towards Cherbourg, followed by such troops as chose to accompany them to the frontier.

* It has been falsely asserted that Lafayette, showing the Duke of Orleans to the people, had said: Behold the best of republics. Lafayette has explained his thoughts, and restored the sense of his expressions, in a letter addressed to General Bernard, which the latter published in the American journals. He said, speaking of the monarchy of July: This is what we have been able to make most like a republic, and not, Behold the best of republics.

I must state in this place, that when Lafayette declared that the general who had caused the flag of the Duke to be fired at should be brought to a court martial, Colonel Poque had the generosity to implore forgiveness for this Vandal, and even urged that his name should not be inserted in the order of the day.

This day presented an astonishing spectacle. On one side, a perjured king, who, after tearing to pieces the fundamental compact, proclaimed absolute power, caused his fellow countrymen to be fired upon and butchered during three days, ordered the very men in whose power he now found himself to be arrested and shot, was traversing France under the protection of three commissioners, wearing the tricoloured cockade, through a population still trembling with indignation, without, however, any demonstration of resentment, to insult such well deserved misfortune. On another side, fifteen or twenty thousand Parisian volunteers, returning to their homes, without marking the passage by a single excess. Again were to be seen the state carriages covered with cushions, one drawn by eight horses, richly caparisoned, crowded inside and out with patriots laughing aloud to find themselves seated upon the cushions of royalty, yet even respecting these remains of chastised vanity.

The following is the order of the day published by Lafayette, at the termination of this adventurous expedition:—

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE FIFTH OF AUGUST.

"So many prodigies have marked the last week, that when acts of courage and devotedness are required, we can henceforward be astonished at nothing. The general in chief, however, thinks it his duty to express the public gratitude, and his own, for the promptitude and zeal with which the national guard and the volunteer corps rushed along the road to Rambouillet, to put an end to the last resistance of the ex-royal family. He likewise owes thanks to the brave men of Rouen, Louviers, and Elbeuf, who, coming to fraternise with us, thought they could not better fulfil that object than by joining the expeditionary army under the orders of General Fajol and Colonel Jaquemiot.

"In the midst of the services rendered to the country by the Parisian people and the young men of the schools, there is no good citizen who is not penetrated with admiration, with confidence, I will even say with reverence, at the sight of that glorious uniform of the Polytechnic school, which in that critical moment made each individual so powerful for the conquest of liberty, and the preservation of public order. The general in chief requests the students of the Polytechnic school to name one of their comrades to remain with him as one of his aides-de-camp.

"Colonel Poque, aide-de-camp to the general in chief, had been sent four days before by the provisional commission, and by himself, to follow the movement of the royal troops, and fulfil a mission of patriotism and generosity. It was while waiting the return of a flag of truce, that he was fired upon and severely wounded. A strict enquiry will take place respecting this outrage. The general in chief confides himself at this moment to making known the intrepid, able, and generous conduct of Colonel Poque, and rendering justice to young M. Dubois, who evinced, upon that occasion, remarkable ability and courage, as well as to the brave brigadier of euirassiers, Pradier, and some others, who were near the colonel.

The brave volunteers who, under the orders of their intrepid chief, Joubert, accomplished so much, during the three grand days, have again distinguished themselves under the orders of the same chief, truly worthy to command them, by their zeal in the expedition to Rambouillet.

"Our brethren in arms from the patriotic town of Havre had also marched to assist us; they yesterday entered the capital to fraternise with us.

"LAFAYETTE."

CHAPTER VIII.

A fresh irritation is manifested in Paris.—Opening of the session of 1830.—Lafayette saves the Chamber.—His moral influence gives umbrage to the new power.—He declares against the hereditary peerage.—Particular respecting the Berard Charter.—It is determined that the vacancy of the throne shall be based upon the abdication of Charles X. and the Dauphin.—Private document and curious particulars on that subject.

During the expedition to Rambouillet a fresh irritation was manifested in Paris. The Charter, modified by M. Berard, was known. This bill formed plan of a constitution, remodelled upon the system which had just been destroyed, was far from fulfilling the expectations of the revolution, as it sanctioned the principal abuses of that system, and repudiated every idea of national consent. There was, moreover, some intention of voting the peerage hereditary; general indignation was manifested among the men of July; treason even was said to exist! It was the 3d of August, the day appointed by the government of Charles X. for the meeting of the Chambers. The deputies attached much importance to the circumstance of opening the Revolutionary session upon that day; it was opened in effect, and two sittings took place on the same day. That of the evening had scarcely commenced, when a tumultuous crowd presented itself at the doors of the Chamber, with a manifest intention of dissolving it by force; the exasperation of the young men was renewed with the violence that ever, the members who were entering the hall were assailed with most menacing reproaches; in fine, the tumult had reached its height when Lafayette arrived by the great court, situated at the extremity opposite to the scene of tumult. Finding the Chamber in great agitation, and preparing itself to resist courageously this violation of its liberty, he enquired where the disturbance existed, and presenting himself without delay to the assemblage which was making the air resound with its complaints and its cries:—"Friends," said he to the discontented, "it was my duty to take measures to protect the Chamber of Deputies against any attack directed against its independence; I have not done so, and I have been wrong. But I had not foreseen the violence, after all that has taken place during the revolution, which is exhibited this day. I have no force to oppose to you; but if the liberty of the Chamber is violated, the dishonour will fall upon me, who am entrusted with the maintenance of public order. I therefore place my honour in your hands, and I depend upon your union and friendship to prevent the Chamber from peacefully retiring." At these words the storm was calmed; and he exclaimed: "Well! let us retire! Vive Lafayette!" and the Chamber recovered the independence of its deliberations.

It was not, however, with impunity, that the voice of Lafayette alone could effect, in this critical moment, what all other united influences would have attempted in vain. This power of individual popularity, which was then extolled by high and by low, became the cause of the umbrage and ridiculous jealousy which broke out as soon as the dangers, with which the trial of the ministers menaced the new order of things, had passed away.

Before the public discussion of the new Charter, in the drawing up of which Lafayette had no share, some deputies had been sent for to the Palais-Royal to hear it read. MM. George Lafayette, Victor de Tracy, and Lafayette himself, were present. The reading was hastily gone through, and in order to prevent any observations, great care was taken to protect the Chamber from any interruption. Lafayette, however, was struck with the ambiguity and unclearness of the article relative to the abolition of the peerage, so strongly insisted upon by the Hotel-de-Ville. The composition was altered in the Chamber itself, on the requisition of some deputies, and in consequence of the severe language made use of by Lafayette from the tribune.

"Gentlemen," said he, "when I come to pronounce an opinion upon which many friends of liberty may differ, I shall not be suspected of being carried away by an ebullition of feeling, or a wish to court popularity, which I have never preferred to my duty. The republican opinions I have manifested at all times, and in the presence of all forms of sovereign power, have not prevented me from defending a constitutional throne; it is thus, gentlemen, that, in the present crisis, it has appeared proper for us to raise another national throne; and I must say, that my best wishes for the prince, the choice of whom now occupies you, have become stronger the more I have known him; but I shall differ from many of you on the question of the hereditary peerage. A disciple of the American school, I have always thought that the legislative body ought to be divided into two chambers, differently organised. But I have never understood how there could be hereditary legislators and judges. Aristocracy, gentlemen, is a bad ingredient in political institutions; I therefore express, as strongly as I can, my wish that the hereditary peerage should be abolished, and, at the same time, I beg my colleagues not to forget, that if I have always been the man of liberty, I have never ceased to be the man of public order."

These words were a death blow to the peerage. It is here the place to speak of the Berard Charter, respecting the origin of which so many conjectures have been formed. I am the more able to give an account of it, as, having been connected with its author, by formerly writing in the same paper, the Journal du Commerce, I was able during the memorable days to enrich my portfolio from the notes which he deposited in his own, and acquaint myself with every particular of his conduct in this affair.

People have been wrong in accusing M. Berard of accepting, upon this occasion, a part ready cast. The first idea of the important measure which he subsequently proposed, was entirely his own, and the following is the exact series of vicissitudes which the Charter experienced before it became the law of the state.

At ten o'clock on Wednesday evening, the 3d of August, M. Berard, discussing at M. Lafitte's, with MM. Etienne and Cauchois Lemaire, the danger of leaving any longer to ambitious persons the means of agitation, conceived and expressed the idea of putting an end to it, by proposing to the Chamber the formal deposition of Charles X., and the proclamation of the Duke of Orleans, upon conditions so strict and precise that it would be impossible for that prince to break through them. This proposal met with the approbation of the small number of patriots to whom it had just been communicated, and M. Berard returned home in order to draw up the proposition which follows:—

"A solemn compact united the French people to their monarch; that compact has just been broken. The prerogatives to which it had given birth have ceased to exist. The violator of the contract can have no title to demand its performance; Charles X. and his son in vain pretend to transmit a power they no longer possess; that power has been extinguished by the blood of some thousands of victims.

"The act you have just heard read * is a new instance of perfidy. The legal appearance with which it is invested is but a deception. It is a torch of discord they wish to hurl amongst us.

"The enemies of our country bestir themselves in every way; they assume every colour; they affect every opinion. If an anticipated desire of indefinite liberty takes possession of some generous minds, these enemies are eager to turn to advantage a sentiment into which they are incapable of entering. Ultra-republicans present themselves under the appearance of rigid republicans; others affect towards the son of the conqueror of Europe, a hypocritical attachment, which would soon be converted into hatred if it could be in serious contemplation to make him the chief of France.

"The inevitable instability of the present means of government, encourage the promoters of discord; let us put an end to it. A supreme law, that of necessity, has placed arms in the hands of the people of Paris in order to expel oppression. This law has made us adopt as a provisional chief, and as a means of safety, a prince sincerely friendly to constitutional institutions. The same law requires that we should adopt this prince as the definitive chief of our government.

"But whatever confidence we may repose in him, the rights which we are called upon to defend require that we should settle the conditions on which he is to obtain power. Having repeatedly been shamefully deceived, we may be allowed to call for strict guarantees. Our institutions are incomplete, and faulty in many respects; it is our duty to extend their limits and render them more perfect. The prince who is at our head has anticipated our just demands. The principles of several fundamental laws have been proposed by the Chamber and recognised by him. The re-establishment of the national guard with the power to appoint their own officers; the intervention of the citizens in the formation of the departmental and municipal administrations; triality jury for offences of the press; the responsibility of ministers and secondary agents of the administration; the state of the military legally fixed; the re-election of deputies who have accepted office; are already ensured to us. Public opinion, moreover, demands no longer an empty declaration of all religious worship, nor their absolute equality in the eye of the law; the expulsion of foreign troops from the national army; the abolition of the nobility, old and new; the proposing of new laws to belong to each of the three powers; the suppression of the double electoral vote; the age and the proper qualification of candidates reduced; in fine, the total reconstitution of the peerage, the fundamental bases of which have been successively vitiated by prevaricating ministers.

"Gentlemen, we are the elected of the people; to us they have entrusted the defence of their interests and the expression of their wants. Their first wants, their dearest interests, are liberty and tranquillity. They have coquetted liberty from the hands of tyranny; it is for us to ensure them tranquillity, and we can only do so by giving them a just and stable government. It was vain to assert that in acting thus, we shall lose our powers; I would answer this futile objection by the law which I have already invoked, that of impious and invincible necessity.

"On the faith of a strict and rigorous execution of the conditions just enumerated, which must, nevertheless, be stipulated and sworn to by the monarch, I propose to you, gentlemen, to proclaim immediately king of the French, the Prince Lieutenant-general, Philippe d'Orléans."

In the morning of the 4th of August, M. Bérard communicated this proposition to several deputies, amongst whom were MM. Dupont de l'Eure, at that time minister of justice, and Lafitte, who both promised to communicate it to the council. At noon M. Bérard repaired to the Chamber, where, before the opening of the sitting, he thought proper to mention his intentions to a great many of his colleagues, among whom it met with violent opposition. While this was going on, the provisional ministers arrived at the Palais-National, and assured M. Bérard that his plan had not with the approbation of the council; but that the Duke of Orleans particularly requested him to postpone the proposition, in order to be able to give it a still greater extension to the advantage of liberty! They added, that the prince had conceived the thought of immediately applying to the Charter the principles laid down in the proposition of M. Bérard, and that in the evening he would be called to the council, in order to discuss, with the members of the cabinet, the modifications it might be deemed proper to make in it. M. Bérard, however, was not sent for by the ministers, who excused themselves by saying, that the council had first wished to come to an agreement upon some points under discussion, in which they had not yet succeeded, but that he, M. Bérard, should certainly be called to the meeting of the evening. This second promise had the same fate as the first.

On Friday morning, the 5th of August, M. Bérard went to the house of M. Guizot, to whom he complained in bitter terms of the delay that his proposition had experienced and the improper treatment he had met with. He then that M. Guizot delivered to him, with visible embarrassment, a new composition, in the handwriting of the Duke de Broglie, drawn up according to the system of the doctrinaires, who had just seized upon power.

The following is the original text of this curious document, which I recommend to the attention of my readers, as typical of the opinion which then swayed and has ever since guided the policy of the men of the Restoration, in whom, in an unlucky moment, the revolution of July had the misfortune to confide.

It is there we must seek for the origin of that monstrous anomaly which M. Guizot soon dared to introduce among our laws, under the curious denomination of quasi-legitimacy.

"THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, TAKING INTO CONSIDERATION, &c.

"SEEING THE ACT OF ABDICATION OF HIS MAJESTY CHARLES X., UNDER THE DATE OF THE 20th OF AUGUST LAST, AND THE RENUNCIATION OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS LOUIS-ALEXIS, DAUPHIN, OF THE SAME DATE."

"CONSIDERING, MOREOVER, THAT H. M. CHARLES X., AND H. R. LOUIS-ALEXIS, DAUPHIN, AND ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE ELDER BRANCH OF THE ROYAL HOUSE, ARE AT THIS MOMENT LEAVING THE FRENCH TERRITORY;

"DECLARES, THAT THE THRONE IS VACANT, AND THAT IT IS INDISPENSABLY NECESSARY TO PROVIDE FOR THE OCCASION."

The qualification for a deputy at 1000 francs, and the qualification entailing a vote of 300 francs, were carefully preserved in this projet, which, moreover, made no modification in the composition of the Chamber of Peers. M. Guizot had only added, in his own handwriting, the following marginal note: "All appointments and new creations of peers made during the reign of H. M. Charles X. are declared null and void."

But what it is most important to remark in this composition, is the order of ideas in which the two directing ministers had already placed themselves. What did MM. de Broglie and Guizot mean to convey by the "considerings" introduced in their composition? In whose interest had they stipulated the abdication of Charles X., and the renunciation of the Dauphin, if it were not in favour of a third person, a minor? Indeed, the necessity of the abdication and the renunciation once recognised, the Duke of Bordeaux alone remained of right King of France. So, it was morally impossible to infer from these principles the kingship of Louis Philippe; and, in order not to be struck with the absurdity of this combination, it was necessary to give credit to the existence of a certain protest published in the English journals, on occasion of the birth of the Duke of Bordeaux, put forth again a few weeks after the events of July, and left without contradiction on the part of the Duke of Orleans, to whom it had been attributed. In any case, it was at least evident that the doctrinaire ministers wished, even then, to create for Louis Philippe a legitimate monarchy; an intention which sufficiently explains both the conduct of this first ministry, and that of the present cabinet, whose principles are exactly the same.

However, on receiving from the hands of M. Guizot the composition of M. de Broglie, M. Bérard declared that it expressed principles to which he could not subscribe, and announced his intention of modifying them. Time, however, was pressing; it was nine o'clock, and the Chamber were to assemble at noon to receive the communication of his proposition.

It was in this short space of time that he hurried through the compact destined to bind France to the servility of the barracks. Meeting M. Guizot at the foot of the tribune, "I have," said he, "altered a good deal of your work." "So much the worse," replied the doctrinaire: "you will never be forgotten for it." To every reflecting man, this phrase conveyed the whole system which is now being developed.

I seek not to be the apologist of M. Bérard's production; I have already said that it is only a clumsy assemblage of the most incoherent provisions. However, if on the one hand we reflect with what precipitation he was obliged to finish his composition, and if on the other his first work be compared with the proposition coming from so high a quarter and drawn up by MM. Guizot and de Broglie; if, moreover, the elements of which the Chamber was composed, be taken into consideration; the difficult situation of this honourable deputy will be easily conceived; and to circumstances, rather than to political convictions, the defects of the Charter of 1830 will probably be ascribed.

CHAPTER IX.

Vain expectations—Lafayette is opposed to the new King's taking the name of Philippe V.—Institution of Louis Philippe.—Why Lafayette accepts the command-in-chief of the national guards.—What he does for the first time—Review of the 24th of August, 1830.—It was then for Europe to ask peace, and for France to grant it.

The new charter, in the hurried manner in which it had been got up, was certainly not equal to what the victory demanded, nor at all equal to the expectations that so noble a triumph had raised. The distance was nevertheless great between the new constitution and the old charter—between the republican forms, which were still respected, and the servile forms of a court, which a few days before had weighed heavily upon France. The most ardent friends of the Revolution might still dream of justice, liberty, glory, a throne protecting the rights of the people, an indissoluble compact between the government and the nation. For myself, I confessed, I thought that the dreams of my youth were false; for it was to the sound of the "Marseillaise," and the "Marseillaise," performed under the very portico of the Chamber, that the lieutenant-general had just appeared for the first time in the midst of the national representation; and imagining that a time so long wished for was now at last, I thought I could exclaim with the old man, Simeon, "Nunc dimittis..." Alas!

It had been decided that the throne should be offered to the Duke of Orleans; that the new monarch should take the name of Philippe V. It was the first attempt of the counter-revolution to piece together again that chaîne des trons which the barricades had so rudely snapped asunder.

Lafayette opposed this denomination, which he said was unworthy of a republican monarchy, which ought to have nothing in common with the pretensions and barbarian tinsel of the ancient kings of France. Frankness, this time, had the advantage over the doctrinaire courtiers, and the Duke of Orleans wrote with his own hand these words in English: You have gained your point.

It was a fine spectacle to witness the institution of a king created by the people, entering into the sanctuary of the laws to the sound of the popular hymns of 1792, joined with the patriotic inspirations of 1830; sitting upon a simple tuburet, and waiting until the representatives of the nation should have given him permission to seat himself upon the throne. Who will ever forget it? The people were still then in all the dignity of their power, and never had the relations between the created and the creator been more religiously observed; cries of Vive le Duc d'Orléans! and not of Vive le Roi! resounded from the benches and other parts of the house: the president of the Chamber, M. Casimir Perier, reading the new Charter to the Duke of Orleans; the prince declaring that he accepted it; the honest Dupont de l'Eure presenting it to him for signature, and receiving his oath; a king standing and speaking to a people who were seated; and that king authorised, at length, to place himself upon the throne, where, for the first time, he is saluted with the title of monarch: such were the last homages paid to the sovereignty of the French people.

When the lieutenant general had arrived at the Hotel-de-Ville, his first care had been to press Lafayette to preserve the functions of commander-in-chief of the national guards of the kingdom. The prince reiterated this request at the moment he ascended the throne, adding that it was the most efficacious method, the only one, perhaps, of consolidating his work. Lafayette, thinking that circumstances indeed required that this command should remain in his hands, consented to keep it provisionally; although, as I have already said, he had refused it forty years before, as giving to one man an exorbitant and dangerous power.

This is the place to relate the services which Lafayette rendered his country during the short period that he held this vast command. At the name of their general, the national guards arose to life, and formed themselves as by enchantment. All his time was employed, all his anxiety was centred, in this national rearming, without which he always thought there never could exist a guarantee for liberty. A great part of his time was occupied in the immense correspondence which he hastened to establish between his head quarters and the staffs of all the national guards of the kingdom. He attached, in particular, much importance to the creation of a citizen artillery, of which a great many companies were already organised, and in possession of three hundred and fifty pieces, at the time of his resignation. Urged himself to appoint the commanders of the legions under his orders, as a nucleus to their subsequent organisation, yet faithful to the principles of 1791, he hastened to resign those appointments to the choice of the citizens as soon as circumstances permitted it. This right, essentially national, Lafayette afterwards defended against the opinion of the Commission who made it a prerogative of the crown; he also maintained at the tribune that the formation of canton battalions ought to be made a general and absolute principle, and not left dependent on the will of the king. Every week Lafayette assembled, at his head quarters, the colonels and the lieutenant colonels of the legions, the artillery, and the cavalry, in order to concert with them not only the means of bringing to perfection the organisation of the citizen army, but also the measures to be taken to maintain public order, and for the best distribution of the service.

His mornings were generally employed in receiving the numerous deputations of the national guards and municipalities of the departments, who flocked to him from all quarters, to pay him their respects and solicit arms, the delivering of which he was obliged to create him difficulties and contentions of which no other officers about him could form an idea. However, owing to the unlimited confidence reposed in him by the country, to his assiduous cares, to his patriotic firmness, and perhaps also to the government's fearing to resist him at the moment when the heir to the throne was coming to ask his permission to serve as a private artillery man in the national guard—owing to all this, France already numbered seventeen hundred thousand organised national guards, appointing their own officers, armed, and a great number equipped, full of ardour and patriotism.

Who is there that does not still feel a remaining degree of enthusiasm, in calling to mind the review of the 24th of August, at which sixty thousand national guards, organised, as it were by miracle, perfectly armed and equipped, came to the Champ-de-Mars to receive their colours from the hands of Louis Philippe, who then still thought it an honour to be only their first magistrate? How many guarantees! what glory! what liberty! how much prosperity this magnificent scene promised! Fifty-two battalions or squadrons of citizen soldiers, rivaling in appearance and military precision the old bands of the grand army, and saluted by the acclamations of three hundred thousand spectators; presented a yet more brilliant spectacle than that of the federation of 1790. It was then that Louis Philippe, having thrown himself into the arms of Lafayette, exclaiming, This I prefer to a coronation at Rheims, the troops and the people answered these salutations by a thousand shouts of Vive le Roi! Vive Lafayette! An interesting and grand union which appeared to have fixed the throne of Louis Philippe upon a rock. And that other review, a few weeks after, exhibited an assemblage of seventy thousand national guards under arms; and then, those twenty thousand men of the department of the Seine-et-Oise, when the king and Lafayette came to inspect at Versailles, all soldiers and citizens, all denouncing and inspiring confidence, who can ever forget them? with what certainty could not the throne of July have promised and commanded peace! Peace! it was for the kings of Europe to ask, and for Louis Philippe to grant it.

A fortnight after the fall of a perjured king, who butchered his people, an immense army had risen in favour of liberty, order and independence; and behind those civic phalanxes, one hundred thousand valiant working men, ready to save the country, as they had saved the capital; and in the remaining part of France, three millions of citizens vying with each other in organising themselves against the enemies of our independence, of liberty, and public order. Yet, this day ought to have terminated our long vicissitudes; the name of king had again become popular in France, through a prince who held out his hand to every citizen, and whom all interests hailed as their protector. Yes, on the 29th of August, one month after the expulsion of Charles X., the revolution, commenced forty years before, might have ended in establishing the principle of popular sovereignty and citizen monarchy; but they would not have it so: the revolution is again in labour; the crown and liberty are still fearful of each other; France does not rise in greatness; she is sinking into littleness.

Who, while reading the following documents, would not have believed in an indissoluble alliance between Louis Philippe and Lafayette?

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE 30TH OF AUGUST, 1830.

"The magnificent review of yesterday; the admirable appearance of the citizen army, the rapid formation of which is in harmony with the rapidity of the triumph of liberty; the manner in which the National Guard presented itself under arms and filed off before the king, excited the enthusiasm of the immense population which victory has long designated as the most competent military judges. The presence of our brave wounded men of the grand week, of a number of deputations from our fellow soldiers of the departments, completed the happiness of this memorable day. The general in chief confines himself, at present, in congratulating himself and his comrades of the Parisian national guard upon the superb and patriotic spectacle which it exhibited upon this memorable day. What expressions, moreover, could he find, after those of the speech delivered by the king in presenting us with the colours, and after the letter which he hastens to communicate to his fellow soldiers?"

SPEECH DELIVERED BY THE KING WHEN PRESENTING THE COLOURS.

"My dear comrades,

"It is with pleasure that I entrust these colours to you, and it is with great satisfaction I present them to him who was, forty years ago, at the head of your fathers in this same field.

"These colours arise among us with the dawn of liberty; their appearance recalls to me with rapture my younger years. A symbol of the victory over the enemies of the state, let these colours become amongst ourselves the safeguard of public order and liberty! Let these glorious colours, confided to your fidelity, be our rallying-sign!

"Vive la France!"

LETTER FROM THE KING TO GENERAL LAFAYETTE.

"I wish first of all, my dear general, to know how you find yourself after this splendid day, as I fear you must be much fatigued; but I have yet another very strong motive for addressing you; it is, to request that you will become my interpreter with that glorious National Guard, of whom you are the patriarch, and to express to them all the admiration with which it has this day inspired me. Tell them that not only have they surpassed my expectations, but that it is not in my power to express all the joy and the happiness they have made me experience. A witness of the federation of 1790 in this same Champ-de-Mars; a witness, also, of the grand movement of 1792, when I saw our army in Champagne joined by forty-eight battalions which the city of Paris had raised in three days, and which so eminently contributed to repel the invasion which we had the good fortune to arrest at Valmy; I can make the comparison; and it is with delight I tell you that what I have just seen is very superior to that which I then considered so grand, and which our enemies found so formidable. Have the goodness, also, my dear general, to express to the National Guard how much I was gratified by their demonstrations towards myself, and how deeply they have sunk into my heart.

"Your affectionate,

"LOUIS PHILIPPE."

Quantum mutatus ab illo!

CHAPTER X.

Objects that diverted Lafayette's attention from the formation of the king's council—He demands the emancipation of the people of political offences—He presents to the king the individuals condemned for political offences—The conduct of those in power towards these brave men.

The numerous occupations in which such great and rapid events had involved Lafayette, had necessarily diverted his attention from the formation of the king's council. He is even accused, and perhaps justly, of having allowed the power to fall into the hands of the doctrinaires, and, in general, of the men of the Restoration. That indifference, which has since become so fatal, is explained by the character of Lafayette, to whom authority was always a burden, and for whom the routine of business had never any attractions. Accustomed to recover his advantages in times of danger, he had always the failing, a very serious one for a statesman, of despising intrigues, and contemning, above all others, those of which he might individually be the object. This unwillingness to attend to petty machinations and cabal, was productive of serious consequences in the sequel of a revolution which had been effected at least as much in opposition to men as to things. With the exception, however, of several names, which were associated with afflicting recollections, it must be confessed that the direction given to public affairs by the first administration of Louis Philippe, presented nothing alarming for the revolution, at least in the then ostensible and avowed policy of that cabinet.

The faction which very soon set itself up as the arbiter of our destinies, had not yet attempted to re-construct the Restoration; it appeared to labour only to find for France a suitable position, some resting point on the new ground upon which the events of July had thrown her.

The revolution of 1830 had likewise itself deranged many interests, thrown many persons out of their place, wounded many vanities; the position was full of dangers; and power, tottering on its feet, sought strength and support at every hand. The experienced patriots, on their side, recollected that our first revolution had committed errors; that the struggle in which it had been engaged had rendered it violent; that it had terrified many, had overshoot its mark, had frequently swept away good along with evil; and had ended with bringing back despotism through the medium of anarchy.

It was necessary to pay regard to this predominant feeling, and at least, before attacking the new government, to wait until it had settled itself and unbided its system. All the organs of liberal opinions, whatever might be the shades of their doctrines, ranged themselves frankly on the side of an authority emanating from the barricades; and their almost unanimous countenance afforded to the depositaries of power, during the first six months of their administration, is one of the best evidences of the real progress that political intelligence had made amongst us. Then many of the men of July, and it may be said, the greater number of those who had effected the revolution, supported the ministry, though at the same time deploring the dangerous course to which it had abandoned itself. The rare exceptions do not affect the justice of this general observation.

Since that time those men have learnt much—they have been deceived, and experience has condemned them to the condition of declared oppositists; but not before they had set on foot the system of the restoration fearlessly unfolding itself, doing much evil, and contemplating still more. For these reasons, Lafayette likewise abstained at first from attacking the domestic policy of the government of July, which had been done, it might have been a signal for new resistance, and have raised up serious obstacles.

Nevertheless, in the midst of the labours with which the reorganisation of National Guard overwhelmed him, he did not lose sight of some important points upon which it was necessary the government should explain itself without delay. Amongst them was the finally fixing and recognising the rights of the free people of colour, in our colonies; an important question, which all the efforts of the opposition had never been able to bring to a settlement under the preceding government. Called upon by Lafayette, the minister of marine answered from the tribune, that the new royalty considered all the citizens of our colonies perfectly equal, and that it disclaimed the idea of any species of inferiority or superiority founded on a difference of colour. This was much for the cause of humanity, much also for the patriot who, the first in France, had attempted the gradual emancipation of the slaves, and devoted a considerable portion of his fortune to that philanthropic work.

One of the first cares of Lafayette was likewise to ascertain the intentions of the new authorities with respect to the patriots condemned for political offences during the reigns of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. He saw in the decision which he was endeavouring to draw from the government on the subject of these noble victims, not only an atonement to be made to justice, but a fresh consecration of the principle of resistance to oppression, and to violation of the laws. Therefore, it gave great scandal to the doctrinaire faction which had already engrafted itself upon the new-born court of Louis-Philippe, that, on a certain day, when the saloons of the Palais-Royal were crowded with deputations from all parts of France, an aide-de-camp on duty was heard to call out with a loud voice, The gentlemen condemned for political offences, and Lafayette, advancing at their head, said to the king; "Here are the political convicts; they are presented to you by an accomplice." The king received them with a most touching affability, and, reminding several of those generous citizens of the persecutions which, to his great regret, they had experienced, he promised them all the most solicitous attention to their interests, and a prompt indemnification for their long sufferings. What have those promises produced? The complaints of those brave men have told it to the country; their misery repeats it every day: repulsed by every administration, exposed to the scorn of the sycophants of every hue that beset the royalty of the barricades, the condamnés politiques are dying of hunger, under the eyes of that monarch to whose orders they had served as the stepping-stone. History will have to relate that men who, during fifteen years, had sacrificed their all for their country, found in it for themselves only water and earth, after the glorious Revolution of July. What a monument of the gratitude of kings!

CHAPTER XI.

Influence of the Revolution of July upon the patriots of Europe—It rekindles in the two hemispheres the sympathies of England—Two systems of foreign policy divide the patriots—Non intervention as understood by Lafayette—System of the doctrinaires—Consequences.

Our Revolution of July was the signal for the most amazing events of all kinds. The nations were thrilled with joy and hope; the despots with fear and rage. The whole world felt itself impelled by an irresistible feeling of liberty.* But of all these phenomena the most remarkable was the accordance of the popular sympathies which burst forth from every quarter in favour of the Parisians. Forgetting every cause of enmity and rivalry with old France, all nations without exception mingled their wishes for the success of the holy cause which had just triumphed at the barricades: it was as one family of nations bound up together, and called upon equally to participate in the advantages of a vast social and political renovation.

In short, the July revolution appeared as a gift to be shared in by the whole human species, and for which the civilised world acknowledged itself deeply indebted to the people most advanced in civilisation. It was an event which exalted our common nature, and elevated the character of every nation. There existed not a tyrant in the world who did not tremble, not a slave who did not feel his fetters lightened, in contemplating France. The English, above all, seemed as if they could set no bounds to their enthusiasm. Whigs, Tories, and radicals, church of England men, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Catholics, rich and poor, every sect and party on the British soil, admired us in the combat, admired us after the victory, and prostrated themselves before the people that had been able, in three days, to free themselves from eight centuries of reproach, and to reduce a monarchy sprung from conquest in the infancy of society, to a simple form of government, open to all the improvements of the future.

* This great event resounded even in India. At Delhi, the Holy City, the people, as well as the Hindu and English authorities, celebrated it by a magnificent banquet, in which was united a French naturalist, M. Jacquemont, who happened then to be in those distant countries. The inhabitants of the banks of the Ganges drinking healths to the men of the barricades, and crying, Vive Lafayette! What a subject of meditation for politicians and philosophers!

Who does not remember the numerous deputations that poured in from all parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to congratulate the great people, and the great citizen they had placed at their head? And what the language held by those freemen? Let us listen for a moment to the orator of the deputation from London, bringing to the Hotel-de-Ville the good wishes and the offerings of that great city. "The imperfect lesson given by our own country," said he, "you have enlarged and completed. The world owes you an immense debt of gratitude. For our parts we acknowledge, and shall endeavour to cause to be acknowledged, that the victory which you have gained is that of human nature, and we are proud of you, who have so nobly established its rights and fulfilled its duties.

"Bravely have you fought the fight of freedom; nobly have you used this victory; we offer you our sincere congratulations. History has few pages of untarnished glory; it has none more brilliant than that of your glorious revolution to hand down to future ages. May patriotism there contemplate its highest duties, and heroism draw thence its sublimest lessons! We wish the liberty which has been established by so splendid a triumph, may be perpetuated among you from age to age; that under its holy auspices the reign of peace and public prosperity may be all-powerful, and that at the foot of their altars we may bury every vestige of jealousy and animosity. We here express our solemn conviction, that the great cause of liberty is the great and common cause of human kind."

The enthusiasm with which the English applauded the courage of the Parisians did not confine itself to these demonstrations; they wished to put forth a more decided act of adhesion to the principles for which the men of July had just fought and conquered. In the offices of all the journals, in the public offices, in all the parishes of the three kingdoms, subscriptions were opened for succouring the wounded and the families of the patriots that had perished in the three great days.

The sensation produced in the United States by the July revolution, was yet more profound than in any other part of the globe. No sooner had the news reached New York of the movements of Paris, and the position of Lafayette, placed at the head of the public force by the will of the people, than that American city gave itself wholly up to the demonstrations of a delirious joy. All the bells were set ringing; all the houses were illuminated and decked with tricoloured flags; and a festival as brilliant, as solemn, as numerously attended, as any of those which had been held to celebrate the triumphs of America herself, was prepared in honour of the victory of Paris. It was the same at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston, New Orleans, and through the whole extent of the United States, which hastened to send relief, addresses, and deputations, to the French people, to the National Guard, and to Lafayette. The flag which New Orleans presented on that occasion to the Parisian people, still waves in one of the halls of the Hotel-de-Ville. The whole of those addresses breathed the greatest, the purest admiration for the revolution and the men of July, and expressed the most touching community of feelings and principles.

The enthusiasm of the American government fell no less short of that of the American people; on the 7th of December, the President of the United States, in his message at the opening of congress, delivered a most splendid eulogy upon the heroism, the wisdom, and the generosity displayed by the French people in that great revolution. In congratulating his fellow-citizens on an event so important to the dearest interests of mankind, he only echoed, he said, the voice of his country. Nothing other could be expected from a people such as the American nation, than the deepest sympathy for the triumph of the sacred principles of liberty, obtained in a manner so worthy of so noble a cause, and crowned by the heroic moderation which had sanctified the revolution. "Notwithstanding the strong assurances," added he, "which the man whom we all so justly love and admire, has given to the world, of his esteem for the character of the new King of the French, a character which, if he sustain it to the end, will ensure to that prince the high renown of a patriot king,—notwithstanding those assurances, it is not in his triumph, but in that of the great principle which has placed him on the throne, the sovereign authority of the public will, that the people of America rejoice."

Following our example, the thirst for liberty and the love of order were manifested in every part of the continent of Europe. Belgium and Poland first put themselves in action, with a force and with a wisdom, which, until then, had never been evinced by a people in a state of insurrection. Italy, ashamed of her degradation, was plotting in every direction. Germany loudly claimed the fulfilment of engagements entered into for the last fifteen years. Switzerland sought to shake off the yoke of an oligarchy, republican, indeed, but insolent, as all aristocracies are. Spain and Portugal waited only for a friendly hand to open the way for their resurrection. In short, the interests of despotism had every where fallen before the interests of the people, and Europe seemed to wait only for a signal from France to recover its full rights, suspended but not lost.

In this state of affairs, what ought to have been the external policy of the Revolution of July? That revolution being consummated, did a European public right still exist? and had not that event destroyed all the systems produced by fifteen years of providence and slavery on the part of the people, of blindness and oppression on the part of kings? In short, had not the moment arrived for Europe to create for itself a new political code, having for its basis, not traditions, but present necessities? History will answer; she will say whether representative government be, or be not, a vast organisation which can only exist when supported by all, and whether, in allowing the debasement of liberty among its natural allies, the government of July has not proclaimed its own degradation, and worked its own ruin. My only task is, not to seek for what ought to have been done, but to relate what has been done.

Immediately after the days of July, two systems of external policy presented themselves for adoption by France, until the development of a future pregnant with so many chances. I must look for the motives of these two systems, both of which the best patriots considered suited, but by different means, to adapt the position of France to the new circumstances in which the revolution had placed her.

A numerous party thought, with reason, that a monarchy produced in three days by the sovereignty of the people, could not long coexist with the old doctrines of legitimacy, which the late revolution had so violently bruted in France. This party thought that the moment was decisive for the glory and security of the country; and that the interests, as well as the duties, of a monarchy resting upon an act destructive of the spirit and the letter of the treaties of 1814 and 1815, were evidently, to allow the revolutionary movement to travel over its whole national sphere, to sweep away, as far as the Rhine, the ignominy of those treaties, and from thence to call forth an entire change of the public law of Europe, which was a work of violence, a conglomeration of alliances against nature, and of burdens without compensation, which certainly could bind the oppressed nations only so long as they should want the means of emancipating themselves from it.

As to the faith of treaties, the war party replied, that in political morality, it was a horrible perversion of right, to make them an instrument of oppression and ruin: in proof of this, they cited all the wars which even those who invoked the treaties had undertaken, to get rid of obligations they had imposed upon themselves. What, said they, did Austria care about all the treaties which she concluded with the republic, the consulate, and the empire? In what manner did England observe the treaty of Amiens, Prussia those of Presburg and of Tilsit, and Russia that same treaty of Vienna, which had granted to her Poland a semblance of nationality, and some appearance of liberty?

The war party saw no stability for the Revolution of July but in a combination of analogous disturbances, which should destroy all the bonds of patronage and inferiority established by the treaties of 1814 and 1815; treaties by virtue of which Prussia rules from Thionville to Memel, Austria from the Lake of Constance to the gates of Belgrade, and from the Tanaro to the frontiers of Turkey; and which is far more alarming to the civilisation of Europe, by virtue of which a semi-barbarous empire has established itself upon the Oder, from whence it menaces the Elbe, the Weser, and the Rhine.

In fine, the war party wished that the balance of Europe should be restored, not by the tearing asunder of states, but by a just return to the principle of natural nationality; and it did not think that the monarchy of July was bound to ratify the spoliation of Landau, of Sarre-Louis, of Philippe-ville, of Chambéry, of Humiguen, &c.; in its opinion France ought to make herself as strong by her alliances as by her own weight; and it beld her allies not in the great powers, but in the states of the second order, which from the war of the Reformation she had taken under her protection; in the Poles, the Belgians, the Swedes, the Danes, the independent members of the Germanic family, the free men of every country. To conclude; this party, recollecting with pride that France had at all times united her cause with that of weak and oppressed nations; that, though Catholic herself, she had undertaken the defence of protestantism; that although an absolute monarchy she had fought for a republican insurrection; demanded loudly that her popular doctrines should now be conveyed to the Rhine, to the Pyrenees, to the other side of the Alps, and that there presenting herself either to assist or arbitrate, she should guarantee to those nations that wished to be free, the right of becoming so, and to those, if such are to be found, who prefer absolute power, the liberty to keep it; for whatever shades of opinion they may individually entertain, the true men of July do no more pretend to the right of contending against the fanaticism of slavery than they admit that of attacking the enthusiasm of liberty.

Such was the first system of external policy which the most ardent friends of the Revolution of 1830 called for with all their wishes. Would it have procured the results they anticipated? I know not; but what I do know is, that the overturning of the most ancient throne in Europe, the unexpected return of England to ideas liberal beyond expectation, the resurrection of Belgium, the wonderful combats of Poland, the convulsions of Italy, the movements in Switzerland, the commotions in Germany, and even the patriotic reminiscences of Spain, seemed to announce that the time had arrived for the complete restoration of French liberty, and for the emancipation of all Europe.

Enthusiasm, however, even that of liberty, has its vicissitudes, human nature its rights, war its chances, and fortune its turns; and upon these turns might depend, in the opinion of a great number of excellent patriots, the fate of France and the coming destinies of Europe. Victory was promised to new-born liberty; but, after all, the revolution might be vanquished; and can one conceive what that legitimacy in its triumph would have brought us back, which even on the brink of destruction so insolently denied us even a semblance of liberty?

This apprehension, together with the consideration of the evils and sacrifices which even the most just of wars must necessarily occasion, made it a duty, on the part of many worthy citizens, to find out whether some other means did not exist, besides having recourse to arms, to consolidate the Revolution of July, and secure to the great national bodies which that revolution had aroused, the power of acting with entire freedom. Every body certainly felt, that upon the fate of the Belgian, Polish, and Italian revolutions, the fate of the second French revolution might ultimately depend; but everybody also knew, that in order to enable those nations to accomplish by themselves the great work of their regeneration, it was sufficient, especially in the first impulse of their resurrection, simply to secure to them the free development of their own strength.

Such were the opinions which, in the first days that followed the Revolution of July, gained over to these two systems of war and peace citizens equally devoted to the interests of France and the liberty of Europe: on one side, patriots demanding an attack, sudden, spontaneous, impetuous as the revolution itself; on the other, also patriots who, thinking that sufficient courage had signalled this revolution to make all further bloodshed unnecessary, preferred to the chances of battles a definite, strict, and inflexible system of non-intervention.

Lafayette was of the latter opinion. Was he in the right or in the wrong? Persons may differ upon this question. We may, however, be permitted to believe, that if instead of circumscribing the system of non-intervention to an absurd degree; instead of allowing it to be framed in accordance with every calculation of monarchical iniquity; instead of perverting it, by interpretations the most insolently jesuitical; it had been maintained, and, if necessary, had been defended by an armed force, in all its rigour; such, in short, as it had been approved by Lafayette; Poland, Belgium, and Italy, would now have shaken off the yoke which tramples upon their rights and threatens our own. And that was not a system so unheard of as is pretended. Thirty years before, Fox, Grey, and Erskine, had laid its foundation, in demanding the non-intervention of the powers in the affairs of other countries, and in declaring that such non intervention would be sufficient to make liberty bear natural fruits, not only in France, but throughout the continent of Europe. Now, that which was already possible in 1792, why should it no longer be so in 1830?

Upon the whole: non-intervention, taking of war in its strictest acceptation; or war, with all its chances, all its consequences; such war, in the first days of the July revolution, the policy of Lafayette, as well as that of some of the members of the first cabinet of Louis Philippe.

Here are some facts, which will prove how the crown and its advisers themselves professed to understand that system, so long as their conduct was governed by revolutionary influence. I intentionally select my authorities from a period when the royalty of July had already begun to abjure its principles.

On the 20th of December, the head of the ministry of the 3d of November said from the tribune:—

"France will not permit the principle of non-intervention to be violated; but she will also endeavour to prevent the endangering of peace, if it can be preserved; and if war become unavoidable, it must be proved in the face of the world, that we have only made it because we have been placed between the alternative of war or the abandonment of our principles."

"We shall therefore continue to negotiate, but while negotiating we shall arm."

"In a very short time, gentlemen, we shall have, besides our fortresses provisioned and defended, 500,000 men ready for the field, well armed, well organised, well commanded; a million of national guards will support them; and the king, should it be necessary, will place himself at the head of the nation."

"We will march in close order, strong in our good right and the power of our principles. If the tempest should burst at the sight of our three colours, and become our auxiliary, so much the worse for those who shall have unloosed it; we shall not be accountable for it to the world."

Here we see plainly described the system of non-intervention, such as it was accepted by the new dynasty. What was its object? I again let the ministers of this dynasty express themselves.

"The object of the Holy Alliance," said M. Laflitte, "was to stifle, by common efforts, the liberty of the people, wherever it might show itself; the new principle proclaimed by France has necessarily been, to allow liberty to unfold itself in every place where it shall have naturally sprung up. The principle of non-intervention has the two-fold object of making liberty respected every where, without hastening its coming in any place; because it is only good where it is a natural production; because experience has proved that in every country, liberty brought by the foreigner is as fatal a present as despotism itself. No more intervention of any kind—such has been the system of France. It has the advantage of securing our own independence, as well as that of the countries recently emancipated."

However, the proclaiming of a principle is nothing; its application is every thing. Now, to what has the principle of non-intervention been applied by the monarchy of July? Has it been applied to Italy, which the Austrians have entered in spite of us, and whence they have only departed, at first time after erasing that liberty which the King of the French wished to see unfold itself in every place, where it should have naturally sprung up? Has it been applied to Poland? Has it even been applied to Belgium, in the affairs of which the permanent action of the London conference has exercised for eighteen months the most direct of interventions? Assuredly not; for even if the game at soldiers, that we went to play on the banks of the Scheldt, were to be considered as a consequence of the principle of non-intervention, which would be a difficult matter, history would still demand an account of the abandonment of the Poles, who were, with respect to the Czar, in exactly the same situation as the Belgians were towards William. Posterity will say, upon this melancholy subject, that Nicholas dared to insult the royalty of the barriades, and that this first cry of a barbarian froze the courage of the France of July.

If I interrogate the recent recollections, I find in them proofs of a deception, or of a blindness, beyond all comparison. At the opening of the present session, the Crown still guaranteed to the papal territories, a real amnesty, the abolition of confiscation, and positive modifications in the administrative and judicial order. Well! what reality is there in this real amnesty? The prisons of Venice delivering up to the dungeons of Milan the patriots whom France has not been able to carry off from some Austrian pirates; civil war again ravaging the Campagna; the pillaging of Scena, women, children, and old men murdered by regiments of banditti, under the banners of the Cross, and a tribunal of blood revived from the barbarism of the middle ages. What reality there is in the independence promised to central Italy, consists in the arms and the intrigues of Austria incessantly tending to the dominion of the whole of the peninsula.

Speaking of Belgium, Louis Philippe said, "The fortresses raised in order to overawe France shall be demolished." They are still entire.

"The nationality of Poland shall not perish." Alas! what has become of the nationality of a magnanimous people, whose fate it is to be butchered every quarter of a century through the cowardice of Europe? See that race of heroes delivered up to the sword of its tyrants; the deserts of Siberia peopled with those men to whom posterity will erect altars; the few remains of these brave men asking an hospitality which a timid policy scarcely ventures to grant them; interrogate that quietude of the grave, that silence of death which reigns over the heroic country. . . . Poland is no more—the Russian alone is seated in the dwelling-place of the great people!

Such are the consequences of the abandonment of the principle of non-intervention constantly invoked by Lafayette. Instead of protecting our friends, the royalty of July has permitted their degradation, in contempt of its most solemn promises; instead of providing itself beforehand with means of attack and defence, it awaits the enemy within its walls; and while it is as evident as the sun at noonday, that the absolute monarchies are leaguely together, this royalty, sprung from a revolution, disowns its natural auxiliaries, and finds a pleasure in exchanging all our recollections of glory and power for an object submission. I know not with what fair name it decorates its policy; but that which is reserved for it by history, I do know.

"But," we are told, "peace is ensured, and soon a general disarmament will crown the system of the Cabinet of the 13th of March, which peace and which disarmament will give a positive contradiction to the preachers of war. Away then with all those uncertainties, all those alternatives of calm and storm, which froze all hearts, and struck France as with an interdict. The fact is certain: it was false that the Revolution of July ought to seek for its triumph in identifying French interests with the interests of every people among whom the volcano had cast the brands of liberty! Behold, those nations who, following our example, had risen to reconquer their country, their name, their customs, their distinguishing features, and laws suited to their nature, are again bending under the yoke: in Poland, a policy of reaction, vindictive and barbarous, has destroyed even the last elements of that nationality which the word of the King of the French has guaranteed in the face of the world; Italy, decimated by a priest, is still a prey to all the calamities of civil war, and of a double foreign intervention; Belgium is still in a constrained and false position. New convulsions are preparing in Spain and in Portugal. Switzerland is dismembering itself; every where national independence, personal security, and the progress of civilisation, are annulled; in short, every thing in Europe clashes, without combining; and yet the ratifications of the 24 articles are exchanged, peace is no longer doubtful, the royalty of July has become one of the family of legitimate monarchies, the juste-milieu triumphs, and peace will be maintained: such are the practical results of that diplomacy, so inactive, so expecting, so cowardly, which, in the midst of the rapid movements that carry Europe along, seemed, you said, to have struck dumb that noble France of July, which, in your opinion, could only reconquer its acknowledged preponderance by showing itself resolved to brave every peril, and giving to the world a grand idea of its determination and its courage. Well, this idea has been exchanged for a patent of slavery; the manly garment has been stripped off for the swaddling clothes of July which ought to have predominated in every possible situation, the ascendancy of reason armed, of force in the hands of liberty, which she ought to have exercised in the councils of Europe, have been exchanged for the shame and the injury of a royal embrace; yet peace is ensured. What have you still to urge? Take our words for it, and be silent." Thus argue the doctrinaires.

Be it so: the spirit of war is laid; the execution of the twenty-four articles is guaranteed by all the powers; Holland herself is compelled to submit to all the stipulations of this treaty; she recognises King Leopold, and receives the credentials of an ambassador to her court; Russia withdraws from Poland a part of the regiments that cover its territory; in short, the peace of Europe is definitely settled upon these bases. Let us receive all these circumstances as certain facts, and also admit that a disarming, which the difference of the military systems of Europe will always render decisive, should crown this peace, and fix the different nations of the continent in the precarious, false, and ruinous position, in which they find themselves, as well towards each other, as towards their respective governments. Now, is there a man of sense and foresight who can believe in the duration of this monstrous organisation, and not be convinced that such a state of things is necessarily pregnant with new and approaching convulsions?

This puerile belief, which some superficial but honest observers entertain, with respect to the continuation of this peace, is the result of a serious error, too often countenanced by the false prepossessions of the friends of liberty themselves. After the Revolution of July, the parts have been inverted, by asserting that France stood in need of peace, and that foreign governments wished to make upon her an immediate war; and the government has dexterously cultivated that opinion, in order to take to itself the merit of a difficulty overcome. Hence the arguments drawn from the dismemberment of the army, and from the relative inferiority of our military force; hence, the explanation of all the shameful concessions and all the diplomatic cowardice which imminent necessity has been said to have imposed upon us; hence, in fine, the alleged impossibility of saving Poland and Italy.

However, the plainest common sense is sufficient to dispose of these false arguments. Now, indeed, can it be supposed, after the events of July, that Prussia, Austria, Russia, and Spain, (England was out of the question,) were so blind as to wish to attack France, aroused by an immense revolution, and encircled by nations in a state of insurrection? How was a coalition to be brought together again, already cut asunder by the rising en masse of Belgium, Poland, Italy, and some of the German provinces? Was it not evident that before the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees could be threatened, the Holy Alliance must have waited the result of several campaigns upon the Vistula, the Elbe, the Rhine, the Po, and the Ebro? And whatever was the chance of our victory, France all the necessary time, had she not, above all, more elements than she required, to organise herself in a formidable manner in the rear of the foreign populations, fighting for a cause that was their own? Is the revolutionary impulse forgotten, which in one month would have thrown upon the frontiers all those classes which the days of July had taken from their occupations? Are the thirty thousand volunteers forgotten with whom, in a fortnight, the city of Paris, alone, had filled up the ranks of the army? In fine, are the triumphs of 1793 forgotten, that were gained with means so inferior to the physical and moral resources which the situation of 1830 afforded? Now, as then, France was a soldier; but now, more than then, she had for her inseparable comrade the people of Europe; and her cause, in the eyes of all, was a revolution free from the terrors and excesses that had perverted the original character of the former one.

It was then, as I have already said, for Europe to ask for peace, and it belonged to us to ascertain if it was our well understood interest to grant it. The most skilful calculation of the policy of the cabinets was to allay the storm which might overwhelm them, while affecting to do us the favour of abstaining from war; the most inconceivable folly of our government has been, to allow the kings to recover from their stupor, the nations to lose their hopes, and to reduce the honour of its diplomacy to avoiding conflict which its enemies neither wished nor were able to undertake. In short, that the honour of France, her reputation, her promise to the nations, should have been considered as nothing by the royalty of July, I can comprehend: it is not the first time that private interests have prevailed over the great interest of the country. But who can help feeling, that the despotisms that live in each other's existence, not having all abdicated with Charles X., could not forgive the Revolution of July, but must wait to attack it, until time and our internal discords should have deprived it of all it possessed that was ardent, ambitious, popular, and formidable to tyranny?

Our statesmen have solicitedly brought about this deplorable result; they have reduced France to the state in which the foreigners wished her to be. Fear has deprived these bold men of their experience; selfishness has concealed their country from their eyes; and the lessons of the past have been lost upon them. Indeed, the contemplation of the past should, at least, have reminded them of the similarity of situation which existed between France under the Directory and France under Louis Philippe. At Campo Formio and at Rastadt, the Directory also made peace with the whole continent, and solemnly renounced all spirit of political proselytism. But what ensued, a year after the conclusion of those treaties? A general war again broke out in Europe. After the battles of Zurich and Marengo, the coalition, more severely wounded, took three years to re-establish itself; but it did so at last, and then again a general war ensued; and history will, perhaps, one day relate, that France fought as necessarily for the principles of 1789 at Austerlitz and at Wagram as at Jemmapes and at Fleurus.

The peace in which the ministry of the 13th of March gloried, a peace quite novel in history, is a contradiction given to the understanding and to the facts of which the whole European policy is composed—all the obligations on one side, and none on the other. Now, what can arise from such a state of things, unless it be, the systems remaining the same as that which has resulted from analogous situations? In short, the coalition, disjointed in its organisation, wounded in its vital principle by the Revolution of July, has taken up again its first position, and a war against France is evidently no longer for our enemies any thing but a question of time and opportunity; the moral power of the revolution once extinguished, it then only becomes for them a game at chess, which probably may not be wanting in new treacheries and purchased triumphs. And if these melancholy forebodings should be realised, what strength, what prudence would be able to secure the direction of events, and ensure a stay for the tottering throne that has silyly courted the storm? Will it not then be necessary to call up the sympathies of July to aid the courage of our soldiers? It will be necessary, let us not doubt; but with the nation as an auxiliary, another Waterloo will only cost us the loss of a battle, but reduced to an army alone to defend the Revolution, one disastrous combat might cost us an empire. But what shall re-awaken that impulse of the popular masses? The dangers of the country? I think they will. But to confront at present those dangers, I see only a government reduced to wretched shifts, and a throne commanding neither confidence nor respect.

I acknowledge it, my patriotic blood boils at the idea of the doctrinaires calling to their assistance the men who bled for liberty. They would dare to do so; for seventeen years of tergiversation have proved that they dare do any thing. But the deep feeling of disaffection and contempt that would burst out among all classes of the nation against them, of what use would it be to the monarchy of the barricades? This is a question of interest for the monarchy to examine beforehand. It would promise to return to better principles, and to more honest men: Louis XVIII. and Bonaparte in 1815, Charles X. in 1830, also promised it: what became of Louis XVIII., Bonaparte, and Charles X.? Yet Bonaparte had glory in his favour; Louis XVIII. and Charles X. had in their favour eight centuries of traditions and recollections. But deprive Louis Philippe of the popular majesty, and he is nothing. Seriously speaking, what authority would a handful of obscure doctrinaires possess to uphold the work of a people, if the people withdrew from them? From all the work of power take away the Revolution and to-morrow, you who benefit by that Revolution will not possess a crown piece, nor a soldier.

CHAPTER XII.

Continuation of the preceding—Notification of the accession of Louis Philippe—Insolence of the Emperor Nicholas and of the Duke of Modena in his relations with our diplomates—Some of the cabinets send a diplomatic agent to him personally—His interview with that agent—His system of non intervention developed.

Such, at the close of the Revolution of 1830, was the general disposition of men's minds relative to the question of peace or war. Already the royalty of the barricades floated in uncertainty between its inclination for a repose without security, without glory, and its apprehensions of a conflict which might carry it away, if it allowed its enemies to be first in the field—on the one side, inaction and the stigma attaching to the treaties of Vienna and Paris, but along with it the expectation of a bill of indemnity and a monarchial adaption; on the other, the fire of insurrection to be kindled throughout the European continent, the chances of war to be run, but also the complete emancipation of France, the relucal of all her glories, and the certain extension of freedom to all Europe.

The citizen royalty would not comprehend that, independently of the necessity of entitling itself to the gratitude and esteem of the people, there existed another necessity from which no new dynasty had ever escaped—that of a baptism of glory and blood. Sprung from under the popular cannon, this royalty preferred endeavouring to consolidate itself by slavery to entering boldly into the traditional system of its ancient alliances.

However, leaving apart the question of principles and their propagation, the external policy of this government, debased from its birth, was extremely simple. Properly speaking, what was the question? One of territory. In fact, while France, after carrying her arms into every capital, had seen herself develop even of possessions which she acquired from 1645 to 1793, and for which, be it observed, she had given superabundant compensation, her enemies had immediately extended their territories. Austria, for example, had aggrandised and established herself at the same time in Germany, Poland, Turkey, and Italy; she had acquired great facilities of inland navigation, sea-ports, and a maritime commerce; Prussia, but lately a third-rate power, had rapidly advanced herself to the rank of a preponderating one, by parcels of territory conquered from all the adjoining states, from the Niemen to Thionville; Russia, which could scarcely be said to exist when France was the first power in the world, had extended herself at every point of her immense circumference, and by the necessary consequence of a progressive system of invasion, as well as by the policy of her family alliances, had reduced the West to such a condition that it could only go to war by her impulse, or continue at peace by her permission. I do not speak of England—every one knows how many rich dominions and important military positions she acquired in the European and Asiatic seas, by the treaty which disinherited France. The Ionian Islands, the Isle of France, and the Cape of Good Hope, are among the acquisitions with which British distastefulness contented itself.

Such then was the relative situation of France towards the foreign powers, when the revolution of July suddenly displaced all the elements of the public law of Europe. Now, reducing the question to the sole interest of France, and leaving apart all community of principles, of wants and sympathies, there still remained for a national government the imperative duty of claiming the frontiers necessary for the defence of the country. Let us no longer hear of the terrors that were still inspired by the convulsions of the Republic and the glorious days of the Empire.

The Republic had not been able to conquer peace for herself except by conquering liberty for others, and her treaties sufficiently attest her justice and imprudent generosity after victory. As to the Empire's making and unmaking kings at the will of a fortunate soldier; it was not France; it was the army of Bonaparte, unfaithful to the Revolution, and returning with all speed to the old monarchial system; and besides, history will perhaps attest, that if the Empire overran Europe, it was called upon to do so by the conditions dating their origin from 1789.

But liberalism and its propagation apart, it was the business of the government of July to provide for our future security and restore that balance which a degenerate and dastardly power had allowed to be destroyed. In this respect the Revolution of 1830 might become, even in unskillful hands, the guarantee of our national independence. The elected royalty has made of it merely a Roman like those which disgraced the last ages of the Republic. It was not wished, it is said, to endanger the peace of Europe. But you have degraded the existence and the majesty of the Revolution which made you. Your indecision, your cowardice, and your incapacity, have exhausted the courage and patriotic firmness of the nations, stifled the revolutionary impulse in France, and kindled against you the anger of all free men. Well! think you that by those means you have allayed the storm? think you that your illegitimacy is therefore either more or less under the ban of the old monarchies? Yes, for a few months, perhaps a few years; but what are these months, these years, what are you, compared with the existence of France? Behold Poland annihilated; the barrier between barbarism and civilisation broken down; Russia ready to dismember Prussia by seizing upon her Polish territories; and the North at liberty to rush upon the South: behold the fruits of your genius, and venture to calculate how much bloodshed will one day be necessary to snatch mutilated Europe from the hands of the despot who saluted your accessions with an insult.

However, the first measure of external policy taken by the ministry of Louis Philippe, was the notification to foreign courts of the accession of that prince to the throne of France. England was the first to recognise the new king; the adhesion of Austria, of Prussia, and the secondary German states, followed pretty closely that of the cabinet of St. James's; Spain postponed her answer, and published a circular as insulting to the new monarch as to the nation that had chosen him; the petty prince of Modena insolently protested against the usurpation; in fine, it was only after repeated delays and strong solicitations, that M. Athalin obtained from the Emperor Nicholas the extraordinary answer which the autocrat condescended to give to the letter, though a very humble one, that had been addressed to him by the King of the French. It will be recollected in what terms this overture was conceived, in which by an incredible forgetfulness of the national dignity, the cabinet of the Palais-Royal gave the appellation of catastrophe to the national events that had just placed the crown upon the head of the Duke of Orleans. This humiliation received its punishment in the answer of the Czar, which I here insert as the historical document best calculated to show to what degree the monarchy of July has allowed itself to be insulted.

LETTER FROM THE CABINET OF H. M. THE EMPEROR OF ALL THE RUSSIAS TO H. M. THE KING OF THE FRENCH, DATED SANKOE-SELO, THE 18TH OF SEPTEMBER, 1830.

"I have received from the hands of General Athalin, the letter of which he was the bearer. Events, ever to be deplored, have placed your majesty in a cruel dilemma. You have taken a determination which appeared to you the only one calculated to save France from the greatest calamities, and I will not pronounce upon the considerations by which your majesty has been guided, but I offer my prayers that it may please Divine Providence to bless your intentions and the efforts that you are about to make for the happiness of the French people. In concert with my allies, I receive with pleasure the desire which your majesty has expressed to maintain relations of peace and amity with all the states of Europe, so long as they shall be based upon the existing treaties, and in the firm determination to respect the rights and the obligations, as well as the state of territorial possession, which they have sanctioned. Europe will therein find a security for peace, so necessary to the repose of France herself. Called upon, conjointly with my allies, to cultivate with France, under her government, these conservative relations, I, for my part, shall do so with all the solicitude they require, and with the dispositions of which I am desirous to assure your majesty in return for the sentiments you have expressed to me. I request your majesty at the same time to accept, &c. &c."

"NICHOLAS."

What unworthy language, then, had been employed in the name of France?

Before the battle of Denain, when the fate of his crown depended upon the chances of the day, Louis XIV. wrote to Villars:

"If you are beaten, I will go through Paris with the shameful proposals of our enemies in my hand. And the French nation will follow me; we will bury ourselves together under the ruins of the monarchy."

That king was at last acquainted with his country.

This letter, however, caused much uneasiness at the Palais-Royal. The absence of the appellation of My Brother, which had been lavishly used in the autographic notification, was, above all, considered with dread, as a positive denial of the right conferred by the will of the people at the issue of the catastrophe. They perceived that they had very probably knelt to the earth to no purpose, and that after all, it would be necessary to have recourse to popular sympathy against the disaffection of the legitimists. They returned, and for a while followed up the idea already adopted (as I will shortly prove) of taking into account the sympathies and antipathies of the nations, and secretly urging the propagation of liberal opinions, while ostensibly the monarchy should continue to deny itself, by blaming every revolution analogous to that from which it had sprung, and by asking mercy for the grand week, and mercy for the great people.

It is necessary, in order to appreciate the men who still direct the policy of France, as well as to understand our present real situation, to follow up with attention all the proofs which establish the duplicity of this policy towards the nations and the kings, towards France and the foreigner. History affords few examples so forcible for the study of doctrinarisme.

The Belgic revolution, which Lafayette called the olddest daughter of our own, was it may be said, the first touchstone that events applied to the hesitating and dilatory policy of the Palais-Royal. It was particularly with regard to the respective situation of France and Belgium, that the Revolution of July was to attack the "Gates of 1814 and 1815." In fact, the erection of a line of fortresses upon the whole southern frontier of Belgium, their inspection entrusted to an English general, the occupation of Luxembourg by the Germanic Confederation, constituted a permanent aggression upon our security, and afforded our natural enemies the means of easily attacking our frontiers. To leave that country in the hands of the foreigners, was abandoning to them the chief means of a sudden advance upon the capital by two important points.

In the presence of these perils, the policy of a Richelieu or of a Pitt would not have hesitated; it would have determined upon one of the three expedients which successively presented themselves to the consideration of the popular royalty. Either Belgium and Luxembourg would have been united to France, as a means of removing the threatened invasion to a greater distance, and neutralizing the political and commercial influence of England in that country; or Belgium, left at liberty to place herself under the friendly dominion of the Duke of Leuchtenberg, would equally have covered the vulnerable side of our frontiers; or, in fine, by the election of the Duke de Nemours to the throne of Belgium, France would directly have obtained the twofold result of ensuring her independence, and relieving a neighbouring people from the yoke of England.

Each of these arrangements was too bold for the trembling policy of the juste-milieu. From blunder to blunder this debased policy has arrived at that Anglo-Belgic system, the immediate or speedy consequences of which must be; first, the increase of British preponderance, unembarrassed with the obstacles which the mixed state of the duchy of Luxembourg still presented; secondly, Antwerp exclusively devoted to English interests; thirdly, the principal fortresses still standing, and France obliged, in order to enter Belgium, to pass under the English cannon; and fourthly, a new degree of continental power granted to England, and for her commerce a certain means of introducing her contraband goods across our frontiers, a circumstance which must necessarily complete the destruction of our own commerce and manufactures.

Such has been the settlement, to the present time, of Belgic affairs. Sophistry is still at work in favour of this system of peace at any price; but either sound reason is a vain word, or France will speedily bring the union of the 7th of August to a strict account for that original abandonment of her most essential interests. However, if the ministry of the 7th of August misinterpreted those great interests, it understood at least, that its existence depended in securing the new state from all foreign intervention, and circumscribing the struggle between Holland and Belgium. Thence the first idea of its system of non-intervention proclaimed at the warm solicitation of Lafayette. The general, still all-powerful, also thought that it was sufficient for France, that Belgium should be independent, free, and at liberty to adopt the constitution that might suit her, in order that our country might find in her a natural and necessary ally. This opinion was adopted by the ministry, and erected into a system by M. Molé, who upon this occasion displayed a firmness and spoke a language worthy of France and of the Revolution. This minister notified to all the powers, and particularly to Holland and to Prussia, that the intervention of a single foreign regiment in the affairs of Belgium, would be a signal for the entrance of fifty thousand French into the territory of that state. This declaration was renewed by Lafayette, on the meeting the representatives of the powers at the residence of the minister for foreign affairs, which he left under the conviction that the cabinets of Europe were much more alarmed than we were at the consequences of a war against the men and the doctrines of July.

It is here the place to speak of the external policy of Lafayette, and exhibit him in his direct relations with the patriots of all nations; relations which have furnished matter for so many calumnies and absurd interpretations. But before dwelling upon these particulars, I must explain the general intentions of the system he adopted at the sequel of the events of July, and from which he has never since departed.

In the early part of August, being on duty at General Lafayette's head-quarters, I had the honour of personally introducing to him one of the most distinguished men in European diplomacy, M. de Humboldt, who came to ask the general in chief, confidentially, what were, under the new circumstances in which France was placed, his principles of policy towards other powers. Lafayette having answered that foreign affairs did not concern him, and that it was to the minister for that department that he must apply, M. de Humboldt declared to him frankly, that he was charged, not only by his own government, but also by several other influential cabinets, to ascertain his personal intentions, and to communicate them. Having been a witness of this important conversation, I can faithfully relate Lafayette's answer, which I hastened to write down word for word.

"As you wish it," said he to M. de Humboldt, "I will think aloud with you. We have made a popular revolution; we have chosen a popular throne; we mean it to be surrounded with republican institutions; we will not allow any body to interfere in our affairs; nor shall we intermeddle in those of our neighbours. If your nations are satisfied with their governments, so much the better for you; if discussions should arise between your nations and yourselves, it is not our business to interfere; but if other nations wish to follow our example, and conquer their liberty, we will not suffer foreign governments to send their counter revolutionary gendarmes among them, and we do not consider Poland and Russia as forming one and the same nation. You understand, that we cannot permit foreigners to attack, among other nations, the vital principle of our existence, that of the national sovereignty; that it is impossible for us to allow nations to be crushed that would become our allies in case of war with arbitrary governments; that we cannot let you convert peace itself into the first sentence of a manifesto against us, and sanction pretensions that would ultimately authorise you to declare war. We wish to remain at peace with all our neighbours; we have not brought into our revolution any kind of ambition, whatever claims we might advance, whatever revenge we might have to take. But if, notwithstanding our moderation, you form another coalition against us; if you renew what was done at Pillnitz, and has been more or less continued during forty-two years, it will be proved to us that our liberty is incompatible with the existence of your arbitrary diplomacy; if you attempt to enter our territory, it can only be with the intention of enslaving us, perhaps of partitioning us; then it becomes our duty and our right to fight you with the arms of liberty; to stir up your people against you, as far as we possibly can; and if your thrones cannot reconcile themselves to the independence and liberty of France, it will be our interest not to lay down our arms until those thrones shall have been broken and destroyed. If, on the contrary, you leave us alone; if you do not attempt to stifle liberty among neighbouring nations, which would constitute a direct and flagrant hostility against our social existence, you will find no reason to complain either of France or of the Revolution of July."

Lafayette has repeated this declaration of principles in all the speeches he has delivered from the tribune. Thus, on the 28th of January, 1831, he made the following remarkable profession of political faith:—

"Gentlemen," said he, "diplomacy, formerly so obscure, so complicated, will daily become simpler and more popular; the press divulges its mysteries, the tribune passes judgment on them, public opinion modifies them; family calculations and the traditions of cabinets will yield to the interests and desires of nations. In taking part this day with the political conversations of these two sittings, I shall plead neither for war nor for peace; that is not the question; no one calls for war; every body would prefer peace; but I must here lay down some facts; of which we ought to maintain the truth and abide the consequences, for they are identified with French honour and our social existence.

"I have formerly said from this tribune that I could only see in this world two heads of political classification, the oppressors and the oppressed: I will now say that two principles divide Europe; the sovereign right of the people, and the divine right of kings; on one side, liberty and equality; on the other, despotism and privilege. I know not whether these two principles can live in good neighbourhood; but I know that ours is in a progression, constant, sure, inevitable; that we must be faithful to it in all points and every where, and that any hostility against us will accelerate its triumph.

"Another truth, no less evident, notwithstanding what has been said of the respect due to existing treaties, is, that as our late revolution of July has of right annulled certain articles of the granted Charter, it has also necessarily annulled certain of the treaties, of the articles of the Congress of Vienna and that of 1815; those, for instance, which secured the throne of France to Louis XVIII. and his family, and united Belgium to Holland. 'The minister for foreign affairs has just asked us, 'On condition of breaking existing treaties, would you have war?'—Yes, I would answer, as to the treaties which I have just mentioned: France has made the same answer; he himself has made it.

"I could speak of other articles of those treaties, incompatible with our liberty and independence, such as the conventions for the delivering up of refugees on the French soil; and be it observed, that those treaties were not made between us and our enemies, but by themselves, who placed one of their own in the Tuileries, to traffic in our honour and our liberties.

"A third point, not less evident, was established by me the other day at this tribune, in the presence and with the assent of all the king's ministers, and particularly of the minister for foreign affairs. I am very certain that not one of them will now contradict the definition which I gave, namely, that whenever any people or country in Europe, wheresoever situated, shall claim its rights, shall seek to exercise its sovereignty, any intervention on the part of the foreign governments to oppose it will be equivalent to a direct and formal declaration of war against France, not only because of our duty to the cause of human nature, but because it is a direct attack upon the principle of our existence, a restoration of the principles of Pillnitz and of the Holy Alliance, the justifying a future invasion of ourselves, an evident purpose of crushing our natural allies in order to come afterwards and destroy the germ of liberty amongst us, who have placed ourselves at the head of European civilization.

"If the deductions from these facts, from these principles, lead to war, we must without doubt abide it, and we shall have, to carry it on, those fifteen hundred thousand national guards, those five hundred thousand soldiers, citizens likewise, of whom the president of the council has spoken to you from this tribune. I return thanks to the minister of war, for the splendid and true picture he has just drawn for us.

"A saying of Mr. Canning's has been quoted to you; it will not be like him, by shutting our eyes, but with our eyes wide open, that we shall exert our strength; aid, to remind you of another saying of that minister, on the subject of the patriot auxiliaries he anticipated; that which, on his part, might pass for a trait of vanity, it would, you know, be easy for us, to realize.

"I come now to the affair of Belgium. Gentlemen, our conduct towards her, when our government was scarcely established, was, as you have been told, frank and generous. It was unequivocally declared to the foreign courts that if Russian or any other troops set foot in Belgium, we should enter it immediately. We have recognised its independence, I wish the king's government had stopped there. I should have said to the Belgians:—'Do you wish to establish a republic, a nother Switzerland, unencumbered with an aristocracy? We will support you in it. Do you wish to elect an hereditary chief, from among yourselves, from some other country, whichever it may be? It is your own affair; it is for yourselves alone to decide. And if that free choice had fallen on the Duke of Nemours, I would have entreated, I would continue to entreat, the King of the French not to reject it.

"As for a union with France, the question to my mind would not be, what others think of it, but whether the majority of the Belgic people really desire that union; and in the latter case, well ascertained as in my opinion, the king has not the sole right either to accept or to reject such union, I should submit the proposition to each branch of the legislature. And what power would have the right to oppose it? Certainly not those that made the treaties of Lunéville and Amiens. Would they have less affection for Louis Philippe than for Napoleon? Would they fear us less now than they did then? Gentlemen, it would be a great mistake on their part; for our popular throne has not feared to surround itself with a whole nation in arms, appointing its own officers, and our strength is immense.

"A more skilful diplomatist than myself* has so fully explained the situation of Poland, that little is left me to say. It would be strange that the king's government, which has just been defending existing treaties, should not energetically demand the execution of one which, by the mere chance, has emanated from the Congress of Vienna, when it sanctions the independence of the kingdom of Poland, when it protects that nation, our most faithful friend, which has shed so much blood far us, and the existence of which forms a barrier against the barbarians of the north. Is not the duty, the honour of the government concerned in demanding with energy the execution of those treaties, the upholding of that barrier?

"Formerly the instinct of the great Frederick had discovered to him the dangers of the partition; he yielded only to the importunities of the Empress of Russia; he told me so himself. Even Austria, and it is no liberal government that I am citing, has frequently felt the same impression, and, if I am correctly informed, it was recently expressed by M. de Metternich, the least liberal of all the Austrians."

"As for England, gentlemen, recently so jealous of Russia, would she feel that jealousy only in favour of the Turks? Do I not see, besides, at the head of the administration of that country, the illustrious men who have so nobly distinguished themselves by their speeches against the partition of Poland? Do I not see there the members of that society, not numerous it is true, but celebrated, whence emanated the best and the most energetic publication in favour of Polish independence?"

"Let us hope then that the government, in fulfilling a sacred duty, will find means to serve effectually the cause of all Europe."

"I am indebted to one of my honourable colleagues * for having afforded me an occasion which I should have feared to create, of announcing from this tribune, that there exists a Polish committee, appointed for the purpose of affording to our brethren of Poland every proof of our sympathy, of sending them all the succours in our power; and I have the honour to acquaint all my colleagues of the Chamber that their donations will be received by us with great pleasure and gratitude."

"It was thus that a Greek committee was formerly established; and, while on this topic, I will express my wish that the government should at length exert itself to fix large and suitable limits to that country, including the island of Candia, the more interesting, as at the moment that the Candidates had armed themselves to complete the expulsion of the Turks, they were stopped by the interference of the maritime powers."

"Yesterday you were told of Portugal: gentlemen, I would wish to think that the king's government exerts itself to cause the name and the colours of France to be respected everywhere. I have been told of insults offered to our flag at Setuval, of a Frenchman paraded about and beaten in the streets of another town. We have been called villains in an official journal, published under the auspices of the murderer of the Marquis of Loule, the best friend of the king his father."

"At the mention of Portugal, I am indignant that any one should have dared to mix up the name of the sovereignty of the people, with that of the cowardly and cruel tyrant, as he was so properly called by his patron Lord Aberdeen! It is as if the name of republic should be given to the regime of 1793, or that of religion to the Saint Bartholomew massacre! Let no treaty then be abetted by Don Miguel, but let him be punished; he deserves to be expelled, and he will be."

"...Gentlemen, I have submitted to you some principles which I believe to be true, which it concerns our very existence to maintain, and from which we ought to admit all the deductions."

A month later, he said: "My Belgic diplomacy has always been very simple. To hasten to acknowledge the independence of Belgium, to forbid the entrance of the troops of the neighbouring powers into that country; so much has been done, and well done. To abstain from intermeddling in their institutions, or in their choices, should have been done also. Now that we have entered upon a course of protocols, it remains for the French government to defend the integrity of the territory of the Belgians, so plainly laid down in their representation to the States general, and in the declaration of independence of their provinces."

* M. Dapin, senior.

"Would it not be very inconsistent, gentlemen, that the powers which, with reason, had recognised the separation of Belgium from Holland, should resolve to look upon Russia and Poland as forming one empire, though distinct in so many respects, and declared to be so even by the Congress of Vienna; and not to consider it a manifest violation of the non-intervention principle, that the Russians have entered the Polish territory, notwithstanding all that has been said, not only by the friends of liberty and reason, but which is a very different thing, by the very acts of that congress?"

"As for Italy; in the same way that I did justice to the strong and explicit declaration which the last administration made to the powers bordering on Belgium, I wish to believe that a similar declaration, without weakness or reservation, has been; and I have reason to think that the minister for foreign affairs will not forego this assertion of the principle of non-intervention, nor the praise for which it is a subject."

"I shall only observe, that it is surprising that the Duke of Modena, whom we have known as a bad correspondent, and whom his country has not found to be a good prince, having brought away a prisoner to Mantua, that prisoner, M. Menotti, should be detained in the prisons of a foreign country, as being the only subject remaining to it; and if it were not known what Austrian prisons are, we might judge of them by certain details which have appeared on the present condition of the prisoners at Spielberg."

"But what is not easy to comprehend, gentlemen, in civilised Europe, is the manner in which the neighbours of Poland are conducting themselves towards her. Prussia, for example, has seized upon all the funds of the bank of Warsaw which had been deposited in the bank of Berlin, and which belonged, not to the crown, but to the state and to private individuals; she stops travellers, takes from them their money, and imprisons them; and all these excesses, which remind us of certain forests formerly famous, are committed through the influence of the Russian ambassador, who rules in Berlin. It seems to me that this description of intervention ought to be the subject of diplomatic representations."

In all his conversation with Louis Philippe, and all his discussions with the several members of the cabinet, Lafayette professed loudly and constantly the same principles. Whence, that flood of hatreds and invectives which all the aristocracies of Europe have poured out against him? Hence, also, the efforts of the foreign diplomacy, the influence of which determined the conduct which the cabinet of the Palais-Royal pursued towards him, as soon as that cabinet had resolved on effecting its reconciliation with the Holy Alliance, by neutralizing the burst of patriotic spirit in France, and leaving the field open to the policy of the despotic cabinets, against the nations which sought to work out their regeneration after our example. The presence of Lafayette in the councils of the new royalty, his influence in directing the public affairs, his power at the head of the armed nation, made him an object of dread to the absolutists without, as well as to those within; and I have documentary proof that the diplomatists made his removal an indispensable condition of any ulterior transactions with the cabinet of the Palais-Royal.

CHAPTER XIII.

Continuation of the foregoing—Lafayette in his relations with the foreign patriots—The Belgic deputies openly make him overtures—His disclosures respecting Russia and Poland—His relations with the Italian patriots—His letter to them.

It has been just seen that the system of non-intervention, such as Lafayette had defined it, gave at least to France an attitude which protected her interests and maintained her reputation. It was, however, easy to perceive that the Palais-Royal had no desire for the consequences of the principle it had proclaimed, and that the glory and the interests of the country had already ceased to be the ruling motives of its policy. Lafayette, alarmed at this tendency to retrograde, placed himself in steady opposition to the narrow selfishness that had so speedily succeeded to the revolutionary enthusiasm and republican sentiments which he, credulous man! had decked with a citizen crown. The spell was too suddenly broken, the mistake was too manifest, the responsibility too great, not to call forth the strongest remonstrances. Lafayette gave vent to them in plain terms, and with all that tone of authority which the sense of his right, and resentment at this unparalleled deception, gave to an honest man. His complaints were frequent and severe. "I know only one man," said he one day to Louis Philippe, "who could now drive France to become a republic; and that man is yourself. Continue to repudiate the principle which placed you where you are, and I will answer for it, the republicans, and perhaps the demagogues, could desire no better auxiliary than your majesty." "Have patience," answered the king, upon another occasion, "have patience until such a time, and you shall see." "Until such a time," returned Lafayette, "but are you quite sure that at that time you will still be reigning? For my part, I doubt it."

"In respect to the hatred with which the European aristocracies honour Lafayette, Napoleon one day said to him: 'All those people detest me heartily; they detest as well I, but; that is nothing to the hatred they bear you; I could never have conceived that French hatred could go so far.' And Napoleon had the means of knowing well how that matter stood."

It will be easily believed that observations such as these were the more impatiently listened to as coming from one who was entitled to utter them; wherefore no time was lost in escaping from the trammels of a troublesome gratitude. Lafayette was slighted by the Palais-Royal, by that Palais-Royal in which, whilst in public a filial love was professed for the veteran of liberty, it was privately said that there were three plagues to be got rid of, Lafayette, Lafitte, and Dupont de l'Eure. From that time it was evident that for the removal of Lafayette only a convenient occasion was awaited: that opportunity arrived; and we shall see presently with what art it had been brought about, with what avidity it was seized upon.

I return to the diplomacy of the early period of the revolution, as it related to Lafayette.

From the very commencement of the insurrection at Brussels, the Belgians had entered into close communication with the friend of Washington. Their deputies came to offer him successively the presidency and the crown: "This at least," they told him, "will be a citizen crown." Lafayette received these high offers with respect and gratitude, but refused the signal honour which was intended him, and recommended to the Belgians to choose, in either case, one of their fellow citizens as the head of their new government. For himself, he thought, he said, that even for the interests of the liberty of other countries his presence was more useful in France than it could be anywhere else.

Lafayette was desirous that Belgium should constitute herself a federative republic, so as to form a sort of northern Switzerland, in close alliance with France, and under her special guarantee. It was thus also that he had ardently wished to see Greece organise itself into an eastern Helvetia; hoping that the moral effect of these two democratic constitutions, and the example of order and public prosperity they would afford, would remove many prejudices, and be productive of salutary modifications in the European notions of society and government.

When, however, it appeared to him evident that the majority of the Belgians were not inclined for a republic, but were decidedly for a republican monarchy on the model of that whose principles had been accepted in France, Lafayette strongly urged that the cabinet of the Palais-Royal should abstain from exercising any influence, either on the constitution, or the choice of a prince, which the Belgians might find it expedient to adopt. In his opinion, the policy of the French government ought to be limited to securing the sovereignty of the Belgic people against the direct interference, the influence, and the intrigues, of foreign powers. After the election of the Duke of Nemours by the Belgian congress, Lafayette declared aloud for the accepting of the crown by that young prince, in the election of whom he saw only, as he said from the tribune, the rightful exercise of the national sovereignty. But all that system, to which the cabinet of the Palais Royal adhered to be wedded, had been suddenly changed by the sending of M. de Talleyrand to England,* the renewal of the Holy Alliance, and the re-assertion of the Congress of Vienna, disguised under the name of the Conférence de London. Still it is certain that the influence of Lafayette ensured to Belgium that primary independence and security which saved its new-born revolution, and enabled the country to exercise a semblance of popular sovereignty.

The concussion of July had been felt in every part of Europe. The name of Lafayette served in a manner as the conductor of the electric shock. It was in that name, it was to the cry of Vive Lafayette! that at Dresden, at Brunswick, at Hanover, and many other towns of Germany, the people awoke to liberty. The absolute governments were in consternation, the aristocracies were paralysed.

It was on the 24th of November that the Polish revolution broke out. There, likewise, the name of Lafayette, invoked by the patriots of Warsaw, resounded in all the insurgent provinces. A few months had elapsed since the friend and companion of Kosciuszko, invited to a festival held in commemoration of the birth of that great man, had paid a tribute to the national steadfastness of Poland, and foretold the approaching emancipation of that noble country. When the event had justified his predictions, his name became as a symbol of salvation, by the aid of which Poland summoned her children to arms and to liberty!

Meanwhile, on learning the news of the great events at Paris, the Emperor Nicholas resolved to raise again the standard of the Holy Alliance. War against France was decided upon in the cabinet of Petersburg, which hastened to establish magazines in Poland, and to arrange a plan of operations, in the order of which the Polish regiments were to form the advanced guard of the imperial army.

The Belgic revolution came to supply fresh food to the wrath of the autocrat, and to hasten the measures of combination and of detail which the Russian ministry had already adopted, in contemplation of an approaching and general war. These measures are attested by the documents found in the portfolio of the Grand-duke Constantine, which he left behind him in his cabinet in the night between the 26th and 30th of November. Among those important papers, of which copies were sent to Lafayette, was found the first letter that Louis Philippe addressed to the Emperor Nicholas, announcing his accession to the throne of France. Lafayette, justly hurt at the term caustrophe, which the new king had applied to the revolution of July, was desirous, nevertheless, to keep that letter from the knowledge of the public; but some copies of it having been sent likewise to England, it was published by the London journals, and soon after copied into those of Paris.

Subsequently, however, when the French ministers sought to deny from the tribune the hostile intentions of Russia, and the existence of the warlike preparations which Lafayette had denounced, the latter thought it belied him to produce the proofs, and communicated to the Chamber some extracts from the important correspondence he held in his possession. It was in the sitting of the 23d of March that this disclosure took place, which excited in the highest degree the astonishment and indignation of Europe.

The démocrates have made a great clamour about certain letters which, according to them, the general had written to Poland, previously to the revolution of the 29th of November, to incite that nation to revolt. I can vouch that all that has been said to that effect is totally false, and that these rumours were spread with no other intention than the perfidious one of throwing upon this great patriot the responsibility of the calamities which attended and have followed the defeat of the Poles.

It is the same with the pretended secret correspondence, by means of which it was said that he had stirred up the movements in Italy. This second accusation is as unfounded as the former. Lafayette was a total stranger to the Italian insurrections up to the moment of their breaking out; he had even refused to engage in an extensive plan of conspiracy in which the Duke of Modena had joined, for the purpose, as he said, of freeing Italy from the yoke of Austria and the dominion of the Pope. Solicited, by the agents of that petty tyrant, to engage in that conspiracy, and to afford him the support of his influence with the Italian patriots, Lafayette had answered, that he esteemed the duke of Modena too little, ever to consent to have any thing in common with him, under whatever pretext or in whatever interest it might be.

However, when the insurrections of Modena and the Roman states broke forth, Lafayette attached the greatest importance, and took the liveliest interest in, the success of the cause of the Italian patriots.

His first care was to call with earnestness for the immediate formation of a corps d'armée on the Alps, to keep the Austrians in check, and thus protect the free development of the popular insurrection; he then demanded that the government should notify the principle of non-intervention to the cabinet of Vienna, and declare its formal resolution to exact the most rigid application of it to the affairs of Italy. And, in effect, notes drawn up in this spirit were addressed to the courts of Vienna, Petersburg, Naples, and Turin, after being first communicated to Lafayette. Then, also, M. Sebastiani declared officially to the Pope's nuncio, that France would never suffer the Austrian arms to aid his holiness in suppressing the patriotic movements of the Legations; and, finally, Marshal Gérard received orders to prepare himself to go and take the command of a corps d'armée upon the Alps.

It was on occasion of these several measures, that the king having said to Lafayette, "But how can we reach Italy without passing through the neutral states of the king of Sardinia?" The general replied,—"If that embarras your majesty in the least, I ask only twelve days to open for you two passages wider than the columns will require. Sure, have the goodness only to inform us which way you desire to pass."

In fact, nothing, at this period, would have been easier than to obtain, not from the court of Sardinia, but from the inhabitants of Savoy, of Piedmont, and of the territory of Genoa, secure passages for a French army that should have been hastening to the succour of Italy. His letter, in answer to that which a deputation of Italian patriots had written to him, to ascertain the real dispositions of the French government in their regard, has been the subject of too many perfidious insinuations, both in and out of the Chambers, for me not to hasten here to insert that historical document. It is as follows:

"To MM. Misléy, Fossati, Maroncelli, and Linati.

Paris, 26th February, 1831.

"Gentlemen,
"I have received with the liveliest gratitude, the letter with which you have honoured my devotion to the cause of universal liberty, and our individual wishes for Italian independence. It is in reading the annals of your fine country, the earliest study of our childhood, that we have all experienced the premature throbbings of our hearts at the recital of republican actions and virtues. Twice, as you observe, that sacred fire shone in Italy. But in the present advancement of political civilization, dismembered of the old alloys of slavery and aristocracy, emanating from the sovereignty of the people, and based on the representative system, now that the imprescriptible rights of men and of societies have been clearly defined; it is the province of your admirable language to proclaim to your intelligent population, the practice to their utmost extent, of the principles of truth and perfect liberty.

"Too long, gentlemen, has Italy been the property of a few families, an object of traffic amongst them, a stage for the intrigues of foreign diplomacy, the sport of deceitful and ever-broken promises. Every friend of human emancipation wishes to see your liberty at length established upon the basis of a perfect independence and nationality.

"It is to the internal and spontaneous movements of your patriotism that the recent revolution is owing, of which the glory in being an ardent admirer. We Frenchmen of the barricades of July have had no part in it, except the merit of having set an example of courage in the combat, of generosity after the victory. We are far from disclaiming that glory; it imposes upon us, in my opinion, towards our brother freemen of other nations, sentiments and duties more binding than those of an ordinary sympathy.

"But if, on the other hand, it gives us any claim upon your attention, gentlemen, allow me to avail myself of it, to recommend to you that national and truly Italian union, which must ensure the success of your noble efforts, and the independence and prosperity of your fine country.

"You can yourselves afford to your compatriots a sincere testimony of the warm and deep sympathy of the French people towards you. You have had the opportunity of witnessing their admiration of you, their ardent wishes for your success, their longing to see the noble and classic land of Italy conquer and consolidate its liberty and independence. Those who think with me, of the Chamber, and others, especially those whom circumstances relating particularly to Poland have formed into a special committee, share this sentiment in the fullest manner, and have charged me to express it to you.

"As for the constitutional government which directs our internal affairs, I can only refer you to what it has itself proclaimed from the national tribune, and to the ascent which it has thrice given in that Chamber, by not objecting, to my definition of the French system of non-intervention. I will add, that I have had cognizance of official letters which were in unison with these principles.

"Accept, gentlemen, the expression of my gratitude, my best wishes, my zeal, my attachment, and my profound respect.

CHAPTER XIV.

Continuation of the foregoing—Lafayette in his relations with Spain.—His demands on behalf of that country.—The French government its resolute refusal to oblige.—It evicts the Spanish refugees.—Louis Philippe is in the web-suspense.—National indignation.—M. Guizot, who presided at St. James.—That minister puts into his hands a sum of money in doubtless, for the use of General Vial.—Factual proofs of all the preceding.—Change of system.—The government abandons the fugitives.—Diplomatic evictions of Austria.—Concessions of M. Lafitte's resignation.—The king's renunciation to M. Prieur.—An important despatch is kept from the knowledge of the council.—Private despatches denounce the formation of the alliance between the 13th of March.—Conduct of Lafayette during all these intrigues.

In reviewing the various acts of the foreign policy of Lafayette after the revolution of July, I ought to have commenced by giving an account of his relations with unhappy Spain. It is, in fact, the nation in all Europe, for which he had constantly struggled with the greatest interest and solicitude. Since the impious war of the Restoration against the constitution of the Cortes—above all, since the sacrilegious triumph which French soldiers had the unhappiness to obtain over the liberties of the Spaniards, amidst the applause of the despots of Europe—Lafayette had never ceased to call that crusade a national crime, and to demand for the oppressed nation the reparations that were due to it. In Europe, as in America, he never allowed an opportunity to escape him of branding the name of Ferdinand VII., of avenging the memory of that tyrant's victims, and especially that of the unfortunate Rizal. From the inauspicious day of the capitulation of Cadiz, he constituted himself, not only in the tribune, but likewise with the ministers of Charles X., the advocate of the interests of the Spanish refugees, particularly of those who had capitulated at Alcañiz and Cartagena, and that in spite of the clamours of the Chamber and the vociferations of the absolutist out of it.

Never had any people been so basely deceived; never had tyrant so unblushingly sported with sworn faith, and the rights of humanity: the government of the Restoration had acted treacherously towards the Spanish constitutionalists; but Ferdinand's conduct towards his countrymen was atrocious, hideously perjured and blood stained, notwithstanding that they had been so merciful to the crimes of his whole life. Lafayette made France and the whole world resound with those horrors which for nine years he persisted in holding up to the indignation of every manly heart.

The capitulation of Saratoga, signed by the Prince of Hohenlohe, expressed, that if the Spanish officers had any property in Spain, the possession of it was secured to them, and that no resident in the place should be molested for political opinions; notwithstanding which, the property of those officers was confiscated, and whoever had manifested the least attachment to the constitution, was thrown into a dungeon or put to death. The capitulation of Granada, signed by General Albidor; that of Barcelona, by Marshal Mancey; and that of Cartagena, by General Bonnemain; stipulated the same guarantees, and yet, the defenders and inhabitants of those several

* The appointment of M. de Talleyrand to the London embassy, is in fact so much important, and has had so much influence on the results of the revolution of 1789, that the circumstances attending it could not be interesting to us, as they are. The appointment, required by the king, was warmly conducted on the council by MM. Lafayette, Mole, Dupont de l'Eure, and Bignon. M. Lafayette particularly urged the unsuitability of such a choice; but the intrigues of the court, and the obstinacy of Louis Philippe's will, prevailed against the opinion of the friends of the revolution: Louis the XVIII's grand chamberlain was sent to London; and it was thence in winter 1791, he has there to London. [In this place M. Sarrazin calls Talleyrand "Talleyrand Personne"—Ed.]

† It was in reference to these military demonstrations that Lafayette said one day from the tribune, that the advanced guard had turned round against the main body of the army.

places experienced the same fate as those of Santana. The protocol of the conference held at Port Saint Mary, on the 7th of September, 1832, between General Alava, on the part of the Spanish government, and Generals Bordesoul and Guilleminot, on the part of France, contained the following stipulation:—"It has been agreed, that forty-eight hours after the king of Spain shall find himself at full liberty, he shall issue a proclamation, by which he shall offer to the nation a constitutional government in union with the intelligence of the age, because the interest of France itself requires that the same system of government shall exist in Spain and France."

How were those treaties executed? First came the decree of the 1st of May, 1831, which excepted from all amnesty the leaders of the constitutional army, the authors of the conspiracies at Madrid, the leaders of the revolt of Ocaña, the judges and reporters on all trials in which traitors had been condemned for conspiring against the constitutional system, the commanders of the constitutional guerrillas, the authors of publications and journals that had attacked the Roman catholic and apostolic religion, and finally, whosoever had obeyed the government of the Cortes.

Lafayette never ceased representing those general violations of the treaties concluded under the auspices and with the participation of France, as so many insults offered to our national dignity. He denounced particular cases of a yet more atrocious nature. For instance, a Catalanian, Joseph Peponore, received an amnesty from Ferdinand, in 1828. The letters of pardon expressed that Peponore was free, as well in his person as in his effects. The general in chief commanding in Catalonia, himself sent to this proscribed individual the original act of amnesty, and the unfortunate man, with this document in his possession, re-entered Barcelona; where, two days after his arrival, he was first shot, then hung, and then quartered.

In 1836, Ferdinand VII., having himself repaired to Catalonia, to suppress the formidable insurrection that had just broken out in that province, had granted an amnesty, which included, generally, all the insurgents and chiefs of insurgents. Under the protection of that amnesty, dated from Tarragona, the two principal contrivers of the movement, Vidal and Olivier, presented themselves to the king, who not only received them with apparent kindness, but even ordered that three months' pay should be given out of the royal treasury to Vidal and his comrades. Five days after, this same Vidal, and the other chiefs of the insurrection, were arrested, put to death without trial, and a label was attached to the foot of each of those victims, bearing these words—Hung up by order of the king.

Lafayette displayed a generous pertinacity in publishing those royal infamies: "Put back," said he, repeatedly, "put back the Spanish constitutionalists to the same point where your iniquitous war found them, and you may then make as much of neutrality as you please." These were not the only services he rendered the patriots of the Peninsula. He corresponded with the several factions of the national party, who, amidst their unhappy dissensions, were unanimous in their confidence in him. Lafayette had even imposed upon himself, for the success of their cause and for alleviating their individual sufferings, pecuniary sacrifices, disproportionate to his private fortune.

Such were the respective situations of Lafayette and the Spanish patriots, when the revolution of July exploded. It appeared to him that this great event ought to decide the fate of Spain. "The moment was decisive for the two countries; Lafayette felt it to be so, and wished to unite the cause of France with that of the neighbouring nation; he thought that, at the same time that it would wipe away a small part of the shame with which the war of 1821 had covered us, a revolution aided by us in Spain, in the spirit of liberty and our principles, would extremely simplify our foreign policy, by relieving us, in case of war, from the necessity of keeping up an army of thirty or forty thousand men on the Pyrenean frontier, to prevent Ferdinand and the Carlist emigrants from exciting counter-revolutionary movements in the south of France. It was a right of self-defence, for which the attitude of the cabinet of Madrid sufficiently indicated the necessity to the new government that was directing the affairs of France. In fact, Ferdinand VII., from the very outset, had positively refused to recognise the revolution of July, and the king who had sprung from it. His prime minister had even gone so far as to address, officially, to all the authorities of the kingdom, a circular most insolent to Louis Philippe, and most hostile to the principles of July. For which reason, the power of the barricades, isolated as yet in its usurpation, and not even daring to hope for the tardy and ungracious recognition which it has since begged and obtained, had serious thoughts of fomenting other revolutions analogous to that on which its own existence depended. In short, the plan of a political proselytism was organised, and secretly put in practice, by the council of Louis Philippe. This, once for all, it is necessary to prove by irrefragable facts, as well for the sake of the morality of governments, as for the edification of nations. Here follow those facts, such as they are established by the documents now lying before me, and which I shall have great pleasure in communicating to the ministers, should they be wanted to refresh their memories."

It has been said, that immediately after the events of July, the Spanish constitutionalists had spontaneously hastened to Paris. This assertion is incorrect. The revolution of July certainly awakened in the breasts of those brave men the sanguine hope of regaining a home. But the greater number of them, confined by their absolute want of means to the places where they had found shelter, left them only at the secret solicitation of the French government. It was thus, for example, that this government invited into France all the Spanish refugees at that time in England. If this were not the case, the ministry of that period would doubtless inform us why Colonel Valdes, Messieurs Llaño, Navarrete, Inglada, and some other Spanish chiefs known all over Europe for their persevering opposition to the government of Ferdinand VII., having, in the early part of August, 1830, landed at Havre without passports, received them from Paris upon the request of the under-prefect, in order to repair to the Pyrenean frontier; why two hundred refugees of the same nation, landed likewise at the same port, were there formed into detachments, commanded by Spanish officers chosen by themselves, and then forwarded towards Bayonne and Perpignan, with route bills regulating the pay and other allowances, the same as for French troops, who were ordered to march, and why the same thing was done at Calais, at Boulogne, and at Paris.

The government shamefully denied these facts in the tribune, and maintained that it had granted the Spanish patriots only passports of poverty. Passports of poverty to go where? Into Spain, to seek, no doubt, in executions, some relief of their misery. A few words will suffice to prove the falseness of this assertion. From the 1st to the 30th of December, 1830, detachments of thirty to forty Spanish refugees were leaving Paris every day for the Pyrenees, with collective passports, and those passports were delivered, by authority, to a commanding officer, who was commissioned to receive the pay of the whole, and to distribute it among his soldiers. I have before me, for example, the route bill of a detachment of thirty-seven men, which left Paris on the morning of the 7th of December, appointing the halting places, at Arpajon, Etampes, Orleans, Baugency, Blois, Chateaufort, Poitiers, &c.

The fact is, that in the interval of a few hours, the diplomatic injunction to suppress the patriotic attempts of the Spanish constitutionalists, had reached the Palais-Royal together with the menacing and insulting recognition by Ferdinand VII., and that, elated at this spurious adoption, the royalty of the barricades did not hesitate for a moment to repay it with an act of perfidy.

All the facts I have just related are strictly correct: the proof of every one of them is in my hands. Nevertheless, the ministry dared unblushingly to deny them. M. Guizot maintained, in the tribune, that if the ministry of which he formed a part, had been indulgent to the Spanish patriots, it was because the government gave way at the time to an influence it could hardly resist. Lafayette scorned this mode of insinuation, and declared that he recognised and avowed himself to be the object of the ministerial allusion; but it was easy to perceive, by the constraint with which he spoke, that, aware of some weighty circumstance, he wished to avoid compromising any one but himself in the whole of that affair: that circumstance I shall now state, because it is necessary that France should know it, and because, having passed at the Council and in the presence of eight individuals, it is at this day any thing but a state secret.* It is this: The crown granted one hundred thousand francs towards the success of the expedition of the Spanish constitutionalists; and that sum was converted into two letters of credit of fifty thousand francs each, one of which, on a banker of Marseilles, was given to the unfortunate Torrijos: this is the naked truth.

It is known into how many detestable persecutions

* I must here declare, on my honor, that however pressing my solicitude to M. de Lafayette to confirm to me the truth of the facts, I have never been able to get him to acknowledge it. The general has always, on that point, given an evasive answer.

that protection from the highest quarter has been converted, on the faith of which so many victims hastened to the scaffold. The refugees brutally dispersed; their slightest motions pointed out to the Spanish authorities; the brother of the unfortunate Riego driven from Paris; Torrijos, the aged Lopez de Caldera, the generous Pinto, and fifty other martyrs of liberty, urged into an ambush, and murdered without trial on the part of Spain, without remonstrance on the part of France which had placed arms in their hands: such were the results of the confidence which those victims had placed in the good faith of the government arising from the barricades; such, too, is the responsibility that rests on the heads of some men: Machiavelian policy will perhaps absolve them; but so long as humanity shall be any thing more than a vain word, will she not call them to a severe account for so much bloodshed and so many calamities?

The ministry of the 13th of March asserted in the tribune, that the Italian insurrection had broken out without any concurrence on their part. They spoke the truth, in this sense; that they shrunk at the outset from the necessity of openly turning to advantage the political interests which those insurrections had created them in Italy; and that they did not dare to support by their arms the nucleus of partisans, and the public opinion so favourable to France, which had declared themselves among our neighbours on the other side of the Alps. But the ministry lied to France and to the world, when they affirmed that they had been constant strangers to the revolutionary movements of the Italian peninsula, and had promised nothing, guaranteed nothing, to the Italian patriots. In the case of Italy, as in that of Spain, political proselytism, as a system, entered into the calculations of their original policy. A few facts will suffice to demonstrate the truth of this assertion. And let it not be forgotten that these facts are irrefragable:—

That which the new monarchy had done for the Spanish constitutionalists, did likewise, much more timidly, for the Italian refugees. A great number of them were forwarded secretly to Lyons, and to various other points of the Alpine frontier; pecuniary assistance and other means for travelling were afforded them; arms in sufficient quantity were collected, with the full knowledge of the government, at Lyons and Grenoble; a central committee, the whole of whose operations were communicated to the ministry, was established at Lyons, from whence it acted freely and under the effective protection of the local authorities, civil as well as military; in fine, Louis Philippe, having fruitlessly written to the late king of Naples and to his young successor, to engage those princes in an alliance with new France, and to grant a constitution to the Neapolitans; and seeing plainly that his good advice would not be listened to, unless favoured by the uneasiness which the patriots of the two Sicilies might occasion their government, General Pepe was requested to present at the Palais-Royal a draught of a constitution, which was forwarded to the Neapolitans. However, as justice is due to every one, I ought to add, that Pepe, having expressed to Louis Philippe his intention of repairing to Naples, the king sent word to that general that he would not advise him to take that step, for he could not answer for the safety of his person.

Lafayette, however, placing little confidence in those private assurances, and wishing to have a public declaration on that point, called three times upon the ministry, the tribune, and thrice he obtained the official assent of the government to his definition of the system of non-intervention; a definition which left no doubt as to the conduct France would pursue in respect to Italy. Not satisfied yet, with the public approval of the cabinet, Lafayette wished likewise to be assured of that of the king. He therefore went to Louis Philippe, and said to him: "Have you read my speech upon the system of non-intervention, and do you approve of the definition I have given of that system?"—"Assuredly, yes," answered the king. "I have then the assent of Your Majesty?" replied the general.—"Most undoubtedly," added the king.

It was during these transactions that the insurrection of Modena broke out, and then that of Bologna. The patriots of central Italy, not having the least doubt of the concurrence of France, but wishing to ascertain to what extent they might rely on her support in certain circumstances, had sent deputies to Paris to assure themselves of the intentions of the new government, in the probable event of an attempt at armed intervention on the part of Austria, in the affairs of Modena and the Legations. These deputies received, in several interviews with the minister for foreign affairs, the formal and reiterated promise that France would never permit the interference of Austria, and that if a single regiment of the emperor's troops passed over the frontier of the duchy of Modena or of the Papal states, a French army would penetrate at the same moment into Italy. Lafayette, to whom the Italian deputation had likewise applied, and who was more sensible than any one of the depth of the abyss into which a misplaced confidence might precipitate the Italian patriots, repaired to M. Sebastiani, implored him to let him know, on this subject, the intentions of the cabinet, and received from him the same protestations that had been made to the deputation. It was on the faith of these guarantees that the insurrections of Modena and Bologna took place, the issue of which, skillfully directed, might have placed in our hands the whole moral and physical strength of Italy.

Such was the state of things, when the government of Louis Philippe, repelling roughly and indignantly all idea of identification with the Italian patriots, and even the suspicion of any patronage whatever of the proscribed foreigners, sent Lieutenant General Bachelin to Lyons, with orders to dissolve the Italian committee which had been formed there with its apoplexy, to seize the collections of arms that had been made there with its tacit consent, to disperse the refugees who had gathered on the Alpine frontier, and to paralyse all the insurrectionary measures which it had urged them to take for restoring liberty to their country.

In order to understand properly the whole extent of that shameful abandonment of principle, it is necessary to examine into the real causes which produced it.

Struck with the amazing event of July, the kings of Europe saw their dominions exposed to the irruption of the revolutionary torrent; and, in their first alarm, they awaited, as for the accomplishment of a decree of fate, the concussion with which their thrones were threatened. Events were happening every day to confirm that apprehension. Already Belgium, Switzerland, and Poland had interposed themselves between the French principle of the sovereignty of the people, and the foreign doctrine of legitimacy. Germany itself saw the gathering of the thunder cloud, precursor of the tempest. Every where the warmest sympathy for our revolution was the predominant feeling of the people. In short, it was impossible for the absolute monarchs to think that France would be so insane, as not to avail herself, whatever in other respects might be her moderation, of the embarrasments in the midst of which her enemies had so suddenly been plunged. It was evident to those cabinets that a modification, more or less important, in the treaties of 1815, would be the inevitable consequence of the overthrow of that monarchy, the existence of which those treaties had guaranteed. None foresaw, nor could foresee, that there would be found among us a cabinet capable of condemning the France of July to remain a mere spectator of the events that were going to take place in Europe. In fact, it is one of the prodigies of that period, that a few men should have appeared capable of abandoning the position in which the revolution of July had placed their country, and disregarding the palpable necessity of directing every negotiation in the view of obtaining compensation for the painful sacrifices imposed upon France by the treaty of Paris.

Austria understood very well the logical inferences from that position. It involved for that power, the preservation of the choicest jewel of her crown, Lombardy, which threatened to follow the example of the insurgent states of central Italy; Piedmont already felt itself disturbed by the rising of Parma; the German troops were scarcely sufficient to restrain the Austro-Italian populations from the lake of Como to the Venetian canals! The cabinet of Vienna saw perfectly well that the presence of a single French flag on the southern declivity of the Alps, would be sufficient to throw all Italy into a flame.

In this state of things, Austria, at the same time that she was marching the flower of her army into Italy, where she expected to fight us, was the first to open negotiations with France, the object of which was to prevent, or at least to postpone, a conflict, upon the issue of which might depend the loss of her possessions in Italy. M. d'Appony presented, at the time, to the cabinet of the Tuileries, a verbal proposition, which M. Sebastiani laid before the council, and the objects of which were:

1st. To allow Austria to occupy immediately the Duchy of Modena, on the ground of the house of Hapsburg's reversionary title to that duchy, after the extinction of the reigning dual family.

2d. To unite in prevailing upon the Italy See to grant a representative constitution to the states of the Church.

3d. To consider, jointly and severally, of the means of effecting a general disarmament throughout the continent.

This threefold proposal gave rise to warm discussions in the council. The king, who, even before the question relative to the Duchy of Modena had been brought under deliberation, had declared for the occupation of that state, on the ground of the reversionary title above stated, urged anew his opinion in favour of that concession. M. Lafayette warmly opposed it. That minister stated in support of his opinion: 1st. That the succession to the Duchy of Modena was not open; 2d. That even were the reversionary title claimed by Austria actually acquired by that power, the interests of France, and above all, the moral interests of the revolution of July, would oppose invincible barriers to the permission of its exercise.

As for the constitutional institutions to be obtained for Romagna, and the possibility of the council showed the absurdity and impossibility of any such project, so long as the temporal power of the sovereign pontiff should not be separated from his spiritual power. "Only imagine," said he, "a chamber of peers composed of cardinals, and an elective chamber filled with rectors and vicars!" In the disarming proposal, M. Lafayette saw only a leurre on the part of Austria; a means for procuring delay, brought forward to paralyse the activity of France, and hurl her into a deceitful security. In short, the president of the council, considering the whole of the Austrian proposal as a deception directed against France and the order of things which had sprung out of the barricades, demanded that a note, based on the reasons he had laid down, should be immediately addressed to the cabinet of Vienna, to notify to it the positive refusal of France to adhere to its proposals, and her resolution to exact, by every means in her power, the rigorous observance of the principle of non-intervention, proclaimed by her as the basis of her foreign policy. Such was likewise the opinion of Lafayette relative to the affairs of Italy, and that opinion he expressed with an earnestness that had the effect of overawing, at least in appearance, the weaknesses which had already conspired to sacrifice the principles and the men of July.

The other members of the cabinet, and the king himself, appeared to be on the side of the advice of MM. Lafayette and Lafayette; and, on the next day, M. Sebastiani read to the council a note drawn up in the spirit of the opinions expressed the day before by the prime minister.

Was this note forwarded to the court of Vienna? We must believe it was. At all events there arose from that moment some very serious surmises of the existence of a secret correspondence between the Palais-Royal and the foreign diplomatists, in the minds of the patriot ministers who then formed part of the cabinet of Louis Philippe. M. Lafayette suspected, with pain, that despatches of the first importance, and the results of which might implicate his responsibility, were kept from the knowledge of the council; when a fortuitous circumstance occurred, which changed that suspicion into certainty.

It was a short time after the discussion which I have just related, respecting the affairs of Italy, that is to say, on Tuesday the 5th of March, 1831, that a courier from Vienna had brought to M. Sebastiani a despatch from M. de Metternich, who informed his government that M. de Metternich had just notified to him, that the Austrian cabinet did not recognise the principle of non-intervention, and that his own firm determination was to interfere, by arms, not only in the states of Parma and Modena, but in all the provinces of Italy to which the insurrection should spread. "Hitherto," M. de Metternich said, "we have allowed France to put forward the principle of non-intervention, but it is time she should learn that we do not mean to recognise it in what concerns Italy. We shall carry our arms whithersoever the insurrection shall extend. If this intervention must lead to war, be it so; let war come. We would rather run all its chances than be exposed to remain in the midst of popular tumults."

"You know," wrote our ambassador, "that hitherto no one had declared more openly for peace than myself; but I am now convinced, that to ward off the dangers which threaten France, it is necessary, without delay, and before the Austrian levies are organised, to be first in the field, and throw an army into Piedmont."

This important despatch reached the minister for foreign affairs on Saturday the 5th of March. A copy, in the handwriting of the son-in-law of M. Sebastiani, was immediately forwarded to the king; and yet, on Tuesday the 7th, no communication of it had been made to the council of ministers. M. Lafayette himself was informed of it only through an indiscretion committed in the office of the Hôtel des Capucines. He repaired immediately afterwards to the Palais-Royal, and asked the king if he knew of a despatch from Vienna, that was said to have arrived at the Foreign Office three days before. The king answered that he did, and on Lafayette's expressing his astonishment, the prince explained that strange silence by the necessity of sometimes guarding against the indiscretions committed in the council. The minister of war came in just at the time. M. Lafayette having put the same question to him as to the king, Marshal Soult answered that he was completely ignorant of that circumstance, and manifested the greatest indignation against M. Sebastiani, whom he called a traitor. Finally, came in the minister for foreign affairs, who, upon being questioned by the president of the council, answered, stammering, that he had certainly received a letter from Marshal Maison, but that that letter was not of great importance, and that, besides, he had not had time to communicate it to his colleagues. However, upon the demand of M. Lafayette, the minister, who had not yet placed the despatch in his portfolio, went to his office to fetch it, and at last laid it before the council. The opinion of the members to whom the existence of that document had been a secret, is, that the king and M. Sebastiani had intended to keep it from their knowledge.

From that moment, and notwithstanding that it was promised that a similar mystification should not be repeated, M. Lafayette determined on retiring. I can affirm that his resignation was owing principally to the opinions which the king entertained upon the foreign policy of France. That prince would have peace at any price, and declared openly, that, whatever in that respect might be the opinion of his council, his own was irrevocable and unalterable.

Nevertheless, Louis Philippe opposed or feigned to oppose with all his might M. Lafayette's intention to retire, by which retirement, said he, his friend would do him more harm than he had done him good by assisting to place the crown upon his head. However, at the end of an audience in which he again laid down his system of government, a system of moderation and progression, diametrically opposed to that in which the king declared his intention to persist, M. Lafayette entreated his majesty to accept his resignation, and earnestly advised him to entrust the presidency of the council to M. Casimir Prier. The king again refused to accept his resignation, and evinced the most unqualified aversion for the successor whom Lafayette had named. Louis Philippe said, at the time, that he had a decided antipathy to M. Casimir Prier's imperious character, to his constant ill health, and even to the colour of his face.*

Notwithstanding all that, M. Lafayette, resolved at any rate to withdraw from a false position, unworthy of his political honesty, convened next day a council of the ministers, which met at the Treasury, and in which, after representing the system pursued until then as destructive to the principles of the revolution of July, to the interests and the honour of France, he again unfolded his notions of government, and called upon his colleagues to choose without delay between the adoption of his system and his immediate resignation. His colleagues were silent; he renewed his question yet more urgently; the same silence ensued; one of them only, M. de Montalivet, answered that, for his part, he was more inclined to conform to the system of M. Prier than to that of M. Lafayette. At those words M. Lafayette declared the sitting ended. This was on the 11th of March; the next day, the 12th, the resignation of the president of the council was tendered for the third time, and accepted by him who, a few days before, had again told him that St. James and St. Philip were united on earth as they were in heaven.

Such were the circumstances that led to the formation of the ministry of the 13th of March.

Here a question suggests itself, which has given rise to doubts unfavourable to the good faith of the citizen monarchy, but for the solution of which history is as yet only furnished with conjectures. It is asked whether the regret so lavishly expressed for the retirement of M. Lafayette, and the dissolution of his cabinet, were really sincere; or whether, on the contrary, the temporary employment of some patriots in the conducting of the public affairs had not been considered merely a necessity of the moment, and their removal premeditated from the very day of their accession, and prepared by an intrigue of which the secret was made on the 13th of March, were only the natural winding up? However readily we may be lieve in the existence of every species of political hypocrisy, one is reluctant to admit such a construction as would prove the throne of the barricades to be nothing but the stage of a mountebank, upon which every thing, even to the effusions of friendship, is a mere farce. I will not, therefore, believe that, in high places, affection, gratitude, reluctance, and tears, have been only acted, but will take all these demonstrations to be true. However, it is a positive fact, which I put without comment to the consciences of my readers, that, before M. Lafitte's accession to the presidency of the council, some one who was labouring to procure the appointment of M. Périer, received from the latter this very significant answer: "It is in vain; the moment is not yet arrived; Lafitte must go first."

* This antipathy to M. Casimir Prier, whether real or affected, was not the only sacrifice that the monarchy of the barricades imposed upon itself in the choice of its ministers. It is well known that in their familiar communications, the king and the Duke of Orleans professed at that time, the most fervent contempt for Marshal Soult, and often amused themselves with laughing at the gasconading efforts of that minister to get himself appointed president of the council.

I have spoken at some length of the circumstances relative to the ministry of the 3d of November, because they bear the same character of political apostasy as those which led to the removal of Lafayette from public affairs. However, it would be a great mistake to conclude from this coincidence, that an absolute identity of principles existed between the commander in chief of the national guards of the kingdom and the ministry of the 3d of November. In another chapter of this book, I shall prove, on the contrary, that decided differences of opinion upon the most essential points of our internal and external policy often broke out between Lafayette and that cabinet, collectively considered. Thus, for instance, they constantly differed upon the question of the tax paying qualification for electors and deputies, upon the liberty of the press, the security to be given by the proprietors of newspapers, the monopoly of printing, &c. But now that they are confounded in one common reproach in the eyes of the court, and those intriguers who obstruct its approach, I have thought it better only to make one general mention of the slight which had to be endured by patriots, who differing as to the means, agreed as to the principle; the triumph of the revolution of July; the interest and the honour of France.

In the midst of all the struggles which he had to sustain in the council and at the tribune, to save the honour of France and the liberty of her most natural allies, Lafayette did not forget other interests extremely dear to him, although they were being agitated at a distant age. Under the impression that had just perished, he had in vain urged, for ten years, the recognition of the South American states. But the old government, restrained by family considerations, and remaining deaf to the call of the commercial and political interests of France, had allowed England, by the priority of her relations with the new states of that rich hemisphere, to take possession of all the advantages which a similarity of manners, climate, religion, and the experience acquired by our commercial transactions through the medium of old Spain, had opened to us in vain.

Lafayette thought, that France having shaken off the yoke of the Restoration and of the Holy Alliance, should seize upon this moment to make a frank and plain declaration of the independence and the nationality of the old Spanish colonies. Consequently, in the first days of the revolution of July, he ascended the tribune, interrogated M. Molé, and drew from the government an official declaration, that France recognised, as independent states, the different republics of South America; that she was ready to treat with their envoys and to accord her own to their governments. This was a great point in diplomacy, which perhaps would have been still in dispute, had not the man of the two worlds caused it to be decided, more through the power of circumstances than by the wish of the men in power. When, in fact, would we venture to assert that, had Ferdinand VII. required the non-recognition of his old transatlantic possessions, as a condition of his recognising the accession of Louis Philippe, that concession would have been refused him?

Such was Lafayette in his relations with diplomacy, with the patriots of every country, and with the external policy of France, after that Revolution which was to have restored France to the rank and consideration of which the Bourbons had despoiled her.

Brought up in the grand school of revolutions; instructed by the contemplation of the vicissitudes which accompanied the emancipation of America and of the finest country in Europe; by turns an actor and a victim in these tragic performances; Lafayette had acquired, by the experience of half a century, the entire conviction that the most solid security for the liberty of a nation, is the liberty of all those which are contiguous to it; and that, for a revolution to become stable, especially on a continent, it must be defended by a combination of general interests, and of occasions for mutual assistance, dictating the constant use of the same means against the projects and the pretensions of the same enemies. From these opinions, determined on for fifty years, upon affairs of government, has sprung that unalterable attachment of Lafayette to all those nations who have either conquered or endeavoured to conquer their liberties. Hence that filial love, that unlimited confidence, that religious veneration, which all the patriots of Europe and America testify towards the veteran of the cause of the people.

This almost universal naturalisation of Lafayette is, undoubtedly, an absolute phenomenon in the history of the world. It may be conceived that the man whom all the states of South America, from Chili to the Isle of Palma, have chosen as the arbiter of their destinies; whom North America claims as one of her purest glories; to whom the people of Europe testify the same feelings, in proportion as they wish to be free; it may be conceived, I say, that such a man has an existence apart in the politics of the world, an existence which, to make use of his own expression in a letter to his constituents, he is far from wishing to resign. This patriotic universal is an object of terror to the despotism and the aristocracy that weigh so heavily upon the world. But the friends of order and of a wise liberty, can and do only see in it a moral power, which may immensely contribute towards the emancipation of Europe, and the introduction into the code of public law which is now preparing, of true principles of equality, liberty, and order, at the least possible cost of disturbance and suffering.

CHAPTER XV.

Trial of the ministers—This event awakens the expectation of all parties—the apprehensions of the Palais-Royal—The Court places all its hope in Lafayette—Flattery, promises, and protestations, with which he is loaded—With what intention he renews his demand of the abolition of the punishment of death—Disposition of people's minds—Measure taken by Lafayette to secure the lives of the accused and the independence of the judges—He compromises his popularity—Result of the trial—The danger passed, ingratitude revives.

The divergence of political opinions and views which already separated Lafayette from the men of the 7th of August, was still increasing, when the approaching trial of the ministers gave another colouring to the intentions of the court with respect to the commander-in-chief of the national guards of the kingdom. The most entire confidence in the most affectionate defence, the most filial respect, succeeded, on a sudden, to the suspicions, the umbrage, the jealousy, and the private sarcasms, which had already fallen to the lot of the noble general.

Lafayette was not deceived by these demonstrations; he pitied the feeling that dictated them; and although he very clearly foresaw their termination, he nevertheless persisted in the resolution of performing his duty in every particular; and, if necessary, of sacrificing his popularity for the honour of the revolution of July. Attached to this revolution, even to enthusiasm, his chief aspiration was that it should go down to posterity as the beau idéal of popular omnipotence.

To any other than Lafayette, the project of saving a few men, whose hands were steeped in the blood of so many patriots whose graves were scarcely closed, would have been insurmountably difficult; any other popularity than his own would have inevitably perished in the attempt. The names of the ministers whom he wished to save from the vengeance of the people, reminded them of a war unto death, and sworn from all time, against our liberties. These men had been selected by the oligarchy from among the most guilty and the least sympathetic towards France, among the actors and the accomplices in all the counter-revolutionary plots that had been carried on for forty years. They were the promoters of all the intrigues, the performers of all the violences, with which the country had been harassed under the Restoration. In whatever way they were considered, these men, submissive yet despotic, ferocious yet inebriate, the refuse of the emigrants, or the tools of the Empire, had presented a contradiction, the most extraordinary by which national probity had ever been insulted. They had, moreover, conceived, meditated, and signed the ordinances; they had caused the capital to be fired upon during three days; twenty thousand families called them to account for the loss of a husband, a father, a son, or a friend, murdered by their orders. And to what class did these victims belong? To that precisely which Lafayette particularly cherished, and by which he was the most sincerely beloved and respected.

Almost the whole of the national guards also demanded against the ministers the most severe application of the law for the punishment of high treason.

On another side, the most opposite parties, the most irreconcilable passions, the most contradictory expectations, were all centred at the trial of the ministers. This moment was awaited with equal impatience by the Carlists, the Bonapartists, and particularly by the foreign cabinets, all firmly believing that the monarchy of July would not survive this great trial of its stability.

This situation, already so difficult, became still more complicated, by the presence of a number of returned transports, thieves, and malefactors of every kind, who, having derived no profit from the grand week, hoped to find in a new commotion, an ample indemnity for the sacrifices imposed upon them by the sublime popular probity which sanctified the days of July. In fine, it was necessary to add to all these elements of disorder, the secret but very active co-operation of the police, which, after living upon the wages of the Empire and of legitimacy, was inclined to give itself up to any other power that would offer it greater profits and more security for its duration than a throne of yesterday, which nobody expected would last.

As for the republican youth, already so dissatisfied with the crooked march of the new government, it is but justice to say, that whether through a conscientious feeling of legal order, or apprehending a disturbance favourable to the Carlist or Imperial interest, or whether, in fine, their affection for Lafayette was stronger than their resentments, they sacrificed every other consideration to the public tranquillity, and cordially seconded the zeal and the efforts of the national guard.

Meanwhile the capital was a prey to the most dreadful anxiety. At court, at the exchange, in the saloons, in the counting houses, in the warehouses, everywhere, the men, who after the danger, most ardently wished and called for the dismissal of Lafayette, were not the least forward in sounding his praises, and proclaiming him once again, the saviour of his country, and the saviour of the monarchy. The Palais-Royal, which had become the asylum whither all the tremblers of the higher classes had taken refuge during the storm, were in ecstasy, while shaking with fear, before the unrivalled man, whose virtues, they said, eclipsed the finest characters of antiquity. Just then, when the name of Lafayette was mentioned, every thing that was loyal, patriotic, and disinterested, was aroused. If recollect a few jokes passed by the Prince-Royal, at the expense of the pale faces, the grotesque confusion, and the doctrinaire quakings, which his father's palace exhibited. "It was enough to make one die with laughter," said His Royal Highness.

Such was the disposition of men's minds, when the king's council apprised Lafayette that the fullest powers were entrusted to him, and that he was to remain invested with them during the whole time that the trial of the ministers should last. The police of the Palais-Royal, of the Luxembourg, and of the Chamber of Peers, the command of the troops of the line, together with that of the national guard, were exclusively confided to him. Where the duty of Lafayette was clearly traced out, he could not hesitate in his decision. He willingly accepted all the responsibility thus accumulated upon a man of seventy, and took upon himself to ensure the regular course of justice, and the strict execution of its sentence whatever it might be.

The following is the order of the day which he published on this subject: I only give this document as the starting point of the measures which we shall find him taking.

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE 8TH OF DECEMBER, 1830.

The General, commander-in-chief of the National Guards, being ordered by the King to take also the command of the troops of the line that shall be on duty on occasion of the trial of the ministers, gives the following directions:—

"The chief of the staff of the National Guard, and General Fabvier, will make arrangements to carry into effect the measures ordered by the general in chief concerning the removal of the prisoners to the Luxembourg, and the maintenance of public order.

"Generals Fabvier and Carboneau will transmit the orders of the general in chief to the troops, whether of the national guards or the line, as also to Colonel Feistmantel, first in command, and to Lieutenant-colonel Lavoet, second in command.

"In the absence of the chief of the general staff, the aides-de-camp G. W. Lafayette and Joubert will fulfil the duties of under-chiefs of the staff, and one of them will remain at the quarters of general staff, with the general in chief, to sign orders.

"From the 14th of this month, and until further orders, the major-generals, colonels, superior officers of the staff or of the legions, and all the citizens composing the national guard of Paris and its district, are not, under any pretext, to put off their uniform.

"The national guards forming part of the battalions of reserve in each legion, may attend to their private affairs, on leaving, however, information at their dwellings, where they are to be found in case of their being called for.

"Those who shall be on guard at the Luxembourg, are not to leave their posts without a written permission from the officer first in command. From the same period a chief of battalion shall be on guard at the chef-lieu of each arrondissement, and shall proceed to execute the orders given by the general staff, or by Generals Fabvier and Carboneau.

"Particular instructions will be sent daily to each chief of a legion or commanding officer."

"LAFAYETTE."

From the time of the arrest of the ministers (which was quite fortuitous, and certainly independent of the will of Louis Philippe, who wished their escape) Lafayette had used every means to save those deeply guilty men from the almost inevitable fate that threatened them. He wished that they should be made the subject of a severe example of national justice; but it was repugnant to his feelings that the people of the barricades, after having been so generous to Charles X., should show themselves vindictive and implacable towards those who carried into effect the counter-revolutionary will of that despot; more especially as these same ministers, who had no protector but himself, were the very men who but lately had ordered him to be arrested and shot. Besides, Lafayette idolised the revolution of July; and the mere idea of seeing it lowered to the system of the scaffold, would, in his opinion, detract from its romantic character, or, as I have already said, from its beau idéal.

It was with this intention (openly avowed, notwithstanding the popular irritation which it must of necessity excite among) that Lafayette, who, besides, had always shown himself opposed to the punishment of death, particularly for political offences, had supported, on the 17th of August, the proposition of M. de Tracy, tending to obtain the immediate abolition of that punishment. Lafayette did not dissuade that the great approaching trial was an additional motive with him for soliciting the Chamber to adopt the proposition of his honourable friend; for he said upon every opportunity, he thought it was of the greatest importance that victims should no longer be sacrificed after the combat. And when his friends observed to him, that his anxiety on behalf of those guilty ministers would render him very unpopular, at a time when the relatives and friends of six thousand victims were calling for justice on the blood that had just been shed, he replied, that "popularity which is the most valuable of treasures, the only one that is worthy of ambition, is, however, like all other treasures, intended to be expended in the promotion of the public welfare and of justice, of the true national interests, such as they appear to the conscience of him who makes use of it."

He had delivered the following speech upon this painful subject, three months previous to the trial of those ministers, who, but eight-and-twenty days before, had pointed him out to the executors of Charles X.:

"I think that the abolition of the punishment of death is a principle, or rather an isolated opinion, independent of the political considerations of which I feel, as he does, the necessity. I will persist in calling for it, as long as the infidelity of man's judgment shall not have been proved to me. This question, gentlemen, is not a new one: the abolition of the punishment of death has been called for, in all times, by the most respectable publicists. It was called for in the Constituent Assembly by many deputies, of whom I shall only mention three: Adrian Dupont, a most enlightened magistrate; M. de Tracy, the father of my honourable friend the author of the admirable Commentary upon Montesquieu; and the virtuous Larochefoucauld, the truest model of a great and excellent citizen, so lamentably, so basely murdered at Gisors, after the 10th of August. This question at present occupies the senate of the United States. It has been introduced there by the same Edward Livingston who has completed the work commenced by him in the legislature of the state of Louisiana.

"How unfortunate gentlemen, were the abolition of the punishment of death should not have been adopted by the Constituent Assembly! How much irreparable grief would have been spared us! And what would not the greater number of those even who concurred in those various and multitudinous condemnations have given, a short time after, to redeem, even at the sacrifice of their blood, the part which they had taken in those sentences? I acknowledge, gentlemen, that since our political storm, I feel an invincible horror of the punishment of death. Our present revolution bears quite a different character from the preceding revolutions. With patriotism and courage we have seen the greatest generosity united. It was worthy of this last revolution to distinguish itself, thus early, by the great act of humanity which my honourable friend has just proposed to you. I vote for its being taken into consideration."

I render homage to the feelings that placed such language in the mouth of him who has been called with reason, the legislateur of the Constituent Assembly; of him, who, forty years before, had joined his voice to the eloquent voice of Dupont, in demanding the suppression of this human immolation. The inviolability of the life of man, has been, at all times, in the eyes of the most enlightened philosophers, the principle upon which all human society rests; and the time is doubtless not far distant when this conservative principle will be established, and momentary utility will give way to eternal justice. As the honourable M. de Tracy has said, "Nothing but what is just and true, can be really productive of beneficial consequences."

Nevertheless, it may be allowable to ask, whether the moment was opportune for submitting this important question to the legislature, when, in order to proceed consequently, it would have been necessary, first of all, to enter upon an entire revision of the penal code, the Draconian severity of which still bears the impress of the most intolerable despotism? In order to save a few great criminals, ought the question to have been treated in this isolated manner, while, in the general opinion, its consideration called for long meditation, profound discussions, and a time of tranquillity?

In fine, the punishment of death being in force at the time the ministers were brought to trial, and when enormous crimes had just been perpetrated against what is dearest to man—liberty; was it not to be feared that, in depriving the law of its strongest sanction, the authority of the national sovereignty might be weakened, and the charge of a partially entirely aristocratic might be incurred? I declare, that, in my opinion, as in that of every conscientious man, the punishment of death ought to have abolished. I also declare, that after contending with all my feeble means to save the wholesale murderers employed by Charles X., from the death which the vengeance of the people might have inflicted upon them, I congratulate myself every day more and more that the national justice did not bear heavily upon them. But when I reflect upon the considerations which seemed to justify the making a great example, such as the necessity of binding the cause of the new monarchy to that of the revolution, by a decisive act of retribution, to strike terror into all who might attempt to tread in the footsteps of a felonious cabinet, and to prove to Europe that an impassable abyss separated the revolution from the new order of things; when, above all, I remember the disposition of people's minds, and the violent exclamations which called for the punishment of those signal criminals, and when I see that the axe of the executioner has again fallen upon the necks of the people, as soon as it ceased to be suspended over those of their most implacable enemies; then I cannot forbear saying, that in those most trying circumstances, Lafayette gratuitously staked his influence and popularity for the gratifying of an exalted feeling of generosity and humanity. M. de Polignac had set a price upon the head of Lafayette; Lafayette resolved to save the head of M. de Polignac: history will perhaps declare, that this conduct showed the man—the virtuous man, no doubt; but has not virtue also its pride?

However that may be, all Europe had its eyes fixed upon Lafayette. His enemies awaited the event with the strongest hope—his friends in the most painful anxiety: both saw in it the necessary termination of his popularity, and consequently of his political existence. In fact, symptoms of deep dissatisfaction on account of the solicitude he showed in favour of the prisoners at Vincennes, broke out even in the midst of his staff. There, as among the people, the national guards, and the youth of the schools, indignation was manifested at the idea that the instigators of the ordinances of July, the authors of the massacre of seven thousand patriots, should enjoy a scandalous impunity, ere the ashes of their victims were yet cold. A cry of vengeance re-echoed from all sides; and it was only, it must be said, in the hope of obtaining that vengeance from the law, that the people refrained from taking it with their own hands.

"This exasperation of the public mind, well known to Lafayette, which was exaggerated to him by his partisans as well as by his adversaries, only made him still more determined to withstand the storm, and to procure at any sacrifice, that the law should be respected. He accordingly took every measure which his vast command placed at his disposal, to maintain public tranquillity; to preserve the lives of the accused ministers, and the independence of the high court, which had reconciled itself to passing judgment on its friends.

In 1783, as in 1830, Lafayette, in his efforts to maintain public order, had always acted upon the principle of avoiding sudden and alarming movements, of preventing rather than repressing, of persuading rather than coercing. This system was constantly to stem the torrent of popular tumult by patience and the raisonnée of great masses, rather than by those murderous charges and noisy demonstrations, which in general appeared to him only calculated to sow the dangerous seeds of hatred and revenge among the citizens. As he has himself said, that which he feared the most was, to excite the animosity of the working-jackets against the uniform of the national guards; a consideration all-powerful in his eyes, but which, however, never prevented him from manifesting firmness in the execution of his duty, however rigorous it might be.

This prudence, at once peltic and paternal, was always advantageous to Lafayette. I have frequently had an opportunity of convincing myself that the benevolent zeal of his fellow citizens of every party, procured him information, upon which he took measures that generally anticipated the tardy communications which the police transmitted to his staff. This system of firmness and conciliation was at all times the rule by which he was guided. It will be seen on looking over the journals of the day, that in the most difficult periods of our first revolution, it often happened to him, in order to avoid a collision between the national guard and the people, to throw himself alone in the midst of a tumultuous populace, to quiet them, rescue the victims, and himself deliver up the guilty into the hands of justice."

The doctrinaires have had the insolence to tax the conduct of Lafayette with weakness and with succumbing to the mob; and this false imputation has not been without its influence upon superficial minds, who prefer adopting a given opinion to observing and reflecting for themselves. There are it may be, but here be the place to say, that never, and least of all during his command of 1830, did Lafayette obtain popularity by ill-timed concession. Let the disturbances that necessarily arose in the first ebullition of the revolution of July, be compared with the disturbances occasioned by the reactionary policy of the cabinet of the 13th of March, and let it be candidly declared whether any parallel exists between the relative importance and disastrous consequences of the one and of the other. I do not yet speak of the deplorable conflict that has just filled the streets of Paris with blood: those days of mourning will find in this work a place that was not reserved for them.

As M. Odilon Barrot reminded the present ministers, in speaking of the last events of Lyons; in the early days of the revolution, when the popular agitation was at its height, numerous and formidable assemblages having manifested improper intentions, Lafayette and the prefect of the Seine, men of the revolution and the movement, succeeded in repelling those tumultuous demands with a very different firmness from that which was evinced by the men of the juste milieu. There, also, the government in difficult circumstances, men still covered with the dust of the barricades, demanded, with loud cries, an increase of wages; others the demolition of machinery, which they erroneously considered injurious to their interests. Well; let us be kindly informed whether the general in chief, or the first magistrate of the department of the Seine, surrendered, in any of these crises, a single principle of justice and political economy. I recollect that some time after the trial of the ministers, M. de Montalivet being present, some ardent patriots came to inform Lafayette that a numerous assemblage were proceeding to the triumphal arch of the Tuileries to tear off the trophies of the Trocadero. What was the general in chief's answer? That he detested those impious trophies, as much as any body could; but that it was intended to destroy them in an illegal manner, he would march against the tumultuous assemblage; and the assemblage retired at the voice of Lafayette. It is true, that when the patriots had retired, he strongly urged the minister of the interior to cause those bas-reliefs, detestable monuments of a sacrilegious victory, to be immediately removed. M. de Montalivet promised their immediate demolition: these banquets, however, of the Restoration, were permitted to remain until after Lafayette's resignation. Another assemblage came to demand their removal, in the presence of the king, of the new general in chief of the national guard, and the commander of the first military division, who were then reviewing four battalions in the court-yard of the Tuilleries.

* A circumstance related by M. de Montalivet, in his Mémoires (in other respects very partial and unequal, concerning the first revolutionary movements, which were only known to the author, then in retirement at the extremity of Auvergne, through the influence of some officers who appeared at Paris) is thus stated: "The anxious anxiety which always characterised the conduct of Lafayette, even towards his enemies. M. de Montalivet relates that at the termination of a very serious trial, the condemned were brought to the guillotine, and M. de Montalivet, struck with the proximity with which some paternal guards kept following him, and having asked the governor of the prison who appeared to follow him in a more particular manner, he learned, with gratitude, that on all similar occasions, Lafayette ordered the national guards to watch secretly, that the deputies of the Cité did not experience any insult on the part of the people, whose irritation he had excited."

In the same manner were effaced those dear fleur-de-lis for the preservation of which so much anxiety had been manifested. Two popular tumults were requisite, before it was decided upon to remove these emblems from the pediments of the Palais-Royal, and from the panels of the carriages of the citizen king; which made Lafayette say, when Louis Philippe was complaining to him of the demands of the people; "You know that I have always wished the removal of those ensigns of Coblenz and of the Restoration; I would have destroyed them much earlier than you have done."

The patriots attached much importance to the removal of the remains of Manuel and Foy to the Pantheon. Six thousand young men, accompanied by a number of national guards, took possession of the busts of those great citizens; and in their generous impatience to pay the debt of their country, they were marching in procession to the temple, when, rushing forward to meet these masses, and representing to them that by such proceedings they were taking the law into their own hands, M. Odilon Barrot prevailed upon them, without difficulty, that the two busts should be deposited in the great hall of the Hotel-de-Ville, until a bill, which he promised to solicit, had legalised the removal of their mortal remains to the Pantheon. And, indeed, the government hastened to ratify the promise of the prefect of the Seine, by appointing a commission, over which Lafayette presided, and composed of Marshal Jourdan, M. de Schoenlin, Jacqueminot, and Casimir Delavigne. This committee drew up a projet de loi, which was agreed to, and presented to the Chamber, by M. Guizot. But that was only a compromise with danger, a deception, a cowardly act on the part of the men of the 14th of August, who, after eighteen months' delay, have succeeded in keeping from a sepulchre, on which is inscribed, To the great men, their country grateful, the remains of those men to whom France incontestably owes the most gratitude. The petty incidents and the miserable intrigues are not forgotten, which but lately compelled the honourable M. de Salvette to withdraw his motion, to avoid new insults to the memory of the defenders of liberty. But, what is not known, and what will probably appear incredible, even at this time so fertile in monstrosities, is, that the only cause for the repugnance falling from so high a quarter upon the remains of Manuel, was the anathema which this great orator had dared to hurl against the elder branch of the Bourbons. There are certain places where they were shocked at the bare idea of seeing a French chamber beneath immortality to a tribune of the people, who had dared to proclaim, in the face of the world, that an invincible repugnance separated France from the men of Coblenz and of Quiberon. Could the dynasty of the paving stones, in conscience, forgive this insolent contempt for the Lord's anointed?

It is useful to recall these circumstances to the recollection of those champions of order and force, who, for these eighteen months, have represented the men of the people as promoters of disorder and anarchy; poor statesmen who aver that their very unpopularity is owing to their talent for governing, and who affect to be kind but it is precisely that instinctive sympathy between the masses and certain men, which enables them more easily to govern by persuasion or by force, the most stormy passions.

"True popularity," as Lafayette has said, "does not consist in doing whatever pleases the multitude, but in the success with which you can persuade them that they ought not to do what is wrong, or in the firmness with which, when requisite, you can prevent them from doing so without losing their affection."

By such marks true popularity is known; not that which has just denuded the streets of Lyons, Grenoble, and Paris with blood; which marches only with the lighted match and the bayonet; which scatters on all sides hatred and revenge, fills the country with conspiracious and plots, and divides France into five or six armed factions, in order to live suspended amidst their divisions. This popularity does not belong either to Lafayette or his friends; their is that whose moral power has sufficed during eight months of political storms and convulsions, to settle an empire shaken even to its foundations; to defend French society against the greatest dangers that have ever threatened it; to reserve for the operation of a doubtful law and a suspicious tribunal, the greatest criminals that have called down upon their heads the vengeance of the people, and save, in spite of itself, a monarchy which was hastening to its ruin; and all this, as M. Lafayette has observed, without causing a single individual to put on mourning. Such is, however, the popularity which the chefs de parti accuse of incapacity for government. But the waves fluctuate, and ministers likewise: let us have patience.

To return to the trial of the ministers. On the breaking out of the first troubles in Paris after the events of July, Lafayette, admirably seconded by the two prefects of the Seine and the police, and more immediately by the chief of his staff, had made arrangements by which fifteen thousand men of the national guard might at any time be assembled in arms at designated points, the intervening spaces being constantly occupied by troops of the line, equally well distributed by the judicious care of General Fabvier.

These measures to ensure public safety, did not appear to Lafayette sufficient to arrest the torrent which threatened to overflow the capital from all quarters. In fact, there were no longer partial assemblages to be overcome, but an insurrection, the more formidable as its ranks were swelled by the discontented of all parties, and even by a great number of excellent citizens, who, strangers to every faction, only conceived themselves to be moved by a laudable feeling of indignation against the impunity promised to the ministers of Charles X. All men, in short, conscientious or not, joined in the same cry of "Death and Revenge!"

The Luxembourg, the Palais-Royal, the prisons, the public establishments, and private property, might be, and in fact were, equally threatened. The prudence and the activity of the general in chief were proportioned to the multitude and the imminence of the dangers against which he alone had to contend. His first care was to arrange and establish constant communications with the President and the Grand Referendary of the Chamber of Peers, the ministers of war and of the interior, the prefects of the department and of police, Generals Fajol and Fabvier, and the chiefs of the legions of the national guard.

After securing the co-operation of all the citizen militia, and combining their movements with those of the troops of the line; after providing for all contingencies, and dividing the general command of Paris into four principal sections, entrusted to the inspector general and three major generals of the national guard; after particularly providing for the safety of the Palais-Royal, and of the Hotel-de-Ville, Lafayette turned all his solicitude towards the Luxembourg, against which the popular waves were about to dash.

The principal command of this leading point of every attack, was entrusted to Colonel Fialaud; and the second command to Lieutenant Colonel Lavocat, who, implicated a few years before in a political trial, had been condemned to death by the Court of Peers, and to whom Lafayette thought it would be granting a noble compensation, to place under the safeguard of his good faith the judges who but recently had sentenced him to death.

When those plans were settled, the ex-ministers were transferred from the castle of Vincennes to the prison of the Luxembourg, in which the generosity of Lafayette had prepared for those great culprits every comfort which could alleviate their misfortune.

The government had wished that their removal should take place in the night. Lafayette, on the contrary, required that it should take place in the day-time; and this confidence was successful; the objects of so much hatred and menace traversed at noon, and without receiving a single insult, the most populous parts of the capital, filled with an irritated but silent multitude.

No one, however, could mistake the thoughts of the people. The death of the ministers was evidently desired and expected; and it was certain that if they consented not to take justice into their own hands, it was only because they had a firm conviction that the Court of Peers, whatever its partiality, would never dare to refuse them the heads of the guilty.

Lafayette understood the necessity of no longer keeping up that delusion, and of preparing the public mind for what he was well aware would be the issue of the trial. Then, and in spite of the solicitations of the men who really feared, and of those who secretly wished the loss of his popularity, he declared, in an order of the day, that whatever the sentence of the high court might be, he would take care that it should be respected.

The following is the document which, summing up the principles of his long political life, attests the abnegation which he always made of himself in the greatest crises of our two revolutions.

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE 19th OF DECEMBER, 1830.

"In the circumstances which different passions and different interests, at the expense of public peace and legal order, endeavour to render critical, the general in chief commences by thanking all the national guards and troops of the line, who, in the services they have performed these few days past, under his orders, have shown by their zeal, their good spirit, and their union, that the cause of liberty has good defenders against anarchy and contempt of the laws. The testimonies of confidence and affection which he has lately experienced while visiting the posts, as well from the troops under arms as from the rest of the citizens, have moved in his warmest gratitude. These sentiments are entirely reciprocal.

"The commander in chief, at the beginning of this week, when the glory of the great week appears in danger of being tarnished by disorders and violence, thinks it his duty to remind his fellow-citizens of the principles and experience of his whole life.

"He will not address himself to the counter-revolutionists, to the partisans of the fallen dynasty, to the old servants of all autocracies and of all despotisms, who, not content with the protection given to them by a generous people, and by the rights of a liberty making no exceptions (the only true liberty), would wish, as in the first Revolution, and at the risk of being themselves its victims, to bring back a third Restoration by disorder, and, under a hypocritical mask, to substitute licentiousness in lieu of liberty, to which it is a mortal enemy, to pollute, by anarchy and murder, our spotless revolution, to encourage our external enemies, to dispel the admiration of the world, and thus to destroy the effects of the example we have given it; the general in chief has never had any thing in common with them.

"Still less does he address himself to those men habituated to crime, ardent for pillage, who may regret that the rapidity and the purity of the victory did not leave them time to execute their wicked purposes. Most certainly, under whatever pretext they disguise themselves, they will not mislead a virtuous, laborious, intelligent, people, who, even in the heat of combat, have testified their horror of such excesses and such men.

"But it, among that population itself, there should be found well-intentioned although misled citizens, who might think they were serving justice by committing against her the greatest of crimes, that of ananizing the judges, or taking, as it is said, justice into their own hands; who think they can serve liberty, which is sovereign justice, by employing means which liberty repudiates; who, in short, on account of partial discontents, would desire to destroy their own work, at the risk of whatever might happen; I will remind them that it was thus, at a former period, the French people fell successively into the horrors of an anarchical and sanguinary tyranny, whence proceeded bankruptcy, famine, and the marminas; then, through a course of despotism, to the shame of a Restoration imposed upon us by foreigners.

"The confidence, however, of the general in chief in the Parisian people, in the brave and generous conquerors of July, in that energetic youth of whom he glories in being the constant friend, in his dear fellow soldiers of the national guard, has not been for one instant shaken: thus they will always find him, who he was at nineteen years of age, what he was in 1793 and 1830, and what he will continue to be during the few years he may yet have to live; the man of liberty and public order, loving his popularity much more than life, but determined to sacrifice both, rather than fall in any duty, or permit a crime, and deeply persuaded that no end justifies the means which public or private morality disavows.

"He thought at our barricades, that the present government, founded upon the sovereignty of the people, having at its head Louis Philippe the First, was the best arrangement which, under the circumstances of France and of Europe, we could adopt. He thinks so still; and defends the government, not only because he has promised to do so, but also because he has not changed his mind. As to the other combinations of our political existence, as to the secondary measures of administration, it is in the tribune, it is anywhere except in an order of the day, that he ought to state his opinion. A popular throne, surrounded by republican institutions; such was the programme adopted at the Hotel-de-Ville, by a patriot of 1789, become a citizen king. The people, as well as the king, will show themselves faithful to that contract.

"The general in chief, quite certain of being supported by his patriotic fellow citizens, some of them his fellow soldiers, all of them, he ventures to say, his friends, in his devotion to the principles of liberty and public order, which he will never abandon, even should he find himself alone, now depends upon their co-operation for the strict and faithful execution of all their duties."

This language raised up against the general in chief all the parties whose expectations it thwarted, or whose passions it irritated. These different parties did not think themselves beaten; and horrible cries for vengeance and death were a prelude to the scenes which were to accompany those memorable debates. Paris was in a state of consternation, as if on the eve of one of those inevitable catastrophes of which it is impossible for mortals to calculate the results. In the eyes of the people, it seemed possible for the Republic, the Empire, the Restoration, the Convention, Napoleon the Second, Henry V., Charles X., any thing except the establishment of the throne of Louis Philippe, to arise from this chaos.

It was in the midst of this general panic that the trial commenced. The peers themselves were struck with terror; and it was only after long endeavours, and the reiterated assurance given by Lafayette that he would answer for their inviolability with his own head, that our conscript fathers commenced those debates in which their dearest affections were in question.

Lafayette had composed the garrison of the Luxembourg of national guards and troops of the line, between whom he had done all in his power to establish the most perfect harmony. Numerous battalions of the Parisian guard defended all the approaches of the palace; others were on duty at the Louvre, the Palais-Royal, and the Chamber of Deputies, or were stationed at the different points of the capital at which popular assemblages might form themselves with the greatest facility: the legions belonging to the district of Paris occupied, as corps of reserve, the boulevards; and were connected by posts, at short intervals, with the armed force especially charged to cover the Luxembourg. In fine, numberless patrols were marching in every direction through Paris, for the purpose of dispersing the different assemblages that were continually forming in increasing numbers, with the intention of proceeding towards the Luxembourg. However, in spite of all the precautions which prudence and energy could dictate, immense crowds had formed at every point of the capital; violent tumults broke out; the streets and open places adjacent to the Luxembourg were soon taken possession of by an insurgent populace, which, and a portentous circumstance it was, were not the people of the barricades.

The danger was growing more and more imminent: the dense ranks of the battalions which defended the advanced posts were broken: the people were already attacking the great gate of the palace; horrid cries resounded even in the interior of the tribunal; a few more efforts on the part of the insurgents, and all would have been over; the sanctuary of justice would have been sullied by the blood of the accused, and, perhaps, by the cries of their judges: the revolution would then have been dishonoured; and God only knows what storms might have fallen upon France!

Lafayette, who, from the commencement of the trial, had established his head-quarters at the Luxembourg, did not hesitate, according to his custom, to leave the protecting ranks of the national guards, and throw himself into the midst of the insurgent crowds; he would not permit any one to follow him, except some of his aides-de-camp, of whom I was one. It vain it was represented to him how rash this step was, inasmuch as the multitude, at whose mercy he was placing himself, did not consist of the men of July. And, indeed, this disorderly assemblage of the most degraded portion of the populace of Paris and the political factions, had nothing in common with the determined but honest aspect of the combatants of the barricades. They no longer consisted of those honest working men, with sinewy arms, covered with dust, and blackened with gunpowder, fighting for the liberty of their country, but a crowd of thieves, convicted criminals, abandoned characters, and agents of the police, who are constantly at the service of whomsoever will pay them, whose ignoble features and ragged appearance contrasted at every step with the aristocratic manner and elegant attire of the agents who directed their motions, amongst whom were to be observed several clergymen in disguise. Nevertheless, Lafayette threw himself into the midst of this lawless mob, from whom, however, he received no insult, and who stopped at once at the voice of the very man who had been held up to all their hatred, and who, they were told, wanted to save the lives of the enemies and murderers of the people.

This step, bold even to temerity, saved the Luxembourg. The mob, however, returning to its first impulse, soon recommenced the attack; but the national guard opposed their efforts and their cries for "death!" with so much patience and admirable courage, that the Court of Peers were enabled from that moment to continue their discussions in full security: the furious cries for the death of the ministers, no longer reached them; and the sentence was pronounced without a single drop of blood being shed, or even a single shot pilgrimed.

It was upon this day of difficulty that Lafayette published the following order of the day:

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE 21ST OF DECEMBER.

"The general in chief cannot find terms adequate to his feelings, to express to his fellow soldiers of the national guard and of the line, his admiration and gratitude for the zeal, firmness, and devotion, which they manifested during the difficult events of yesterday. He knew well that his confidence in their patriotism would be justified on every occasion; but he regrets extremely the fatigue and inconvenience to which they are exposed, and he wishes it was in his power to obviate them: but he is only at liberty to praise them. We all equally feel the necessity of defending the capital against malevolence and anarchy, of protecting the persons and property of families, of preventing our revolution from being tarnished by crime, and our honour from being compromised. We are all bound, as one man, to execute those sacred duties; and in the midst of the sorrow which the tumults of yesterday have caused him, and those which are threatened to-day, the general in chief experiences much consolation, and a perfect security, in the sentiments which he entertains for his dear and brave comrades in the defence of liberty and public order.

"LAFAYETTE."

The tumults of the day before were indeed renewed on the 21st of December; but anarchy, still powerless, exhausted itself in vain efforts; the law was triumphant.

However, the Palais-Royal, which was still threatened by great danger, thought fit to stimulate anew the zeal of its defenders. The king addressed a letter to the general in chief, which the latter communicated to the national guard in the following order of the day:—

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE 22d OF DECEMBER.

"Every order of the day, at this crisis, can only repeat the thanks of the general in chief to his dear fellow soldiers; because every day gives them new claims to his public and personal gratitude. Their conduct under present circumstances will be useful to the general cause of liberty and public order. It will show what those institutions are which are founded upon an enlarged and complete confidence in French rights and feelings; it marks out our duties, which we will all fulfil; and the revolution of July, which recalls to the general in chief so many recollections glorious for his dear comrades, so many marks of their affection and confidence towards him, forming amongst us all, men of July, an indissoluble bond, shall remain great and generous."

"The general in chief would wish to particularise all his obligations, but what can he do more satisfactory to the national guard has just published this letter which he has just received:

The King's Letter to Lafayette.

"Tuesday Morning, 22d December.

"It is to you, my dear general, that I address myself, in order to transmit to our brave and indefatigable national guard, the expression of my admiration for the zeal and energy which they have shown in maintaining public peace and preventing all disorder.

"But to you, likewise, my dear general, I must return thanks, who have again given us, on those difficult days, an example of courage, patriotism, and respect for the laws, which you have so often manifested during your long and noble career.

"Express, in my name, how much pleasure I experienced in seeing the revival of that fine institution of the national guard of which we had been almost entirely deprived, and which rose again in all its vigour and patriotism, finer and more numerous than ever, as soon as the glorious days of July had broken those shackles by which they had hoped to nullify it. It is this great institution that ensures amongst us the triumph of the sacred cause of liberty, as well by causing our national independence to be respected abroad, as by preserving the authority of the laws from any attack at home. Let us not forget that there is no liberty without law, and that there is no law where any power succeeds in paralysing its action and setting itself above it.

"Such are, my dear general, the sentiments which I beg you to express on my part to the national guard. I rely upon the continuation of their efforts and yours, in order that nothing may disturb that public tranquillity of which Paris and France have so much need, and which it is so essential to maintain.

"Accept at the same time, my dear general, the assurance of the sincere friendship which you know I entertain for you.

"LOUIS PHILIPPE."

However, almost the whole of the inhabitants of Paris, and of that same citizen guard which had so courageously protected the lives of the ministers from the summary justice of the people, positively expected that the high court would pronounce upon them sentence of death. On the other hand, the enemies of the new order of things, who were acquainted with this disposition of the public mind, and who wished a violent reaction to take place, had, some hours before the pronouncing of the sentence, spread the perfidious report that the peers had sentenced the ministers to capital punishment.

This intelligence, intentionally scattered through every part of Paris, was received with genuine enthusiasm; even those who had expressed the greatest horror at any attempt against the lives of the ministers, or the independence of their judges, assented to the terrible verdict which they believed had been pronounced; but great was the disappointment and indignation of all these men when they heard that the punishment of death had been evaded, and that perpetual imprisonment, if there could be anything perpetual in politics, was the only punishment reserved for the men who, during three long days, had deluged the streets of Paris with blood.

When this sentence was made known, a violent agitation broke out among the battalions of the national guard on duty in the court-yard of the Luxembourg, and they loudly demanded to be immediately relieved. These honest citizens had endured every kind of fatigue and privation, they had braved every menace, and used every effort, to prevent the ministers from being assassinated; their presence and to procure to them all the guarantees of a regular trial; but they had not conceived it possible that the authors of so many massacres and calamities could escape the punishment which the law of the country irremissibly inflicts upon less guilty criminals.

This explosion of discontent, extremely serious, on account of the social position of the men amongst whom it was manifested, might spread to a distance, and occasion incalculable evils. Lafayette, who was still at the Luxembourg, proceeded with all haste to his comrades, and addressed them with feeling and persuasion; and so strong was the affection which bound the national guard to its old general, that at his voice, the anger of those brave citizens was appeased, as if by enchantment.

Meanwhile, it had been necessary to reconduct to Vincennes the prisoners, whose sentence, severe as it was, produced on the public mind the effect of an absolute bill of indemnity. The government had proposed to remove them secretly, in the night which preceded that on which the sentence was pronounced. Lafayette was not of this opinion: he wished that the ministers should be taken back to Vincennes in the same manner as they had been brought to the Luxembourg, namely, in the day-time, and that their removal should not take place until after the sentence, whatever it might be.

However, the jurisprudence of the Court of Peers not requiring that the accused should be present when the sentence was pronounced, Lafayette effected their removal immediately after the termination of the debates.

For this purpose, he had arranged beforehand with the president, that the accused should be carried back to that part of the palace which served as their prison, as soon as the legal forms permitted; and with the minister of the interior, that they should be transferred to Vincennes in the most private manner, and as quickly as possible. The execution of this important measure was entrusted by Lafayette to the exclusive care of General Fabvier, who acquitted himself of it with the intelligence and zeal which that worthy officer ever manifested in the discharge of his duty.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon. The troops of the line and the national guard who defended the Luxembourg, those who were charged to keep order in the interior of the palace, the crowds which besieged all its approaches, every one, except the judges and a few privileged persons, were under the impression produced by the rumour of the sentence of death which was said to have been pronounced against the ministers of Charles X. And, as I have already observed, this sentence had been received with almost universal satisfaction. No one expected the comparative acquittal of the accused, who, themselves, when brought back to their prison, were trembling with the apprehension of falling victims to the popular vengeance, yet more than of their being led to execution.

When Lieutenant-colonel Lavocat came and announced to the condemned, that they were about to be carried back to the castle of Vincennes, the impression produced on them by this intelligence evidently was, that their last hour was approaching; and on Colonel Lavocat's telling them that he would be answerable for their lives, they prepared to follow that officer to the entrance-hall of the palace, where the guard of the prison was waiting for them under arms. Profound anxiety was depicted on the countenance of M. de Polignac; resignation and courage were visible in the calm and expressive features of M. de Peyronnet; the aspect of M. de Chantelauze, was that of a man in the greatest anguish of mind, which he was struggling to overcome; he inspired an indescribable feeling of regret and pity; M. Guernon de Ranville strove to appear indifferent; but he was only resigned. The whole four of them, it must be said, manifested, at this trying moment, the dignity of misfortune, and a determined courage. The act of Lieutenant-colonel Lavocat, delivering up his prisoners to Colonel Feistharn, who was waiting for them at the head of the national guard on duty in the interior of the prison, may be termed a dramatic scene. What might be the conduct of that guard at the sight of those great criminals who, they thought, had been sentenced to death, and whom they now saw escaping the sword of justice. And if, recollecting the blood of a father, a brother, a son, or a friend, shed by their hands, a single national guard had greeted their passage with a cry of vengeance, what might not have been feared from the exasperation of the thirty or forty thousand infuriated men, who, not more than a hundred paces from thence, had been loudly calling, the last four days, for the death of the ministers? But the conduct of those brave citizens, was that of men of honour; the condemned passed through their ranks, which stood in silent submission to a sentence they did not approve; without a word, a look, or a gesture, that could either wound or alarm them.

In this manner the prisoners arrived at the carriage, surrounded by a detachment of cavalry under the orders of General Fabvier, who had also stationed numerous posts upon the whole road along which they had to pass. Seated in a light calash, by the sides of which General Fabvier and the minister of the interior were galloping, the prisoners were rapidly conveyed to Vincennes; and, if I am not much mistaken, the moment when the drawbridge of that ancient fortress was raised behind them, was the happiest of their whole lives. Be this as it may, no attack, no accident, no tumult took place, during that short but perilous journey.

I have related what happened at the Luxembourg, when the sentence and the removal of the ministers became known at one and the same time. What would have happened had those two circumstances been known a few minutes sooner, it is impossible to say.

On the following day tranquillity prevailed in the capital; and Lafayette, mindful of the great service which the national guards of Paris had just rendered to all France, testified his gratitude to them in a public proclamation.

Order being every where restored, danger over, all fears dissipated, nothing new opposed the manœuvres of the enemies of the programme of the Hotel-de-Ville, the diplomatic intrigues, every kind of jealousy which, previous to the trial, had pursued a man who had never designed to take a step or speak a word to defend himself from them, revived with the return of tranquillity; and in the following chapter it will be seen with what indecent ingratitude they proceeded to heap deceptions and disgust upon this saviour, to whom, a few days before, they professed to owe every thing, from the crown itself, even to that respect for order and the law, which can alone give it splendour, value, and durability.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Court, the Chamber of Peers, the Chamber of Deputies, the ministry, and the foreign diplomats, all rose together against Lafayette—Motives of this conspiracy—Cannines circulated abroad—The ministry of the third of November shews insincerity towards Lafayette—Proof of the duplicity of that ministry—Exposition—Sitting of the 24th of December—Lafayette gives in his resignation—Unpublished letter of Lafayette to the king—The king's answer—Singular excuse—Interview between Lafayette and the king—Their explanations on the system of government—Lafayette persists in tendering his resignation—Another unpublished letter from Lafayette to the king.

The sentence which condemned the ministers of Charles X. to perpetual imprisonment, was delivered on the 21st of December, at half past ten at night. The exasperation of the enemies of the royalty called citizen, was at its height; other disorders, equally serious with those of the three preceding days, broke out on the 22d; and, upon this occasion, all the attacks of the discontented were directed against the Palais-Royal, where consternation and terror prevailed; but these new efforts of powerless rage were again broken by the unshaken firmness of Lafayette, the devotedness of the national guard, and the cordial and decided co-operation of the youth of the public schools.

On the 23d, order was completely restored; and, as I have said just before, nothing now seemed to oppose the development of the machinations which the suspicious jealousy of the court, the intriguing ambition of the doctrinaires, and the interested malevolence of the foreign diplomatists, had contrived against Lafayette.

This conspiracy of the musty remains of every gony-by regime, against the purest and most unalterable patriotism, had been for a long time preparing. Long before, these honest doctrinaires, in concert with certain ambassadors, had taken care to publish in some English and German newspapers, that Lafayette was more a king than the king himself, and that Louis Philippe was nothing more, in the hands of the general in chief of the armed nation, than an instrument which the latter made use of to deceive foreign cabinets, until he should have laid the foundations of a vast republic, and implanted throughout all Europe his dear American institutions. The most insidious caricatures were shown to Louis Philippe, representing him with the crown in his hand and Lafayette saying to him, "Sir, pray be executed!" Some deputies even went so far as to affect calling Lafayette, in the saloons, and even in the king's cabinet, the mayor of the palace.

The court, on its side, was extremely disposed to attend to these insinuations; indeed they were not necessary to evince its extreme dislike for Lafayette. In fact, although he had professed the sincerest affection towards this family from the time he had become acquainted, as he imagined, with their private life; and although from the simplicity of their domestic manners, he had concluded that they cordially entertained national sentiments; however, as he witnessed his behaviour to the king, as well as the terms in which he spoke of him in the tribune and every where else; in fine, however sincere the private and public testimonies of affectionate regard lavished upon him by Louis Philippe; it was evident that a court which already meditated the revival of the royal etiquette and antiquated pomp which Lafayette thought were buried for ever, a court canker-eaten by the juste milieu, by quasi restoration and quasi-legitimacy, must feel impatient and humiliated under the influence of a citizen whose very presence reminded it incessantly of the programme of July, and the republican conditions of the monarchy of the barricades.

* To any one who saw, in the early period of the royalty of July, the family of Louis Philippe, sitting round a work-table, and exhibiting the most paternal, the most filial, and the most simple manners, the delusion of Lafayette will appear quite natural: the spectacle of this palace, then only guarded by the men of July, to whose fidelity the most honourable guarantee was a long time wanting, the sight of the simple and beautiful furniture which adorned the apartments, caused even the Americans to say, that it was exactly the same as at the residence of the President of the United States. What a difference between that confidence, that security, and the distrust and golden ride which now surround themselves with the worn-out faces of the Restoration. Who, at that time, would have ventured to predict the restoration of that crowd of gentlemen of the bed-chamber, ladies in waiting, aides in waiting, officers d'ordonnance, cup-bearers, and chamberlains; in fine, that herd of valets, that now separate the king from the rest of the nation?

The dislike of the Crown was heightened by that of the old European aristocracies, which, during half a century, have professed their abhorrence of Lafayette, as the most persevering enemy of divine right, exclusive privilege, and of all the abuses for the preservation of which cabinets are leagued against the emancipation of the people. After making incredible efforts to destroy him in 1792; after throwing every obstacle in the way of his release from the dungeons of Olmutz, at the end of five years of horrible captivity; after being, in 1815, on the point of finding him at the head of a renewal of the movement of 1789; after witnessing his triumphant journey through America, and enduring the attacks which, during fifteen years, he daily directed against them from the tribune; those aristocracies, becoming more implacable the more he humbled them, again saw him suddenly stationed at the helm of a revolution entirely popular, rejecting any throne but one combined with essentially republican institutions, and himself, at all times a declared republican, giving, from the very outset of that revolution, a high tone to French diplomacy, and making it proclaim the system of non-intervention which was to ensure the emancipation of the nations, and the destruction of the treaties upon which the Holy Alliance rested.

Nothing, therefore, was more natural than that all the old cabinets should unite their efforts to overthrow Lafayette, and neutralise the decisive influence which he was likely to exercise over the new destinies of Europe. For which purpose the diplomatists raked up every precedent, to convince Louis Philippe of the impossibility of any good understanding being established between a cabinet subjected to the guidance of that man, and the old governments towards whom he had manifested the most irreconcilable enmity during forty-five years. They represented that his removal was a concession sufficient to purchase the good-will of the cabinets for the new dynasty, whilst, if that concession were refused, it would be necessary to prepare for all the consequences of the displeasure of the Holy Alliance.

To use the words of an ambassador, fear effected even more than diplomacy had promised itself. The disgrace of Lafayette was readily conceded, without reflecting that this scandalous sacrifice would tend to the advantage of the enemies of France without in the least altering the nature of the question, the radical incompatibility between absolute governments and revolutionary monarchies.

On the other hand, as soon as it found itself safe, the Chamber of Peers, whose influence was all-powerful in the new court, beheld in Lafayette only the declared enemy of hereditary right, which had already received from him a mortal blow, and which he would certainly never allow to raise its head again.

And, finally, the doctrine portion of the elective chamber, the men of the double vote, the partisans of the hereditary dynasty, all those whom fear, conviction, or attachment to aristocracy, had thrown into the ranks of the juste milieu, recollecting, with bitterness, that in the revolutionary movement of July, the patriotic solicitude of Lafayette had given them no time to declare against the forfeiture of the crown by the ex-royal family, the primary principle of the sovereignty of the people, the arm of the whole nation, appointing its sixty thousand officers, the programme of a popular throne surrounded with republican institutions, and the deliberate, reiterated, and formal adoption of the principles of that programme, by the Duke of Orleans; all proclaimed and consummated before the Chamber had either had the time, or usurped the right, to pervert them.

Independently of this regret, the great majority of the Chamber had felt deeply hurt at the opinion which Lafayette had several times expressed at the Hotel-de-Ville, in favour of a convocation of the Primary Assemblies, and the election of a constituent congress. Besides, the storm once allayed, and public order restored, the existence of a great power, and its supposed rivalry in influence with the royal authority, was calculated to throw into the shade, not only the crowd of the intriguing and the ambitious, which beset the new throne, but even many well-intentioned members of both Chambers. Therefore, that patriotic susceptibility, considered by itself, seemed the more excusable to Lafayette, as he had himself given cause for its manifestation by publicly declaring, that the post which the circumstances of the time had rendered it imperative upon him to accept, had appeared to him in 1790, and still appeared to him in 1830, as a bad institution, which ought to last as short a time as possible.

As for the ministry of the 31st of November, it was at no pains to conceal the unpopularity it felt at the power which Lafayette was invested; and notwithstanding the praises which it lavished at the time on the patriotism and good faith of the great citizen, of the illustrious general, it is certain that that administration sighed only for the moment when it might rid itself of his control, which, joined to the all-powerful influence he possessed over the men of July, weighed like a nightmare on the cabinet of that period.

This is a fact, the strangeness of which may, perhaps, be weakened by the community of principles which at this day exists between Lafayette and several of the members of the administration of the 3d of November, but which is not the less a fact worthy of a place in history.

Thus, then, the Crown, the two Chambers, the foreign diplomatists, the aristocracy, the king's council, and in general the intriguers of all hues, the parasites of every regime, had combined to exclude Lafayette from any share in the public business, in order, as they themselves said, to have done with the revolution. None, however, had the boldness to grapple openly with that ticklish question. It was even deemed prudent to deck the victim with a fresh civic crown; since, on the day before the sacrifice, that is, in the sitting of the 23d of December, M. Doyin, sen. mounted the tribune to propose a vote of thanks to the national guard and its illustrious chief.

The adversaries of the appointment of Lafayette to the chief command, in order to aim the first blows at him, had long resolved to take advantage of the presentation of the law upon the definitive organisation of the national guards of the kingdom. But the discussion of the project having commenced in the committee which preceded the trial of the ministers, care was taken that a design which might have led to frightful disasters, should not transpire to the public. To that end, it was determined, in the first commission appointed by the government, in which the Duke de Choiseul presided, that the command in chief of the national guards should be continued in the person of Lafayette, but that it should end with him. This article was read afterwards, in presence of the general, at a meeting of the commission, and of several ministers and generals, specially convened at M. Guizot's, then minister of the interior.

When, however, that project thus prepared by the commission, was laid before the council, they affected to make it the subject of a serious discussion, and to offer some resistance to it. Three members of the cabinet, and the king himself, objected, for example, that the interdicting to the executive the appointing of a new commander in chief, after the death of Lafayette, would be an infringement on the exercise of the prerogative of the crown. Notwithstanding this pretended discussion, in a subsequent meeting composed of two ministers, the commander in chief, and the inspector general, appointed by the king's council to regulate the respective duties of the general and of the ministers of war and of the interior, in every thing relating to the national guards of the kingdom, it was resolved, that M. de Montalivet should repair to the committee of the Chamber of Deputies, to announce to it, that the king's government considered it absolutely necessary that Lafayette should be continued in the chief command of the armed nation. Lafayette, who attached no importance whatever to those personal considerations, and who had, besides, expressly reserved to himself the liberty of resigning as soon as he should think he might do so without risk to the revolution, assented to that arrangement, which appeared to him favourable to the principles of July, already threatened from all sides.

All this, however, was no more than a mean trick. The step which had been agreed upon between the ministers and Lafayette was never taken; and the president of the council, in proposing to the Chamber the simple suppression of the office of generalissimo, assented in the name of the government to a measure which it had undertaken to resist, even while it was being announced to the committee. I confine myself here to saying, that the ministry of the 3d of November consented to the dismissal of Lafayette; for if the proposition it then made for bestowing on that great patriot the nominal title of honorary commander was the result of deliberate reflection, it can be viewed only as a downright insult.*

* It was on the 21th of December that this pitiful farce was played in the Chamber of Deputies. Some days before, the honest Dupuy de l'Eure had resolved to give in his resignation, on account of the

That sitting of the 24th of December will be remembered, in which the government and the Chamber presented to the world the example of the blackest ingratitude towards a man, who, a few hours earlier, had risked fifty years of popularity to save them both. Never had there been a more scandalous exhibition in the national tribune. The 50th article of the project of the government ran thus: "In the communes, or cantons, in which the national guard shall form several legions, the king may appoint a superior officer; but there can be no appointment of a superior officer of the national guards of a whole department, nor even of a circuit of an under prefect."

That clause virtually involved the dismissal of Lafayette. It was in vain that five amendments were proposed to soften the hideousness of such conduct. Those amendments, presented by MM. de Vauclles, Jules de La Rochefoucauld, Eosèbe Salverte, and Pelté de La Lozère, and all having for their object the exceptional continuance of Lafayette in the command of the national guards of the kingdom, were successively rejected, after being opposed by M. Charles Dupin, who ended a long speech with these remarkable words: "General Lafayette cannot be all his lifetime a living law, unless political law be dead." These words summed up the thoughts of the Court.

As for the ministry, humiliated, as I would fain believe, at the part it was playing on that occasion, it endeavoured to palliate its shame by proposing that the honorary command of the national guards should be bestowed by a fresh ordinance, on the founder of the citizen militia. The Chamber declared simply that the office of commander in chief was abolished, or, in other words, that Lafayette was dismissed.

This deliberation took place in the evening of the 24th of December, in the absence of the general in chief, who had been detained at his head quarters on account of the public peace being again threatened. I do not know that this unavoidable absence had entered into the calculations of his adversaries; but it is certain, that the press and the honest men of all parties, saw in this eagerness of the Chamber to decide that important question, without the participation of the party most interested in it, an unbecoming want of respect, which excited, in the highest degree, the public indignation.

The next morning, Lafayette wrote to Louis Philippe the following letter, which a feeling of delicacy towards the king, whose ministers had just concurred in his dismissal, would not allow him to publish at the time:

"Sir,
"The resolution passed yesterday by the Chamber of Deputies, with the assent of the king's ministers, for the suppression of the office of commander in chief of the national guards, at the very moment the law is going to be put to the vote, expresses already the opinions of two branches of the legislative power, and above all, of that which I have the honour to be a member of. I should consider myself as failing in respect, if I awaited any other formality before tendering to the king, as I now do, my resignation of the powers which his ordinance had conferred upon me. Your majesty knows, and the correspondence of the general staff will prove it, if required, that their exercise has not been so illusory, up to this period, as was represented in the tribune. The pa-rtorious conduct of the council. Lafayette, impressed with the hope that his honourable friend might yet be able to effect some little good, and to do so without any delay, did not think that he had been prevailed on to do the same, as well in his quality of minister of justice as in his private capacity; with the reservation that both would ensure if the power exerted in July persisted in its retrograde system. This explanation was necessary in order to absolve those two patriots from any participation in that malevolent or weakness of which Lafayette was the object on that memorable day.

The total want of reflection could alone direct this proposition of the character of an insult towards Lafayette. What value, in fact, was attached to the handsome services that Lafayette had just rendered to his country? What title, besides that of generalissimo, was all the reward it deserved? In order to appreciate the value which that ordinance would have in the eyes of Lafayette, it must be compared with the ordinance of the 2d of August, which had invested him with the command in chief. It laid thus: "The Lafayette is entrusted with every thing relative to the distribution of the national guards in the cadres, in conformity with the division of the territory, to the discipline, to the instruction, to the arming of the arms and equipping the national guard; to the execution and transmission of the orders which shall be given him." The third article expressed that "The commander in chief will transmit to the minister of the interior whatever orders he shall have given; and, on the other hand, the minister of the interior will inform the commander in chief of the measures he shall have taken, &c."

Conducting, at that time, a political journal, the author of this work abstained, at the request of General Lafayette, from publishing this correspondence, which the nature of his duty at the head of affairs had caused to pass through his hands.

triotic solicitude of your majesty, will supply its place; and, for example, it will be important to dispel by ordinances which the law has left at your discretion, the unbusiness which has been produced by the parcelling out of the rural battalions, and the apprehension of seeing confined to the frontier towns and those of the coast, that very useful institution, the citizen artillery.

"The president of the council has been so good as to propose to bestow on me the title of honorary commander; he will, himself, be sensible, and your majesty will conceive, that those nominal decorations are suitable neither to the institutions of a free country nor to myself.

"In delivering up, respectfully and gratefully, into the hands of your majesty, the sole ordinance which invests me with authority over the national guards, I have taken measures to prevent the service from suffering by it. General Dumas will take the orders of the minister of the interior; General Caronnel will regulate the service of the capital, until it shall please Your Majesty to appoint another in his place, which he requests may be done.

"I beg your majesty to accept the cordial tribute of my attachment and respect.

"(Signed) LAFAYETTE."

Who will believe it? On the 25th, at noon, Louis Philippe was yet ignorant of the debates that had taken place the evening before, in the Chamber of Deputies, upon a question which, for two months, had wholly occupied the Court and the Town. Be that as it might, here follows the king's answer:—

"I have this instant received, my dear general, your letter, which has grieved as much as surprised me by the decision you have taken; I have not yet had time to read the journals. The council of ministers meet at one o'clock; I shall then be at liberty; that is to say, between four and five, when I hope to see you, and to persuade you to retract your determination.

"Accept, my dear general, &c.

"LOUIS PHILIPPE."

Lafayette attended the king's appointment, who received him with the liveliest marks of affection. Louis Philippe seemed inconsolable at what had taken place the day before in the Chamber of Deputies, and above all, on the part which his ministers had unwittingly taken in it, and without any evil intention. "But," added the king, the deplorable article has not yet become law, and I shall be very well able to— "Sir," said Lafayette, "the distrusts of my colleagues, and the dissensions they have pronounced against me, as far as in them lay, impose on my delicacy the duty of not holding any longer an authority which offends them, and the principle of which, notwithstanding its temporary utility, has, besides, been at all times condemned by myself. Moreover, being entirely resolved to prosecute by every means in my power the abolition of the hereditary peerage, it does not become me to await, on the part of the Chamber of Peers, a confirmation which would place it in a species of hostility towards me, or a favourable amendment which would lay me under obligation to it. Besides," added he, "I will candidly confess to your majesty, that in this I find for myself not only a duty, but a fit occasion."—"Explain yourself," said the king—"Sir," replied Lafayette, "your system of government is no longer mine. It appears to me that public confidence has placed a trust in my hands; I cannot refer you to it in writing; it exists in opinion, in the air perhaps; but in short, the French people, and many patriots of all countries, persuade themselves that where I am there is no risk that liberty will suffer. Now, I see that liberty is menaced, compromised, and I will decide no one. Both at home and abroad, the measures of your government not being such as I consider conducive to the interests of liberty, there would be a want of candour on my part were I to remain longer, like an opaque body, between the people and the executive. When I am removed from the government, every one will know better how the matter stands."

The question being placed upon this ground, the king strove earnestly to combat what he called the prejudices of Lafayette. But neither his manifestations of an unbounded friendship, nor his reiterated offer to revoke the deplorable clause, could blind the general to the real state of things; and they had no other effect than to make him repeat to the last moment of that conversation: "Sir, you offer me many personal concessions, but nothing for the public weal; and it is that, and not myself, which is in question."

The king requested twenty-four hours to consider the questions which had arisen between him and the commander in chief of the national guards. Lafayette assented to that delay, in the hope that it would be employed in mature reflection, and perhaps produce a return to better courses. Vain hope! In that interval the president of the council, the minister of the interior, and some of the principal officers of the national guard, came to repeat to him the assurances of regard, and the offers of reparation, which he had received at the Palais-Royal; but of the guarantees he had claimed for the disregarded principles of the revolution of July, not a word was said. Lafayette answered them as he had answered the king, "Every thing for liberty, nothing for myself."

On the same occasion, the prime minister having depicted a common friend to sound the intentions of Lafayette relative to the forming of a new cabinet, the general replied that if certain patriots, whom he named, or any others of the same way of thinking, should come into power in place of the men whose proceedings appeared to him contrary to the principles and the engagements of July, he should consider that change as the precursor of a better future. He also wrote to that effect to M. Lafitte, who laid his letter before the council, which dispensed several of its members in the highest degree.

The pretended exactions of Lafayette went no further. To impose entire silence upon his own susceptibility; to lay aside all self-love; to consent to every insignificant reparation, such as the postponement of the execution of the article of the law which concerned himself; in short, to give way to every thing they desired, in the hope of obtaining under favour of that difficult conjuncture, a better system of government: such, and such only, whatever may have been said of the matter, were the exorbitant pretensions of the man who had consented to place the crown upon the head of the new king. But since, whilst overwhelming him with praises and professions of attachment, the disastrous system of a quasi-Restoration was undeviatingly persisted in, it became the duty of Lafayette to satisfy the adversaries of his influence, by divesting himself of a command from which the Chamber and the government had dismissed him five times in a single sitting, and to cease to serve as a cloak to the anti-French combinations which his remaining at the head of the national guards might have hidden from the patriots. When, therefore, they required twenty-four hours had elapsed, without having brought any symptom of a change of system, he wrote to the king:—

"Sunday, 25th December, 1830.

"Sire,
"Your majesty told me yesterday that the subject of our conversation should be concluded this day. I have seen MM. Lafitte and Montalivet; they have spoken to me of the amendment which the president of the council intends to propose. But, sire, you know well that it does not remove the objections which I took the liberty of submitting to you. I mentioned to M. de Montalivet that I looked upon myself as having given in my resignation, and I imagine he will have issued his orders in consequence. However I think it my duty to repeat it to the king, because, General Carbonel and my son having followed my fortune, as likewise the major General Tracy, it is necessary that orders should be issued for to-morrow's service. Believe me, sire, the duty which I consider I am fulfilling, is more painful to me than I can express; and now, more than ever, it behoves me to join with the tribute of my respect, that of my profound and unalterable attachment."

CHAPTER XVII.

It is not true that Lafayette refused the command of the National Guard of Paris—misstatements of the court and the government on that head. Explanations of Lafayette to the Chamber of Deputies—President of the King—The Palais-Royal in trouble—The king's advice of a coup d'état and a dictatorship—Explanation of Lafayette with the king upon that subject—The extent of Lafayette's demands—His taking leave of the National Guard—Character of Lafayette.

It was felt necessary to anticipate the dangerous impression which the retirement of Lafayette would unavoidably produce on the public mind. To that end, the court, the ministry, and the Anti-Fayetteists of the two chambers, combined to spread abroad, and cause to be believed, two falsehoods: 1st. That the demands made by Lafayette to the king were such that the monarch was left no other alternative than to reject them or to abdicate the throne: 2d. That Lafayette had obstinately refused the command of the national guard of Paris, which had been offered him with the strongest solicitations.

This system of accusation was the more perfidious, as whilst on the one hand it invoked for Louis Philippe the sympathy which a generous nation never withholds from oppressed weakness; it tended on the other to alienate from Lafayette the affection of his comrades of the national guard of Paris, that is, to wound him in the most sensible part.

Fear and bad faith set every engine to work, to invest this fiction with the character of an incontestable fact; and the truly theatrical sentimentality with which they deplored the lamentable obstinacy of Lafayette, is not one of the least characteristic traits of the men who now govern us.

"Sire," said M. de Montalivet, in his report presented to the king on the 26th of December, "General Lafayette has tendered to your majesty his resignation of the office of commander in chief of the national guards of the kingdom. The most earnest solicitations, repeatedly urged, have failed to induce the illustrious general to retract a resolution which deeply afflicts your majesty's heart, and deprives France of the services he might yet render her. The resolution of General Lafayette being irrevocable, we must abandon the hope of seeing him continue in the exercise of the functions of an officer in which he will leave imperishable recollections behind him."

That pathetic report had naturally for its moral, the proposing of Count de Lobau as the successor of Lafayette.

Then came immediately the following proclamation, plentifully distributed, and posted up at every guard-house in the capital:—

"PROCLAMATION OF THE KING.

26th of December.

"Brave National Guards, my dear fellow countrymen, you will partake my regret on learning that General Lafayette has deemed it proper to give in his resignation. I had hoped to see him longer at your head, animating your zeal by his example, and by the recollection of the great services he has rendered to the cause of liberty. His retirement is the more felt by me, as, but a few days ago, the worthy general again took a glorious part in maintaining public order, which you so nobly and so effectually protected during the late agitations. But I leave the consolation to reflect that I have neglected nothing to spare the National Guard that which will cause it the deepest regret, and me the sincerest grief."
"LOUIS PHILIPPE."

And here I subjoin the terms in which, following up the blow, the president of the council expressed himself in the sitting of the Chamber of Deputies of the 28th of December, that is, thirty-six hours after he had voted the dismissal of Lafayette.

"The illustrious chief of the national guard, who has long contemplated the repetition of that noble step which he took forty years ago, has divested himself of his functions, notwithstanding our solicitations. He wished, as much as in him lay, to imitate the noble example of Washington; he has done only a little earlier that which he said he would do sooner or later. One of our colleagues," whose virtues have thrown around him so much splendour, had likewise formed the intention of laying down his share of power; but he would not do so on the eve of danger; he has done it the day after."

The king, having assembled at the Palais Royal the colonels of all the legions of the national guard of Paris, professed the deepest regret at Lafayette's resignation, all the time, however, complaining of the really excessive demands which he had made to his majesty. But what will appear still more astonishing is, that, confounding, no doubt, the conflicting counsels which were simultaneously given him, the king added, in a tone of displeasure, that monstrous proposals were made him, such as that of expelling the Chambers, and setting up a dictatorship. It must be brought, that chance and confusion only could have thus brought together in one sentence the demands of Lafayette, and a wish for a coup d'état and a dictatorship; since, when the general complained to the king of the absurd reports that were spread respecting him: "I should like," answered Louis Philippe, "to see the man who should dare to maintain that I attributed those proposals to you." "Certainly," replied Lafayette, "it is pleasant enough that I should be accused of a desire to invest you with a dictatorship. I who would be found the first in the ranks of the enemies of any constitutional monarch who should take such a fancy."

However, these manoeuvres on the one hand, and these misunderstandings on the other, furnished matter for those false accusations which a restless and cunning spirit of intrigue propagated in the capital and in the departments, in the guardhouse and in the drawing-room, and under favour of which many persons assumed, at court, the merit of a devotedness which had no object.

But what was either true or probable in these imputations? Nothing, certainly; and the most ordinary judgment would suffice to detect the absurdity of the groundwork of that dull comedy.

As for the imperious demands of Lafayette, the king had reason to complain of them, if the king considered as an intolerable exaction, the requiring of a speedy return to the principles of the revolution of July, to which he owed his crown, and from which he and his ministers were so evidently departing. Has time proved that those fears were are without foundation?

Finally, in respect to his refusal of the command of the national guard of Paris, one single thing is true, which is, that before accepting that command, the Count de Lobau came to ask Lafayette if he persisted in his resignation. But until then, Lafayette had commanded the national guard of Paris by virtue only of the powers which invested him with the chief command of all the national guards of the kingdom; consequently, that general command being abolished, he could not be asked to retain the command of the capital in particular, under an authority which the decision of the legislature and the concurrence of the government had virtually put an end to. A new ordinance would have been necessary; and such ordinance was never issued, nor even offered.

But where is the necessity for me to argue upon legal forms, to prove that the government never intended to entrust the command of the capital to Lafayette? Does not that proof appear from the very nature of things? The distrusts and jealousies of the court, the chambers, the courtiers, the ministers, the foreign diplomatists, being the manifest, the sole motives for removing Lafayette; did they not apply above all to the exercise of the power and influence which he derived from the command of one hundred thousand armed citizens of Paris and its environs? And if, on his part, Lafayette had scrupled to deceive France by appearing to identify himself with the policy of the Palais Royal, must he not have been equally fearful of abusing the confidence of the country by exercising the great and imposing command of the capital? Thus the system of the Palais Royal, and that of Lafayette, of themselves, put the offer and refusal of that command out of the question: neither the one nor the other was made.

In resorting to that system of slander and calumny, the court knew so little of Lafayette, as not to venture to rely on the generosity of his character, which would make him regard it as a patriotic duty, to prevent the ill effect his resignation was likely to produce in Paris and in every part of France, from whence he received, in fact, such warm testimonies of regret, affection, and confidence. Nevertheless, far from wishing to make a triumph of his retirement, he took every pains to deaden the explosion of discontent which it might occasion among his numerous friends, and to prevent the resignations which began to be tendered from all quarters. He hastened to issue the following order of the day:—

ORDER OF THE DAY, OF THE 27TH OF DECEMBER, 1830.

"In quitting the command of the national guards of the kingdom, General Lafayette proposes to address to them his thanks and his farewell, but he cannot refrain from seizing the first moment to express to his fellow soldiers of Paris the feelings with which his heart is overflowing. He has the fullest confidence in the sincerity of their attachment and regret. By redoubbling, if possible, their punctuality and activity in the service, they will prove it to him more and more. He will know how to appreciate this flesh testimony of their affection and their indissoluble union with him, in their common devotion to liberty and public order. The patriotic foresight of the king has made all the necessary arrangements. It is with his whole soul, and not without emotion, that their old and grateful friend indites these few words to them."
"LAFAYETTE."

Lafayette immediately after presented himself to the king, no longer as commander of 1,700,000 national guards, but as an affectionate citizen full of respect for the person and family of the new monarch.

The court and the town awaited, with the strongest curiosity, the parliamentary explanations which he should give in the tribune; and, as may be well conceived, his arrival at the Chamber, in the sitting of the 27th of December, caused a great sensation.

"Gentlemen," said he, "it is customary, in a neighbouring country, that when a citizen retires from the exercise of high functions, he and his colleagues should mutually explain before the representative chamber. Allow me to use that privilege.

"I have always thought that the office of commander in chief of the national guards of the kingdom was incompatible, as a general principle, with the institutions of a constitutional monarchy. Therefore, when three millions of my fellow citizens, in 1790, proposed to confer that office upon me, by the acclamations of their fourteen thousand deputies, on the field of the Federation, I hastened to prevent its possibility, by obtaining from the Constituent Assembly a prohibitory decree. I did not do so when, at the Hotel-de-Ville, the lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and afterwards the king, proposed to me to remain in the exercise of that command. I thought it behoved me to accept it, with the intention of divesting myself of it, earlier in case of peace, later in case of war, as soon as I no longer saw a necessity for its continuance.

"The opinion of the Chamber has anticipated that period; and out of respect to it, I have not waited for the law to be submitted to the other branches of the legislature. It is merely a question of time; but I should feel deeply hurt if it were supposed (and no one, knowing or having read the history of the last fifty-four years, can suppose) that my conduct has been influenced by the slightest personal consideration. I will go further: the opinion expressed by the Chamber, afforded me an opportunity which I needed. The great power with which I was invested gave some umbrage; you have often heard it spoken of, gentlemen. That umbrage prevailed, above all, in the diplomatic circles. That power is now dissolved; I have now only the honour of being your colleague.

"One word more, gentlemen. That resignation, accepted by the king with all his accustomed testimonies of kindness towards me, I should not have given in before the crisis we have just passed through. My understanding of public order is now fully satisfied. I own it is not so with my understanding of liberty. We all know the programme of the Hotel-de-Ville: A popular throne surrounded with republican institutions. It was accepted; but we do not all of us understand it in the same manner; it has not, on all occasions, been understood by the councils of the king as it has by me, who am more impatient than others to see it realised; and to whatever may have been my personal independence in every situation, I feel, in my present situation, more perfectly at liberty to discuss my opinion with you.

"There are points, however, upon which we shall be always united against domestic and foreign adversaries. I think that, in the course taken at the time of the revolution of July, we not only did that which was best, but the only thing it was expedient to do. I think so more than ever, since I have known the monarch whom we have placed upon the throne. In putting off my uniform, I have not laid aside our motto, 'Liberty, public order.' Besides, how many legions we possess of expressing our thoughts, of urging our demands! For us, there is the tribune; for every one the press, which has rendered so many services, and the peaceable course of petitioning. This, gentlemen, is what I had occasion to say to my colleagues, who, I hope, will continue to me their esteem and friendship."

In short, owing to the measures taken by Lafayette in order that his retirement might produce the smallest possible inconvenience, every thing would have settled down calmly, if, as he said one day to the king, he had not met, in the performance of that good work, with some auxiliaries upon whom he had not reckoned. Nevertheless, the proprieties of office required that Lafayette should formally take leave of the national guards of the kingdom, and particularly of that of Paris, which he did by addressing to them these two letters:—

GENERAL LAFAYETTE TO THE NATIONAL GUARD OF PARIS.

Paris, 1st January, 1831.

"My dear fellow-soldiers,

"When, at the painful moment of my retirement, I hastened to put you on your guard, not against unexpected incursions, which I leave to your good sense and the rectitude of your own hearts, but against any imprudent manifestations of your friendship towards me. I promised you a farewell letter, which I shall here subjoin. You will find in it, as well as in my speech to the Chamber, the explanation of my conduct and the expression of my sentiments. I feel it, however, necessary again to address myself specially to you, whose fathers were my friends and companions in 1789; to you, who, during the last five months, have so fully gratified my patriotism, my pride, and my affection.

"In resigning the command in chief to the king, whose ordinance was my sole title to it, I have yielded not only to the wishes expressed in the sitting of the 24th of December, but also to the manifestations of various sorts of jealousies, and of patriotic scruples, not less applicable, considering my personal situation, to the important command of the national guard of Paris, had it been re-established in my behalf, than to the functions with which I had been invested.

"It would have been gratifying to me, my dear comrades, to present to you myself the brotherly congratulations on your conduct in the late crisis, which pour in from all quarters; they shall be transmitted to the excellent general who so well justifies the honourable choice of the king.

"May our programme of July be carried into effect more and more! Such is the wish of France; for, it is as easy to say at Paris that the departures are indifferent to liberty, as in the departures that Paris is averse to public order; then the reality of things themselves will not need the passport of any name.

"Accept, all of you, my dear comrades, commanders, officers, subalterns, and privates, the regrets, the affection, and the good wishes of a loving, grateful, and devoted chief, which remains identified with you, and which death alone can separate from you.

GENERAL LAFAYETTE TO THE NATIONAL GUARDS OF THE KINGDOM.

"But a short time ago, my dear fellow-soldiers, I was invested with an immense command; now, I am only your old friend, the veteran of the national guard. That twofold title will, to my last moments, form my happiness and my glory. That which I no longer possess found me, in the great week, strong in the unbounded confidence of the people, in the midst of the illustrious barricades at which was raised again that tri-coloured flag, twice the signal of liberty; where, in three days, were decided the present destinies of things and of men in France, the future destinies of Europe. Those functions which I had refused in 1790, I accepted in 1830 from the hands of a prince whom we have appointed to be our king. They were, I think, exercised usefully: seventeen hundred thousand national guards already raised, organised at the voice of their happy chief, are my witnesses. They might, I confess, have still continued to be further useful, during a period of the duration of which I was told I should be the judge, and of which I should have been a severe arbiter. A majority of the deputies my colleagues thought that those functions ought to cease now; and that opinion was expressed, in the same sitting, by the principal organ of the government. Besides, distrusts, which I have a right to say the past did not justify, had arisen in several quarters; they were openly manifested, and could not be satisfied except by a relinquishment of power wholly and without any reserve. And when even the royal intervention, in its solicitude, afterwards resorted to every means to continue my services, an instinct of freedom, which has never deceived me in the whole course of my life, suggested to me that I must sacrifice that power, those enjoyments, those constant affections, to the austere duty of contributing to all the consequences of the revolution of 1830.

"My passing authority has not been useless; an immense correspondence confirms this assertion. In fact, if the sublime movement of France in arms has been spontaneous; if, to secure it for ever against the future combinations of every kind of narrow, malevolent, or timid policy, it has been sufficient to place her distinctly, from the outset, under the safeguard of the principles of 1789 and 1791, and, above all, of the vital and universal principle of election; it is not the less true, that a central due to some of my anterior acts, have contributed usefully to regulate, in the absence of the law, the various organisations and wishes, and to remove obstacles raised by the intrigues of the fallen party, who, in too many instances, were suffered to retain the power of doing mischief. I am happy to express my obligations in that respect to the exertions of the inspector general, which have so ably seconded my own.

"I shall not detail all that we have done to organise those admirable town legions, those numerous cantonal battalions, the mischievous parcelling out of which you have recently witnessed me opposing in vain; to contribute to their instruction, their arming, their equipment, as far as the physical resources at our disposal would allow; to demand, from the commencement, fresh and powerful means to purchase, manufacture, and repair those arms which form at once the patriotic want and the noble cry of the national guards; to assist in the formation of the citizen cavalry, and of that artillery mounting already fifty batteries, and awaiting the numerous additions promised by the war department; a civic innovation teeming with utility, whose high importance has not been sufficiently felt in our legislative discussions; in short, to prepare all that five months more may develop. By these means will be completed that immense organisation, protective of liberty and public order, and whence might issue so many hundreds of thousands of combatants for the safety and the independence of France. All! instead of degrading that vast institution, formed without hesitation, without disturbance, by the feeling of a liberal and sympathetic confidence in the national masses, let us rather hasten to regulate our other institutions after such a model!

"How shall I express the delightful emotions of my heart, when, at the end of a few weeks, it was my happy lot to offer to the admiration of the public, to the king, to the foreigners, to enemies as well as friends, that Parisian national guard of which I was so proud; which, during forty years, has been a real family to me, rising up again more brilliant, more numerous than ever, and, shortly after, amounting, with the fine legions of the suburbs, to nearly eighty thousand men in the Champ-de-Mars; emotions which could be surpassed only by the happiness of having recently owed to them the safety of the capital, and the uniform purity of our revolution. If a single department, that of the Seine and Oise, procured me local enjoyments, how much have I not felt on receiving the reports of the miracles of formation, appearance, intelligence, good feeling, in the various portions of our fine country; in seeing myself surrounded every day by those deputations from the whole of France, which brought to the king of her choice a second inauguration, and which, in their affectionate confidence, explaining to me the local grievances and the general uneasiness, constituted me, as you know, the formal interpreter to the government, of the wants which the spirit of the great week required to be satisfied.

"That duty was fulfilled. I have every where, as in the tribune, expressed my ardent, perhaps my impatient wishes, for the complete realisation of the programme tendered while the blood of six thousand citizens was yet smoking; and if I wished that France should, in the shortest time possible, have a representation elected subsequently to the revolution of 1830; if I have said, that in future discussions relative to the other Chamber, I should prefer to its present organisation the principle of an elective presentation of candidates for the approval of the king; if I have scrupled to lend my name to the delaying, or to the omitting of things which I consider necessary; it would be very unjust to convert those opinions into the having called for coups d'etat and a dictatorship; which I have no more wished to impose upon others than I would submit to them myself, as history will vouch in more than one passage.

But I prefer repeating what every one must know, Frenchmen of all parties, foreigners of all countries; that if the constitutional order conquered during the three great days, that if the popular throne raised by our own hands, should ever be threatened, from whatever quarter it might be, the whole nation would rise to defend them.

"At this painful moment of bidding you farewell, which I had not thought so near, I tender to my dear fellow soldiers my gratitude for their friendship, my confidence in their remembrance of me, my wishes for their happiness, my admiration at what they have performed, my anticipation of what they will yet do, my hope that the calculations of intrigue, or the misrepresentations of malevolence, will not prevail against me in their breasts; I offer them, in short, all the sentiments of a tender affection, which will continue to my latest breath.

This new order of things did not in the least diminish the moral influence of Lafayette; perhaps even the consideration for him personally was much increased by the disgrace which the offspring of the revolution of July, afterwards its adversaries, had just inflicted on the general's patriotic inflexibility. That species of ostracism restored him to all the dignity of his political life. Indeed, it was in the simple garb of a citizen, that in 1789 he had received Louis XVI., at the head of two hundred thousand armed patriots; that, nearly forty years after, he had traversed in triumph the twenty-four states of the American Union, reviewing the regular troops and citizen militia which crowded the passage of the nation's guest; and that, more recently, he had found himself at the Hotel-de-Ville, at the head of the revolution of 1830. In short, it was not to his office of generalissimo that, during half a century, the confidence and veneration of the nations of America and Europe had been attached.

But, if the personal position of Lafayette remained unaltered by his retirement, it was not the less injurious to the public weal, that the national guard lost in him an object around which all the interests of order and liberty might rally. And as for the throne which, in the delirium of ambition and fear, thought to strengthen itself by getting rid of its influence, what has it then gained by separating itself from him? Where could it find a firmer or more faithful support than in the man who had wedded it to liberty; the only one, too, that was capable of preventing their inevitable divorce, perhaps near at hand, which has been pleading, for seventeen months, at the bar of the nation? Strange fatality which attends our royalties of whatever origin!

But, what is not less curious than the blindness of the monarchy of July, is the difficulty which, were they men of ever so much discernment, the seekers after wealth, title, and influence, must find, to comprehend a character like Lafayette's. The contemning of those sorts of things is beyond the understanding of such people. They perfectly comprehend that a man should be persevering in principle, tenacious in will, confident of results unforeseen by the most sagacious; they do not dispute that boldness and coolness which in the course of the longest of political lives, should have all at once placed him on the highest ground of every kind of ambition. But that this man, having only to desire to be rich, powerful, and the dispenser of favours, should not have the resolution to close the hand in which the love and confidence of the people had placed all their possessions, is what the ambitious great, as well as the petty intriguers, cannot understand. A character such as this, is to their minds a perfect anomaly, which they cannot explain, except by attributing to it an inherent want of judgment and energy: they ask their own breasts; and they find that something, they hardly know what, must necessarily be deficient in that political soul which, from being so ardent and so daring, has sunk in their eyes into timidity and weakness; since, after trampling upon the greatest prejudices, it foolishly checks itself through a scruple of conscience. What, in fact, is to be expected from a statesman who thinks and says upon every occasion, that, in great personal questions, it is generally safest to decide against our own interest? A man who thus places all his glory above vulgar ambitions; who ranks among those ambitions, thrones, presidencies, and conquests; for whom the inferiority of his fellow creatures, the parade of a court, of audiences, and of external splendour, have no attraction; a man of this description, is certainly not in accordance with this age in which he lives.

Thus, for want of a sense to enable them to understand so unusual a character, the juste milieu entertain a profound contempt for that singular being, who, placed so often in a situation for satisfying every ambitious appetite, yet has never been able to help turning his back upon fortune, as a child lets its playthings drop from its hands.

Such are the symptoms by which the enemies of Lafayette have discovered the decay of his political faculties, and his incapacity for government. There is, however, another, which they have overlooked, but upon which they might argue with quite as much justice: it is, that ridiculous monomania which urges him incessantly to defend the interests of liberty and of the simplest institutions for the public good; it is again, (and here I speak seriously) the fault he has sometimes committed, of indulging too much in the enjoyment of presenting the contrast of a man who, having all in his power, will have nothing for himself.

It remains for me now to exhibit Lafayette in the single character of a deputy, after the revolution of July, that is, during the nineteen months that have followed his dismissal.

Here M. Sarrans closes the second division of his work. From the ensuing pages we have made such extracts, as, while they follow the thread of the history, do not embody the private opinions respecting the late events which encumber the text of the author, who must be considered as a partisan writer. We give his facts including all that immediately relates to Lafayette and Louis Philippe.

Lafayette and his friends had made numerous efforts to cause the magistracy of Charles X. to be changed, as it was almost entirely composed of counter-revolutionary leaders.

This magistracy however, was defended and preserved by the influence of the Court joined to that of the Restoration party, which had appointed the greater number of the judges, and removed from the tribunals all who were not notoriously royalist. But when the question arose, as to the admission of the capacités to the exercise of the electoral right, Lafayette opposed the exclusion of these magistrates, an exclusion which a part of the opposition had committed the error of demanding in a fit of spleen against the majority; which circumstance caused the exclusion of the other capacités, and vitiated the electoral law in one of its most essential principles. While this long debate was going forward, his opinion was, that the perfection of political civilisation upon this head, consisted in this; namely, that each person paying taxes should be entitled to a direct vote in electing the representatives, and should not be in any way disturbed in his choice of the trustees of the country. "That which for Europe is still considered as Utopian," said Lafayette, "has been practised for more than fifty years in the United States. There every tax payer is an elector; and among them is to be found the militia man, the member of the national guard, who has paid in the course of the year the personal contribution of one day's service. There no pecuniary qualification for candidates is known; yet every thing goes on without inconvenience and without disturbance. Such is the power of popular information, of civic habits, and national institutions."

In his twofold capacity, as a member of the legislature, and as commander of the national guards of the kingdom, Lafayette had caused to be proclaimed from the tribune, as well as in the cabinet, the system of non-intervention, the equality of the men of colour with other citizens in the eye of the law which governs our colonies, and the recognition of the South American and Mexican republics. In his view, the foreign policy of the July revolution ought to consist in the necessary development of those three primary points. He constantly maintained these principles whenever diplomatic questions occurred in the debates of the Chamber of Deputies. But it was not enough to have procured the adoption of the most denominations of a system; the most important point was to guard the system itself against perfidious interpretations, by clearly and precisely defining its letter and its spirit: this was done by Lafayette on two or three decisive occasions. Every one remembers, for instance, that memorable sitting of 16th January, 1831, in which Lamarque, Mauguin, and Lafayette, exhibited the nations of Europe arising one after another for liberty; Belgium offering us that belt of fortresses which the Coalition had erected against the France of 1814 and 1815; Poland running the terrible hazards of an insurrection, to avoid marching against us; and, in those momentous circumstances, the government of Louis Philippe sunk in the most inconceivable lethargy, acting as the ministry of Charles X. would have acted, and blundering without courage or resolution in the slough into which its predecessors had precipitated the Restoration. Then it was, that after reminding the Chamber of the consecrated maxim of the congress of Vienna, that "so long as a single revolutionary dynasty should exist, the revolution would not be extinguished; and that the principle of legitimacy must be made every where to prevail; that, without that, there could be no peace, but only a truce;" then it was, I say, that the illustrious warrior upon whom the grave has just now closed, so energetically characterised as a HALT IN THE MIRE, that peace which the Restoration had allowed to be imposed upon it, and the shameful bequest of which was accepted by the ministers of the citizen king, "France," said Lamarque, "has never forgiven the Bourbons the shame of the treaties of 1815; she would have been gratified to find that the king of her choice felt as she does, and partook her national pride." * * *

In this confusion of principles, it became the bounden duty of Lafayette to bring back things to the true meaning of July, that is, a popular throne surrounded with republican institutions; to prove that that was not a throne conferred by the Chamber of the two hundred and twenty-one; and that a sceptre received from the hands of the people, could be maintained only by institutions emanating from the people. In short, it was essential to know, once for all, the extent of the discrepancies between the compact of the Hotel-de-Ville and the system recently avowed by the Palais-Royal.

In addition to this, another subject of vital importance engaged public attention. The approaching dissolution of the Chamber was spoken of. M. Lafitte, president of the council, had even announced from the tribune that he would consult the king upon it. But the majority of the doctrinaires wished that the new elections should take place under the authority of the temporary law of the 12th of September, and not under that of the electoral law, the discussion of which was continually postponed. Lafayette deemed it his duty to oppose beforehand that proposition, which might compromise the future fate of France, by prolonging the existence of the tax-paying qualifications at 300 francs for electors and 1000 francs for deputies. * * *

What was the real state of things, nine months after the day when the people, at the price of their blood, had created a monarchy, and thought they had accomplished a revolution?

It is here important to look closely into facts, and observe precisely the situation of affairs at the moment the prorogation was announced.

Nine months, I say, had elapsed since the king of July had sworn to devote his whole life to the triumph of the revolution, to protect the development of liberty, and to watch, with jealous care, over the maintenance of the national honour. Well, theories and opinions apart, what had occurred in that short space of time?

At home: Lafayette divested of his command in chief; the honest Dupont de l'Eure filled with disgust, and obliged to quit the council; the chief magistracy of the capital wrested out of the hands of an upright patriot, and thrown into those of a prefect of the empire; of the laws promised by the charter, some postponed indefinitely, the others vitiated by clauses injuriously restrictive of liberty; an electoral law such that, although the quota of contributions remained almost the only basis of the elective qualification, yet an increase of the taxes gave no means for extending the franchise; an association formed for the purpose of expelling a family which had covered France with wounds and chains, persecuted with fury; a law on the national guard, evincing the most inconceivable distrust of the loyalty of the citizens; the patriotic functionaries, the officers most devoted to the order of things which they had cemented with their blood, every where removed by wholesale, and their places given to the satellites of every gone-by regime.

Abroad: the men who had represented the fallen government, alone sent as ambassadors to foreign courts; the principle of non-intervention, but lately proclaimed with an ostentatious boldness, openly disowned, or subjected to the most perfidious interpretations; a people who had thrown themselves between France and the most powerful of her enemies, the people of Poland, basely sacrificed, without a single friendly demonstration, without one testimony of sympathy, or sending even a courier; the Italian states, which the government had urged to rise, delivered up, under our eyes, to foreign occupation, pillage, confiscation, and the vengeance of a few contemptible despots; Belgium repulsed, insulted by our government, and obliged to throw herself into the arms of England; in short, the principles and the interests of the revolution of July neglected and betrayed on every side. * * *

Lafayette had been summoned as a witness on the requisition of the accused petty conspirators. On his entering the court of assize, the prisoners, the barristers, the jury, and the whole audience, rose and saluted the noble general. The point in question was, to prove that an information laid before the staff, of a Bonapartist conspiracy, having for its object to get possession of the guns belonging to the artillery of the national guard, had been the sole reason for the measures of defence which some companies had deemed it proper to take; which measures the accusation imputed to them as a crime. The general proved that this was the real truth; and he also paid a solemn tribute to the patriotism of that brave citizen artillery, against which the government was already exercising all its enmity. When Lafayette withdrew, the prisoners, the jury, and the spectators, rose and bowed afresh.

My readers will know the result of this trial, by which the government gained nothing but the odium of having sought to erect scaffolds.

* It will be recollected, that, in a report presented to the Polish Diet, the answer for foreign affairs of that country complained of not having received any token of sympathy on the part of the French government for the Polish cause, not even a courier.

Lafayette, on whose part nothing certainly had rendered it necessary to make a declaration of principles, made a point of giving his constituents an account, not only of the reasons which had actuated him in his votes upon all the great legislative questions that had occupied the session, but likewise of the opinions and the hopes which had governed his political conduct in the memorable events of July. By conforming to this custom, so consonant to the nature of a constitutional government, Lafayette rendered the country a service so much the more important, as it served better to clear away the mist which the head of the government was anxious to spread over the primitive conditions of its own existence. He was, moreover, setting an example to his colleagues, which, being followed by many of them, called forth those numerous pledges to vote against the hereditary peerage, which were demanded from the new deputies, by nearly the whole of the colleges.

That document is worthy to be preserved for history, not only as a model of candour and propriety, but likewise as the most lucid view that could be taken at that period of the events of July. In it Lafayette said:

"You will ask me, my dear constituents, what was the nature of that programme of the Hotel-de-Ville, so often cited by me, disputed by others, and the fulfilment of which it is my duty to claim.

"After the visit of the new lieutenant general, accompanied by the deputies, to the Hotel-de-Ville, I considered that the popular authority and public confidence with which I was invested, gave me the right and imposed upon me the obligation to come to an explicit understanding, in the name of the people, with the intended king:—You are aware, I said to him, that I am a republican, and that I look upon the constitution of the United States as the most perfect that has ever existed. I think as you do, replied the Duke of Orleans, it is impossible to have passed two years in America and not to be of that opinion; but do you think, in the situation of France, and considering the general opinion, that it is advisable to adopt it?—No, said I, what the French people now require is, a popular throne surrounded with republican institutions."—It is just so that I understand it, replied the prince. This mutual agreement, which every one may interpret as he pleases, but which I hastened to publish, had the effect of rallying around us, both those who had no wish for a monarch, and those who wished to have any other than a Bourbon." * *

The ministry had suggested that the French patriots had given the Poles the bad advice, to throw off the yoke of their tyrant. Lafayette repelled that insinuation, which went to establish that petty ambitions had, in reality, been the spring of those great patriotic and national movements which we have seen burst forth in the different parts of Europe, and especially in Poland, since the electric shock of the revolution of July. "But," said he, "if bad advice was given, it must rather have been that timid advice of which I have often spoken to this Chamber, and which caused the Polish legation to write home, under the dictation of the French government, that in two months affairs would be arranged, and that Poland must hold out until then."

Lafayette conjured the government to repair at least a part of the wrong which it had done to Poland, by instructing its ambassador, at the court of Prussia, to require that the Poles should no longer be arrested and ill-treated, when they asked that they might not return under the regime of the knout, but be free to come and seek amongst us that hospitality which all France offered them.

He also called for a termination of the unhappy condition of Greece, and especially that every effort should be made to free her from the sway of Russia, who, ever since Catherine's time, has been taxing her ingenuity to deceive that unfortunate people. And he concluded with soliciting the sympathy and support of the government for the generous enterprise of the Portuguese, who, at the moment that I write these lines, are fighting to deliver their country from the execrable tyranny of Don Miguel, that worthy brother of the king of Spain: "For," said Lafayette, "there is a fraternity of sentiment in their lives, as well as a kindred between their families."

There the ministry have now realised, of forcibly sending the Poles to Algiers. Lafayette, feeling the necessity of arming himself beforehand against such an insinuation, availed himself of this rumour to inform the Chamber, that having mentioned the matter to the minister of war, the latter had answered him that the supposition was false, that it was quite absurd, and that he authorised him to contradict it in the most explicit manner. Well; three months have scarcely elapsed since that ministerial denial; and already a detachment of four hundred Poles, without even being permitted to touch the French shore, have been transported by us to the coast of Africa. And why this new vexation? Because the Prussian ministry have, it is said, acquainted our cabinet, that some Polish soldiers asserted that they were going to France to overthrow Louis Philippe? Such is the incredible pretence for a resolution which M. de Rigny has declared to be irrevocable.

Such was the political conduct of Lafayette, from the day of his dismissal from the command in chief of the national guards of France, down to the close of the last legislative session. I have, however, forgotten to point out one of the most important services which this great citizen has rendered to the principle of equality.

I mean the suppression of that article of the penal code of the Empire, which inflicted a fine and imprisonment upon any Frenchman who should of his own authority assume a title of nobility. This suppression, so conformable to the social opinion of Lafayette, ought to be considered as completing the abolition of the privileges of hereditary nobility in France, since each man may henceforward create himself, at pleasure, a duke, marquis, or baron. This of itself is something, until we can have something better.

It will be seen that, while the wavering liberalism of the men of monopoly and the double vote, has given way on every side; while the hearts of so many liberals have failed, to whom France had given credit for civic virtues; the ancient patriotism of Lafayette has remained unshaken, the beacon of liberty, in the midst of that Chamber unnerved by fear or undermined by corruption.

In all the prominent discussions of that long and calamitous session, upon the address, the peerage, the civil list, the budget, the foreign policy insinuating itself throughout, we have seen him, faithful to his principles of half a century, contending inch by inch, and from position to position, against the encroachments of aristocracy, of whatever origin, upon the salutary doctrine of the sovereignty of the people; a doctrine upon which, in his eyes, necessarily depend the wishes, the interests, the wants, the civilisation, the genius, and the greatness of nations; a doctrine, in short, with which he has imbued every great question upon which he has entered, and of which he has left such deep traces in the minds of men, that no human frenzy has power to efface them.

The doors of the Palais-Bourbon were closed. The battle had actually ceased for want of combatants, and our terrified and panting tribunes of the people had fled to their country houses. The cholera was not there yet. However, during the period of nearly half a century that the revolutionary torrent has been rolling over France, never had any legislative campaign been so fatal to the national interests of every kind, never had any chamber inflicted so many wounds on the country. The wants, the wishes, the interests, the civilisation, the greatness, the genius, and the results of France, all had been stained, withered in the unhalloved hands of the despots. And, most remarkable circumstance! astounding phenomenon! but eighteen months after the July revolution, the acts of this unique legislature had nothing in them either of the good or of the evil accomplished by former assemblies; its deeds were marked with a character quite peculiar, a character truly wonderful in its kind. * *

The events at Grenoble; the dissolution of the national guards of five or six departments; the prank at Marseilles; the clandestine landing of the Duchess of Berri on the coast of Provence; the culpable connivance, from family considerations, which allowed that attempt to go unpunished; the unobstructed journey of the Regent through our southern provinces, from the Mediterranean to the ocean; commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, struggling against insurmountable difficulties; the rising of La Vendée; the nearly accomplished overthrow of the Grey administration; and the disturbance which that event had been on the point of producing in the affairs of France; Poland buried in the silence of the grave, and grass growing in the streets of Warsaw, under the feet of the Cossack's horse; Prussia bringing up her reserves, and concentrating her corps on the banks of the Rhine; in the east, the Austrian battalions overrunning Bavaria, and all the small states of the Germanic confederation in motion; our handful of soldiers shut up in Ancona, and our national flag pitiously furled; the warlike attitude of Holland; the never-ending farce of the London conference; a conclave of Russian and German generals assembled at Berlin; in short, the whole combination of events which agitate Europe, wounding in every quarter our sympathies and our interests; all these things began to make the most indifferent feel that the cabinet of the Tuileries had, to say the least of it, lost all solicitude for the welfare of France.

Such was the state of things when that man died, who had been considered as the personification of the system of the 13th of March. The principal undertakings of M. Perier, looked upon the funeral of the president of the council as an excellent opportunity for reviving lukewarm affections, and affecting an imposing manifestation of regret for the loss of that minister, and of approbation for the political system of which they had constituted themselves the inheritors. In consequence of which, the national guards were ordered to attend as on duty at this funeral display; and six thousand of the people employed in the different government offices, received orders to put on erape, and to come and pour out their lamentations over the tomb of the great man, on whom, during three days, the treasury journals had been lavishing their official panegyric. Nothing that could excite the curiosity of the idle of a great capital, was neglected by the undertakers of the juste milieu; programmes describing the route of the procession, the number and the places of the civil and military bodies which were to accompany it, were distributed profusely in every quarter of Paris; and the fineness of the weather contributed to call out the people to witness this funeral solemnity. But neither the attractions of an imposing spectacle, nor the influence of a cloudless sky after a long winter, could awaken in the breasts of the spectators an enthusiasm which the errors of the illustrious dead had smothered. The people (I speak not of those of the government offices) were mute, as if retired indifferent to that pomp, out of which the organs of the cabinet of the 13th of March endeavoured by every means to extract excuses for all the faults, apologies for all the madness of the minister, whom death had just reduced to that nothingness from which, perhaps, it had been better for the honour and the reputation of his country that he had never been raised.

A few days after, an irreparable loss threw the country into consternation, a national loss, an incalculable loss, of which the future will perhaps very soon disclose to us the whole extent. A brave man, who had been prodigal of his blood on twenty fields of battle, whose heart never thrilled but for that France whom he served with honour in all her vicissitudes of fortune; one of the purest ornaments of the tribune and of the army; a deputy, who was as great an orator, as he was a skilful and faithful commander, Lamarque was no more!

Although it had been declared inevitable for several weeks before, this death produced in Paris the effect of a great and sudden calamity. * *

On Tuesday morning, the 5th of June, the most perfect quiet prevailed in every quarter of the capital, where nothing foreboded the sanguinary scenes which were to terminate this day. The sky was serene, and every thing announced that a fine sun would light up the obsequies of the illustrious dead. From ten o'clock, numerous assemblages of citizens proceeded towards the boulevards and in the direction of the neighbourhood of the house of mourning. These masses were composed of Frenchmen of all classes, and principally of national guards in uniform. The whole capital was affected with a profound feeling of regret, and appeared desirous to pay a last tribute to the mortal remains of a great citizen, who had fallen in the breach in defence of the public liberties. At eleven o'clock, the body of the deceased was placed on a funeral car; and, after some little confusion, inseparable from all ceremonies of this description, it proceeded on its way, drawn by patriots who contended for the honour of bearing such a burden. It was a magnificent spectacle, to see that multitude of Frenchmen and foreigners moving along in one silent mass which exceeded far more than a league, shading the coffin of Lamarque with twenty different banners, and joining in one common feeling of reverence and sorrow in the presence of the mortal remains of that faithful friend of all freedom. The procession moved on to the cries of Vive la Liberté! Vive Lafayette!

I shall say little of the incidents which occurred before the procession reached the Place de la Bastille, where Lamarque was to receive the last farewell of his friends. Those incidents are confined to a brutal attack made by some town serjeants, upon a young man who was crying Vive la Liberté! and whom they wounded dangerously. Those police agents were, however, saved from the most imminent danger, by the efforts of those Parisian artillery men who have just been disbanded a second time. The unseasonable obstinacy of M. de Fitz-James, in refusing to take off his hat for a few minutes while one hundred thousand of his fellow citizens were passing, barked, under his windows, gave rise also to some manifestations of resentment, which might have become serious had not the noble duke thought better of it. But there is an episode which I must relate, as one of the most remarkable characteristics of that solemnity. I allude to the sudden idea of going to the triumphal column. It has been suggested that this step was premeditated. That is not true; and to be convinced of it, it is sufficient to reflect that, had that project been previously entertained, they would have gone direct from the mansion of the deceased to the Place Vendôme, instead of reaching it by a circuitous route without any reason for doing so. The truth is, that the idea of that ovation occurring all at once, and when the procession was in full march, to some adepts in the honours of the old French school, it was adopted by the deputies who supported the funeral pal; for Marshal Clausel and General Lafayette were seen to take each other by the arm, and following the funeral car, with their heads uncovered, they made the circuit of the column, amid the plaudits of the national guard, who beheld with transport the homage thus rendered to French glory.

From that moment, there appeared to be grounds for dreading that a collision with the people was contemplated by the government. According to custom, whenever the corpse of a military man passes by a military post, the latter is put under arms. Why then, at the approach of the funeral procession of Lamarque, escorted by several detachments of troops of the line, did the post of the staff of the Place, including the sentry, retire into the guardhouse? Was not that departure from military usage, that wanton insult to the memory of a French general, calculated to irritate the people, and to excite serious disturbances? Such, indeed, would have been the immediate effect of that insult, if warned by the indignation which began to express itself in threats, the determination had not been taken to pay the honors due to the illustrious deceased. This scene, however, left an irritation in the minds of the spectators, and it was evident that little more would suffice to light up one vast flame.

Indignation had already been felt by all ranks, at the brutal measure of confining the pupils of the Polytechnic school within their walls, forbidding those brave youths the satisfaction of offering a last tribute to the military virtues which ought to serve them as a model and guide. From that moment, also, cries of Vive la Liberté "Honour to Lamarque!" "Down with the juste milieu!" were heard in the procession. But it was observed, that those cries were uttered by men unknown to the friends of liberty, and upon whom the latter in vain endeavoured to impose silence, by representing to them that on this occasion, the love of liberty should be expressed by grief alone.

But nothing yet announced the deplorable catastrophe which was preparing, and, though the route of the procession, as first arranged, could not be strictly observed, it reached the Place de la Bastille without either the rain which fell in torrents, or some vexation occasioned by the attack of the town sergeant, already mentioned, having had the effect of diverting the multitude from the fulfilment of a sacred and patriotic duty. The hearse had crossed the Place de la Bastille; crowds of people were pressing towards the platform, from which several speeches were to be delivered, and to which some national guards and the pupils of the Polytechnic school, flushed with heat, had hastened, and, in defiance of the orders of their commander, had formed themselves around it to protect the corpse, the invalids bearing the military insignia, and the orators who were to speak, from the pressure of the eager multitude.

An imposing stillness reigned among the people; but it was already perceived that some men desirous of creating a disturbance had mingled with them, and were endeavouring to excite them in spite of the efforts of the national guard and Lamarque's friends to put them down. Nevertheless silence appeared to be restored for a while; when Marshal Clausel, in the name of the army, and M. Mauguin, in that of the Chamber of Deputies, each delivered a speech which was received with great applause.

M. Pous de l'Hérault, the Polish general Uninski, the nuncio Leicwell, and the Portuguese general Saldanha, being invited to pay a tribute of respect to the defender of their cause, read successively some speeches, which were received with the strongest demonstrations of satisfaction. Lafayette being requested to speak in his turn, advanced near to the platform, and, in a short extempore speech, called the attention of the people, first to the spot where the Bastille formerly stood—that space, now the sublime memento of the revolution of 1789; then to that numerous assemblage of the people, victors in the great week of 1830. He paid an enthusiastic tribute to the banners, not of the kings, but of the people of Poland, Portugal, Spain, Italy, and Germany, which waved over the coffin of Lamarque, and which he called the children of our tri-coloured flag. He finished by entreating the multitude who heard him to retire quietly, and not spoil this patriotic day. And, as some mention had been made, as already stated, of conveying the corpse of Lamarque to the Pantheon, Lafayette earnestly enjoined the patriots to respect the wishes of the deceased, and the arrangements already made by his family. This exhortation met with a general assent; the deputies retired; and had this mournful ceremony terminated there, a more imposing, a more remarkable protest had never been made against a government and its system.

A concurrence of incidents quite unforeseen came opportunely to save the juste milieu.

Among the banners of various colours which, after the manner of England, were displayed in the procession, there were two red flags, which, it may be observed, seems at least to exclude the idea of premeditation. One of those flags, purchased, as is affirmed, during the march of the procession, had no inscription whatsoever. The other bore for its motto, Liberty or death; which, in the early period of the revolution, signified only to live free, or die; a motto which Louis Philippe, in his character of member of the Jacobin club, must have long borne on the buttons of his coat; but which, afterwards, under the reign of terror, might have been rendered by Liberty! or I kill thee!

The bonnet rouge, the bloody emblem of the terrorism of 1793, appeared all at once in the midst of Lamarque's funeral, but not before the coffin had reached the Place d'Austerlitz, that is, at the moment of finishing the obsequies. Out of what anarchist's, Carlisle's, or demagogue's pocket did it issue? That is a point which solemn events, not contemplated by the declaimers of a state of siege, will soon disclose to France. However that might be, this unfortunate scarecrow, fixed on one of the red flags, was borne for some time amidst the astonished crowd.

Whatever may come of the enquiry now pending in the tribunals, I do not hesitate to affirm that, on the part of the people, those deplorable events bear every mark of a fortuitous encounter, in which, under various impulses, some youths, some working men, and some national guards, engaged, but who, one hour before, and not the slightest notion of an insurrection, and who never thought of striking a blow until they were attacked. Now, if it be admitted that of the nine hundred persons, at the utmost, who were engaged in that unhappy conflict, one half, at least, consisted of those whom I have just mentioned, it will be seen to what this vast and formidable plot in behalf of the revolutionary scaffolds of 1793 really amounted; a plot to put down which it was necessary to employ more troops than were on the field of Wagram or Marengo.

The appearance of some troops of dragoons overturning all in their way, had roused the anger of the people and destroyed the effect of Lafayette's exhortations to preserve the peace. Then cries of We are attacked! To arms! No more Bourbons! Vive la République! resounded loudly, and a considerable number of citizens, and of pupils of the Polytechnic school, drew up in line, to form a rampart between the cavalry of the government and the crowd of citizens, men, women, and children, wedged together on the Place de la Bastille. But, while this first squadron was kept in check, another issued upon the Boulevard, no doubt to place the procession between two fires. Then it was that the first shots were exchanged. My readers are acquainted with the results of that first conflict, and the vicissitudes of the two days.

But in the midst of that confusion what had become of Lafayette? He had proceeded towards the spot where his carriage was to wait for him, and not finding it, he and his son got into a hackney coach, from which the people took the horses, and would draw it themselves, notwithstanding the efforts and earnest entreaties of Lafayette to be spared that species of British ovation, for which, in America as in Europe, and at every period of his life, he always evinced a strong aversion. It was however the only means left for getting out of the crowd, and escaping from the noisy testimonies of affection which were lavished upon him. In the mean time, the combat had commenced at the spot where the coffin was; and a large group of persons had presented themselves at the doors of Lafayette's carriage, uttering cries expressive of the greatest exasperation, and praying the general to allow himself to be conducted to the Hotel-de-Ville. Lafayette was rejecting that proposal, and conjuring those men to keep the peace; when this group, in the midst of which, as it is said, some agents of the police were seen to be very active, was separated by a detachment of dragoons. From that moment the carriage, turning to the right, in order to reach the general's residence, was surrounded only by an assemblage of persons totally unconnected with the conflict, and such as on so many other occasions had gathered together to escort the veteran of the people's cause.

Some cries of Vive la République! were intermingled with the cries of Vive Lafayette! But it must not be forgotten that police agents would naturally insinuate themselves into that procession, in order to give it another character. Besides, it was natural that those who wished a collision should remain on the Place de la Bastille, where the contest had already commenced. It has been pretended, however, that Lafayette's train attempted to disarm a military post on its way. The fact is, that some voices having called out for the post of La Madeleine to be put under arms, the officer on guard deemed it his duty to wait on the general for his orders, and to offer him an escort; which Lafayette declined, showing him at the same time that he was surrounded by friends, and advising him to return to his post which he did to the great satisfaction of every one. When they reached the general's residence, the good people who had accompanied him retired peaceably, and without the least disturbance having occurred during this long journey, from the Place de la Bastille to the street d'Anjou Saint-Honoré.

Lafayette reached his house at half past six in the evening, afflicted at the deplorable issue of a day which might have ended so well. The resistance to the troops was becoming general, but it was impossible to foresee yet the character which this fresh struggle would assume. Until nine o'clock, the most contradictory reports were brought him; but the only certain fact was that, in the impetuosity of their first impulse, four or five hundred young men, divided into a great many small platoons, had taken possession, in an instant, of all the posts established from the bridge of Austerlitz to the Bank of France. That circumstance proves two things, which explain the issue of those unhappy events: the first, that there was no premeditated plot; for how can the idea be admitted, of such a combination, supported by so small a number; the second, that if a greater number of citizens had taken part in the battle, the result might have been very different.

On the 5th the king had come from the palace of Saint Cloud to the Tuileries, where the council of ministers was sitting constantly, no doubt in expectation of having it announced to them that the obsequies of Lamarque had ended to the satisfaction of every one. It was there that all the measures of suppression were arranged, and thither that the rural battalions came as they passed, to tender their country courage in the emblems of royalty. There it was likewise that MM. Soult and Robespierre proposed to place Paris in a state of siege, at the time that fortune had not yet declared in favour of the cabinet of the 13th of March, and that the government was really in some danger; a proposal that was indignantly rejected, on the ground that a paternal government ought not to place eight hundred thousand Frenchmen out of the pale of the civil law, and treat its own capital like an enemy's town, except when there is no longer any thing to be feared.

As soon as Lafayette had entered his house, he became an object of the most anxious solicitude. Interest and curiosity crowded his door. His friends and his enemies were the more eager to know what had become of him, as the most contradictory and sinister reports were circulated about him. Here, it was asserted that the insurgents had taken and installed him at the Hotel-de-Ville; there, that his body, pierced with several bayonet wounds, was borne, bleeding, through the streets of Paris, by republicans, calling the people to revenge; in other places, that the government had arrested him, and thrown him into the dungeon of Vincennes.

Nothing of all this was true. Lafayette, best abroad, and no doubt at home, by the scouts of every description of police, was at that moment, as on all great occasions, calm, firm, and prepared for every event. Being placed about his person, I was enabled, once again, to observe the feelings which agitated his mind under these new and trying circumstances. His whole soul was absorbed in grief and indignation; his heart bled at the sight of French blood flowing at the hands of Frenchmen; it heaved at the thought that the breach of faith and the fatal blindness of the government, had called down these fresh calamities, and armed the combatants and the throne of July against each other. But if Lafayette deprecated the faults of the government, he deplored and censured with equal severity the serious criminality and imprudent rashness of the young men who sought that redress of grievances in revolt and violence, for which they should only have looked to time, the laws, and the regular operation of the Chamber and the press.

Meanwhile the conflict was prolonged, the reports of the musketry continued, and the deepest grief was depicted on Lafayette's countenance. Between seven and eight o'clock several patriots, and a considerable number of deputies, came successively and pressed around him, to ask him what could or ought to be done, to put an end to the calamities which desolated the capital, and to those yet greater evils with which it was threatened. But the time was past when the patriotism of Lafayette could interpose effectually between the people and the throne of July. For several months past he had acquired the painful certainty that that throne was no longer accessible to persuasion.

In this state of things, it was agreed that the opposition deputies, then at Paris, should repair in the evening to M. Lafitte's, in order to concert there the measures to be taken for putting a speedy end to the calamities which that day had brought on. The meeting was verbally appointed for nine o'clock; but as all regular means for conveying it were impossible, and, besides, events had taken every one from his home, between twenty and thirty members only could be assembled. They consisted, among others, of M.M. Lafitte, Cabet, Lafayette, George Lafayette, Mangin, &c. &c.

The debate turned upon the most proper means for stopping the effusion of blood, and inducing the victor to make a moderate use of his victory, considering that he had at least a great share in occasioning the conflict. Two expedients were proposed: an address and a deputation to the king. They were each canvassed. Lafayette agreed to neither the one nor the other; first, because he was convinced, he said, by experience, of their total inutilty; and secondly, because, if every thing was at an end, as was affirmed, it would ill become the national opposition to take such a step after the event, especially when it was certain that the doctrinaire deputies had obstructed, for several hours past, all the avenues to the throne. Lafayette spoke also with sorrow and with candour of the little success that had attended his efforts, at the two greatest periods of his existence, to solve the problem of a citizen monarchy based on the sovereignty of the people.

Without having come to any decision upon the subject of the address, the idea was resumed of a deputation, which should be instructed to make verbal representations to Louis Philippe. Lafayette refused to make one in that deputation for two reasons, which he explained with every circumstance. The first was, the perfect conviction he was under, from the last conversation he had with the king, that the opinions of that prince on the system of government were so fixed, that persuasion, at least coming from him, would no longer have any effect in altering the adopted system; Lafayette's second reason was that, as his presence must remind the king of either the violation or the forgetfulness of a solemn engagement, it behaved him to spare his majesty, and even himself, an interview which bitter recollections would render extremely painful to both.

All these proposals, as I said, were more an interchange of ideas and talk than a regular deliberation. The meeting broke up at midnight, without coming to any decision, but it was settled to meet again the next day at ten o'clock, at M. Lafitte's. I shall make no remark on that adjournment to the next day, at a time when every moment was costing the life of a Frenchman. I have already said that the genius of 1830 had fled; and that the greater part of the men whose courage had then surmounted so many dangers, appeared in 1832 to be the mere shadows of themselves. * * Partial conflicts were continued to a very late period of the night; but the strength of the respective combatants was too greatly disproportioned to render the issue doubtful. Thirty thousand regular troops of all descriptions, fifty thousand national guards, and a formidable train of artillery, assembled under the command of a marshal of France, to subdue seven or eight hundred young men with scarcely any arms, had from daybreak left no longer any chance of success for the insurrection.

Matters were at this point when, on the 6th, at ten in the morning, the opposition deputies repaired again to M. Lafitte's. There were present, Lafayette, George Lafayette, Odilon-Barrot, Mangin, &c. The sending of an address and a deputation was still agitated. Upon the subject of the two questions of the address and the deputation to the king, Lafayette repeated the arguments he had used on the preceding evening, and then he retired, as did also several of his colleagues, before any determination had been come to. However, the members who remained, decided on adopting the idea of a personal application to the king, and for that purpose appointed M.M. Lafitte, Odilon-Barrot, and Arago.

It was four o'clock. Louis Philippe had just returned from riding through some of the streets of Paris. Now, Frenchmen never remain unmoved at seeing a king on horseback inhaling the smoke of gunpowder. The national guard, which had really burnt some priming, and left some dead bodies on the ground, was proud of its first triumph; commerce and property, which had looked upon themselves as delivered over to all the frenzies of jacobinism, and still dreamed of nothing but scaffolds and bonnets rouges, were overjoyed at seeing the spectre of 1793 vanquished, and anarchy in fetters. In one word, enthusiasm was on the side of the safety of property, humanity and liberty were silent. Therefore, the royal train, taking its airing to the expiring reports of the musketry, and appearing as the precursor of a calm in the midst of a storm which might have overturned every thing, was received with acclamations. Now those acclamations, the real cause of which was not considered, must naturally have produced a feeling of exultation and security, little favourable to the success of the mission of M.M. Lafitte, Barrot, and Arago.

These honourable citizens were, however, received with visible satisfaction by the crowd of aides-de-camp and officers on duty, that filled the saloon of the palace, and who appeared more grieved at the blood of their brethren that was spilling, than vain of an inglorious victory: this justice it is gratifying to render them.

The three deputies were introduced immediately into the bed chamber of Louis the XVIII., converted, by the workmen of July, into the study of Louis Philippe. The latter presently repaired to it through a door which communicated with the queen's apartments.

The demeanour and countenance of the king were calm, his address easy, indicating not the slightest alarm, and expressing none of those anxieties of mind which circumstances might have justified. His Majesty received the three patriots politely; he told them he was very glad to see them, that the opposition could have chosen no more favourable moment to him; and, after inviting them to be seated, and placing himself before his writing-table, he signified his readiness to listen to them.

M. Odilon-Barrot spoke first; and ended with entreating the king to stop the effusion of blood which was yet flowing, and to silence the cannon, the roar of which was then resounding even in his royal residence; to be merciful to the vanquished, and to prevent fresh disturbances, by a prompt and cordial return to the principles upon which the revolution had established the dynasty.

The king answered that, being audaciously attacked by his enemies, he was justified in defending himself; that it was high time to curb revolt, and that he employed cannon only to put it down the quicker; that he had, however, rejected the proposal which had been made him of placing the city of Paris in a state of siege; that as to the pretended engagements at the Hotel-de-Ville, and those republican institutions about which the Opposition made so much noise, he did not know what all that meant; that he had more than fulfilled the promises he had made, and had given France as many and more republican institutions than he had promised her; that the programme of the Hotel-de-Ville had never existed except in the brain of M. Lafayette, whose incessant demands on that head were evidently the effect of some mistake; that as to the system called that of the 13th of March, it was wrong to ascribe the credit of it to M. Perier, for that system was the king's, it was the effect of his own convictions, the result of his own reflections, and the expression of his notions of policy and government; that he, Louis Philippe, had consented to take the crown only on the conditions indicated by the development of that system, the most conformable to the wishes and the wants of France, and from which he would not deviate, serre he been brayed in a mortar. "And now, gentlemen, added the king, "the point is, not to utter vague accusations, but to state precisely the complaints you have to make against the Perier system, of which poor Perier was assuredly quite innocent. With what have you to charge that system? Let us hear."

M. Arago replied by a rapid and animated statement of the divisions which were tearing France to pieces, and which the policy of the government nourished with an almost scrupulous care; he spoke of his own family divided by political opinions; he cited his brother and his nephew who were perhaps, at that very moment, ready to take each other's life in conflicting ranks; and in order to characterise the situation of things by an example, he adverted to the times of the League, when D'Ailly, under Henry IV., slaughtered his own son in the streets of Paris. M. Arago then spoke of all the public employments being given to the partisans of the fallen regime, the indulgence shown to the Carlist machinations, the bitter persecution of the discarded men and press of July, and the displeasure manifested throughout France, at the apparent impunity enjoyed by the Duchess of Berni.

At these words, Louis Philippe exclaimed that his government had no enemies but the Carlists and republicans; that the prejudices that had been just mentioned to him, were only the result of their contrivances; that he was accused of avarice, he, who had never had any value for money; that his best intentions were misrepresented, to such a degree that, for a long time past, he could read neither the Tribune nor the National; that his father, who was the best citizen of France, had been calumniated like himself, and urged to give the Revolution a sanguinary pledge which he ought to have refused it; that the exactions of the two revolutions were alike untenable; that he, Louis Philippe, was not obstinate, and that he proved it when, after long resisting, he had committed the error of giving way to popular tumult, by effacing, from the pediments of his palace, and from the armorial bearings of his house, the fleur-de-lis, which had, in all times, been borne by his family.

As for the representations relative to the Duchess of Berni, Louis Philippe declared that, if that princess were arrested, justice should take its course; but that, happen what might, his reign should witness no sanguinary drama. At that instant, the report of the cannon of Saint Merry shook the windows of the palace.

On rising, M. Lafitte told the king that he retired filled with the greatest grief; that he supplicated him to compare the enthusiasm his presence excited formerly, with the effect which it now produced; that which attested that something was deeply wrong; and that he implored his majesty to ask himself whether a king of France, who needs fifty thousand men to guard him, is really a king of France.

Such, in substance, was that conversation, which will leave deep traces not soon to be effaced. * * *

What is to be concluded from all that has gone before? I hasten to declare it. That both system and ministry bear upon their front the marks of decomposition, and the sign of certain death; that Lafayette is still the highest and purest personification of the revolution of July; that he has shared all the vicissitudes of liberty betrayed; and that he will share her triumph, when the episode being terminated, the history shall be resumed.

But what is to be the duration of that episode? That of a situation, which, by its very nature, is doomed to be ephemeral. Destruction dwells in the thoughts of the 8th of August; life and perfectibility, in the immortal principle of the Hotel-de-Ville.

TO THE READER.

It has recently been remarked, that "the press is like a baker's oven, occupied with working off hot rolls for breakfast." The allusion is more particularly applicable to the periodical press of this country, where in truth "the chief part of all it does is consumed in the day, and it may be that very little is to be stored up." The editor of the "Select Circulating Library" believes he may extend this simile in the present instance, and compare the "Library" to the well concocted loaf, which, while it satisfies the appetite, possesses nutritive properties, at once substantial and digestible, invigorating and durable. He feels induced to make a few remarks respecting the striking difference this periodical presents when compared with others. He means no invidious comparison—each kind has a character of its own, and it is satisfactory to believe that in the main all are working together for the diffusion of knowledge. The taste for reading, however, has increased even in a greater ratio than the immense means in operation for its gratification. For every man who formerly read a book, there are five hundred readers now, and for this increasing demand the old process of production and distribution has been found entirely inadequate.

It is a striking remark of one of our most distinguished statesmen, that our mighty rivers, and the development of the riches they were fitted to convey, may almost be said to have determined both the time and the place of the invention of the steamboat! So in printing; "it too may be said to have come at the bidding of increased curiosity and intelligence." But in taking a survey of the immense territorial expanse of these states, we might ask, what avails a book manufactory in Philadelphia to a reader of Mississippi? For all available purposes of gratifying a literary taste by the early receipt of new books, a Mississippian, tit in inventon (for we are decided in calling it an invention) of our mode of circulating entire books, was twice as far from Philadelphia or New York as we are from London or Paris—in other words, the delays of land and water carriage, to say nothing of the folder, stitcher, and binder, would effectually debar an inhabitant beyond the Mississippi from the receipt of a new book from this city, at the lowest calculation, for two months! and in the same proportion to any intermediate distance. The demand for books, for which schools and periodicals have paved the way, could no longer submit to these delays, which in literature were as vexatious to the reader, as the polling and warping system of transportation from New Orleans was to the merchant of Louisville or St. Louis. At the bidding of increased curiosity and intelligence, the present mode of publication has been devised, some of the advantages of which it is our present purpose to investigate.

One of the great objects to which the "Library" aspires, is to furnish good books to the body of intelligent and industrious population, "to be received at their homes, and read for instruction and recreation in their hours of leisure. To pour the stream of knowledge into the little channels which lead to every fireside, and by insinuating a taste for what some one has called 'the most innocent and lasting of our pleasures,' to impart a new charm and a new attraction to that congregation of secure and blessed enjoyments which we call HOME."

The same distinguished individual from whom we have already quoted, when speaking of the Library Company of Philadelphia, remarks:—"yet with all the additional sources of supply, Franklin's Library has now upwards of eight hundred shareholders—supposing each of the shareholders at all times to have out a volume, and to keep it two weeks, it will be perceived that he will have the reading of twenty-six volumes in the course of the year. The advantage, however, is not limited to the shareholders. There may be two or three in each family who read the books taken from the Library, thus extending its direct use to more than two thousand persons. And certainly nothing can be cheaper. The cost to a shareholder, allowing interest upon the capital invested in a share, is six dollars and forty cents a year; so that for less than two cents a day, a man and his family may be constantly supplied with books. * * There is not the smallest doubt that such a library must have had, and must continue to have, a powerful influence upon the character of the city, and have acted effectively in promoting the diffusion of knowledge."

Following out this idea in relation to the present publication, it will not be deemed irrelevant to make the same calculation respecting the "Select Circulating Library," which for a cent and a half a day, postage included, will supply a duodecimo book every week to a man and his family, with this additional feature, that, though he may not have access to the same variety, yet when he and his children have read it, it is his own, and may be sent to another family, or sold at the completion of each volume, for what it cost; even probably for more. The number now printed amounts to six thousand, so that when these are all taken by subscribers, the direct use of the edition, on the same calculation, will be extended to eighteen thousand individuals! If our selections are well chosen, conveying information while they serve for recreation, may we not hope for a portion of such patronage as has been extended to the publications of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, who have recently announced that of several "parts" or numbers of the "Library of Useful Knowledge," the sale has exceeded fourteen thousand, and of their "Penny Magazine" they state "its sale amounts at present to one hundred and thirty thousand copies per number, and its circulation is still extending?"

"Knowledge is diffused," continues the same gentleman, "through the body of society to an extent hitherto unexampled, and this diffusion is increasing with a rapidity continually accelerated." We claim to be the pioneers of its still further increased diffusion in America, and our press we hope may yet be likened to "a baker's oven, occupied with working off not only rolls for the breakfast" of the reader, but of loaves, the chief part of which will not, like the manna in the wilderness, be corrupted by the light of day, but of which much "is to be stored up" for future use.

Actual experiment on our part has repeatedly tested the difference between the price of a book in the usual form and in this. In one instance we furnished a volume entire to subscribers for twenty cents; which cost in London six dollars; and in another for forty cents. We printed these afterwards in book size—the first is sold at fifty cents, and the wholesale price of the other is one dollar. Thus we furnish for five dollars what costs at even the lowest American price, twelve dollars and a half, and we supply it immediately, and simultaneously to all the states. With our present arrangements we can put a book in circulation in five or six weeks after it is issued in London. What constitutes this difference in price? The answer we are prepared to give. The cost of margin in books is a considerable item, which is principally saved by us—the cost of the press work too, is trebled by spreading types over a large surface—the binding also, is an expensive item; and the interest and transportation fully make up the difference we have stated above. But are these all the advantages? At the conclusion of each half year, the "Library" will form a volume of reference exceeding 416 pages, in a compact form, containing from fifteen to twenty separate and complete works, the cost of binding all of which will very little exceed that of binding one of the various publications of which it will consist.

The editor acknowledges the attention of numerous correspondents from almost every state in the Union, in their various suggestions as to the future books which shall occupy these pages. With every disposition to respect and profit by the remarks he has been favoured with by friends and strangers, he finds it impossible to gratify individual wishes when they clash with the plan he has marked out, to which he has devoted much time, and which will continue to claim his unremitting attention. That plan was fully stated in the original prospectus, and from it he has not found any occasion to deviate; it was, to publish the newest and best books in the various departments of Novels, Memoirs, Tales, Travels, Sketches, Biography, &c.—in short the whole range of popular literature. The editor will not, however, sacrifice at the shrine of mere novelty in any of these departments; when a new book does not offer of the required character, he will extend his research among the numerous works which he has already within his reach, besides what may be afforded by his regular importations from Europe; keeping in view to cater for his readers works which have not, by the number of reprints, become familiar to the majority. This field is so ample that he hopes to furnish as good matter at least, as is issued from other presses—that it will rarely be the same as has been previously sold by American booksellers, he ventures to believe will prove a decidedly valuable feature in the "Circulating Library," in which the editions are now so large as to make it imperative on him to use due diligence in furnishing good and wholesome aliment.

In conclusion, we must ask from our readers some indulgence, if, in the prosecution of a task not without its difficulties, the tastes of all are not gratified, in every instance, by our selections—hoping, from our increased facilities and resources, generally to suit every palate.

Philadelphia Library Rooms, Jan. 28th, 1833.

* * * The publisher respectfully suggests to his present numerous subscribers who have thus far been pleased with the "Library," that a good word spoken seasonably to their friends might materially aid the interests of the work, and increase the circulation to an extent which will enable him to add every additional valuable feature to the publication which time and experience may suggest. The first thirteen numbers are entirely exhausted, but a new series, No. 1, was commenced with Sarrate's Memoirs, from which new subscribers may depend on being supplied. The works contemplated to be published are numerous, and of the highest literary character. For the flattering encouragement given to the publication he returns his unfeigned acknowledgments.

Old men forget; yet all shall be forgot;
But he'll remember with advantages
What feats he did that day.—KING HENRY V.

INTRODUCTION.

Mr. Gleig, now the Rev. G. R. Gleig, author of the "History of the Bible," and of "British India," &c. in the Family Library, is generally understood to have written "The Subaltern," unquestionably the most popular military narrative of the present day. It led the way in showing how military operations might be told, so as at the same time to satisfy the practical soldier, and to interest the professional reader. No man perhaps ever exhibited a happier talent for describing what he had seen—a talent in itself of no mean value, nor of very common occurrence. It need scarcely be added that the present narratives are purely fictitious, as regards the author's personal co-operation in the transactions. The stories are supposed to be told by a body of retired military men, who live together in an establishment or voluntary association, where of course they are glad to see and entertain visitors. On the occasion of a ramble to their neighbourhood, the author meets one of the officers, while enjoying the amusement of fly-fishing, is invited home, and represents himself as having heard the stories at the table of these sociable and communicative veterans. The President called on a junior member for a narrative, and Major Chakut, after duly apologising for his want of talent, began the following story of "The Gentle Recruit."—Ed.

CHAPTER I.

I think it was somewhere about the middle of January 1810, when the — regiment occupied the barracks at Braeburn Lees, that the sergeant of the day made his appearance one morning in my quarters, to announce that a young man was waiting in the orderly room for the purpose of being enlisted. As I happened at the moment to be in temporary command of the battalion, and knew that it was kept at home only till its establishment should be complete, you will readily believe that I received this communication with considerable satisfaction, which was the more lively because of the sergeant's reiterated assurances, that to the person and qualifications of the recruit no objection would be offered.

"He is as clever a lad," said the orderly, "as ever placed himself under the king's standard,—tall, erect, well built, and quite genteel,—indeed he looks as if he had been drilled a year or so already; and will, unless appearances be very deceitful, make an extremely smart soldier."

"There was much of promise in this description, and I knew him that gave it too well, to question its verisimilitude; so I hurried off in the firm conviction that a prize was within my grasp, and quite prepared to receive, almost without examination, this aspirant after military distinction into the ranks.

That the sergeant had not overrated the personal qualities of the volunteer, a single glance sufficed to convince me. When I entered the orderly room, I beheld before me a youth, apparently not more than eighteen or nineteen years of age, whose appearance, manner, and general address, differed totally from those of the class of persons from among whom the ranks of our army are usually filled up. His features were not merely regular, but surpassingly beautiful; his figure tall and slender, but admirably proportioned, seemed a very model of grace and manly elegance, and his air was that of a person accustomed to mix in the best society, if not as a superior, at all events as an equal. His dress, too, though manifestly a disguise, betrayed here and there those trifling attentions to neatness, of which the common people seldom dream. A shabby frock coat, for example, was buttoned over a shirt made of the finest linen, and exceedingly white; a pair of kid gloves covered his small delicate hands; and his boots were thin, light, and well made,—like those worn, not by agricultural labourers or journeyman artisans, but by gentlemen. It was impossible, indeed, to examine his costume, without being wonning at once to the conclusion, that he had seen better days, and that to the step which he was about to take, he was impelled by circumstances of no common urgency.

This conviction no sooner flashed across my mind, than the eagerness with which I had resolved to accept of the proffer of his services vanished. It seemed to me, that possibly the youth might have fled from school or college in disguise; that his friends or guardians might, at this very moment, be making a search after him; and hence, that to indulge him now might involve not himself only, but others, in lasting misery. I accordingly determined to enquire a little into his circumstances, previous to my examination of him as a recruit; and believing that he would be more easily persuaded to speak out were there no third party present at the conference, I ordered the sergeant to withdraw.

It very soon appeared, that for such a proceeding on my part the young man had not been unprepared. He smiled lightly as the sergeant closed the door, and drawing himself up to his full height, stood like one ready to answer no more interrogatories than his own judgment might dictate. Nor did the attitude belie his behaviour: to all my questions, as to whence he came, where he was born, who were his connections, why he had chosen the life of a soldier, &c. he replied in one strain, and in one only; in other words, he either gave no answer at all, or his answer was entirely without point. It was of little consequence to any one, he said, who he was; he came from a remote county, and was not disreputably connected; but where that county lay, or who those connections were, he declined to state; in a word, events over which he possessed no control, had rendered him an alien to his family,—he was a solitary being on the face of the earth, and he had determined to enlist, because he knew no other means of earning a subsistence; at all events, none which his feelings would permit him to adopt.

On my continuing to press upon him the necessity of mature deliberation, before he took a step so decided and irrevocable, he replied firmly, but without any thing of insolence in his tone, that his mind had long been made up, and that if I refused to receive him, he must proceed to the next military station, where he made little doubt that the officer would prove less scrupulous. Finding him in this frame of mind, and seeing that the die was cast, I no longer objected to comply with his wishes; I gave him the shilling,—he took his place on the left flank of the line, under the name of John Jackson.

You will readily believe that the peculiarity of the circumstances under which this young man entered the corps, rendered him at once an object of no common interest among all classes. That he was well born, had received a liberal education, and was in many respects ill adapted to the station into which he had thrust himself, no one could for a moment doubt; indeed the whole tenor of his conduct was such as to force the conviction of these truths even upon the most incredulous. It is true, that in all matters of drill and duty he was exceedingly attentive; that on parade the most penetrating eye could detect no blot in his appointments, nor awkwardness in his positions; and that he executed his movements not merely with alertness, but as it seemed, with enthusiasm. In like manner, his deportment towards his superiors was uniformly correct. Every mark of deference to which their rank entitled them, he scrupulously bestowed; nor was it possible for the most fastidious, in this respect at least, to find fault with him; yet there was on all such occasions an air of reserve or hauteur about him, which he was either wholly unpossessed of, or which he did not so much as attempt to suppress. Touching his eye, an officer for example, or in addressing a sergeant on some point of duty, Jackson always contrived to make the individual saluted aware, that whilst salute was granted, not to his person, but to his office; whilst of that readiness to ingratiate himself into the good graces of those set over him, which in most cases distinguishes the young soldier, he was totally wanting. So far, indeed, was he from courtship notice, that he sedulously shunned it, never voluntarily coming in the way even of his commanding officer, lest he might be required to perform some office, or execute some commission, not strictly within the line of military duty.

If such was the line of Jackson's conduct towards his superiors, you will not be surprised to learn, that among his fellow privates he appeared still more reserved and more haughty. Of rudeness or open incivility, in the strict sense of these terms, it is true that he could not fairly be accused; that is to say, he readily answered the salutations of such as spoke to him, and never refused to do to any act of kindness as often as an opportunity offered; but he shunned the society of his fellow soldiers generally, as far as it was practicable so to do, and made a friend and associate of none. Numerous and frequent were the advances made to him without effect, not only among the private soldiers, but among the non-commissioned officers. The pay-sergeant of his company offered to share his quarters with him; Jackson thanked him for the offer, but declined it,—even the sergeant-major so far forgot the dignity of his station, as to throw out hints of his desire to cultivate the recruit's acquaintance. Jackson took care not openly or contemptuously to spurn the proposed intimacy, but he avoided it.

In this manner, though one of a body of eight hundred men, he lived alone. This walks, when he took any, were by lonely paths and unfrequented lanes. He never entered the town except on duty; indeed he generally confined himself to the barrack yard, or to the fields immediately adjoining. On no occasion was he known to take part in the sports or games pursued by his comrades. Though there was a reindeer, races were run day after day without his standing forward as a candidate for the prize; the racket court and cricket field were equally neglected; and of the catenae, it is said that he never held the interior except on duty, when, being on guard, he formed one of a party sent to clear it. In short, he continued to do what he said he was when he first came among us,—a solitary being, holding no intercourse, nor encouraging any community of feeling with those about him.

Every one who knows of what materials the generalia of British regiments are composed, will understand, that a character such as I have just described is not very likely to be a favourite in his corps. The privates, seeing all their efforts to insinuate themselves into his good graces fail, soon began to entertain for Jackson an extreme aversion. The idea that he was by birth a gentleman, which had operated for a short time in his favour, was now entertained as an adequate reason why he should be made the subject of personal hostility; and the nickname of "Gentle Jackson," which had at first been bestowed upon him in joke, was soon employed as an epithet of derision. Rude jokes were practised at his expense. His privacy was wantonly and continually broken in upon; his air, manner of walking, and form of speech were mimicked, and the most ribald conversation was invariably broached as often as he came within hearing. Even the non-commissioned officers were not backward in their efforts to annoy,—or, as they chose to term it, to humiliate the pride of this fine gentleman. When it came Jackson's turn to cook the dinners, or sweep out the room, the greatest exactness was required, and the most minute failing rigorously rebuked; whilst on more than one occasion, tasks were imposed upon him, such as he was not called upon by his routine of duty to perform. All this the young gentleman bore with extraordinary equanimity and endurance. Of the rude speeches of his comrades he took no notice. When he saw himself dogged or watched, he would retire to his quarters; and the attempts at mimicry in which those about him indulged, he either did not understand, or he despised them. So it was in his dealings with the non-commissioned officers. He performed his tasks with so much diligence, and was always so exact, that the opportunities presented to them of venting their spleen were rare; and when they did vent it in oaths or expletives, he made as if he heard them not. Once, and only once, he ventured to remonstrate against the injustice of their proceedings. Having been ordered on fatigue, when the duty to be discharged happened to be peculiarly disgusting, he reminded the sergeant who gave the order, that he had taken his turn only the day before, and that though he certainly would not refuse to do as he was desired, the petty tyrant might rely upon a statement of the case being laid before the commanding officer. Jackson's threat was not thrown away upon the individual to whom it was addressed. The young man escaped an office of which he could not think without loathing; but he made Sergeant Tompkins from that time forth his implacable enemy.

I am sorry to say that it is not among the privates and non-commissioned officers only, that a gentleman in the ranks is apt to be regarded with an eye of disfavor. The habits of military discipline are far from being in accordance with the turn of mind which leads a man in authority to look with forbearance upon the absence of servility in his inferiors; indeed, where there is not serv-ility,—absolute, unmitigated servility,—in the general manner of a private soldier, some reason, the reverse of favourable to the person affected, rarely fails to be discovered. The soldier who is not ready to fly at the beck of his officer—who appears not to covet the honour of serving him in any capacity and under any circumstances, may too often lay his account with being put down as a sulky and ill-conditioned scoundrel; and however meritorious his conduct may be in matters purely professional, that will hardly make amends for a fault, by which the personal vanity of a superior is wounded. Far be it from me to insinuate that this is always the case; I only affirm that it occurs too frequently, and that it is almost unavoidably occasioned by the nature of those distinctions which military discipline engenders. Be this however as it may, one thing is quite certain, that in the case of Jackson, this disposition began gradually to show itself; and that of those who either did feel, or pretended to feel for his situation when he enlisted, several, before the first month of his service expired, viewed him with distaste.

"An extremely saucy fellow, that gentle recruit of ours," said one. "He will go a mile out of his way at any time to avoid saluting an officer; and when he cannot escape that degradation, one might fancy that he was receiving a mark of recognition from a superior."

"The scoundrel looks always as if he considered himself made of different clay from those about him," said another. "What business has such a fine gentleman in the ranks?"

"I am continually receiving complaints of his ill-manner and pride," remarked the adjutant; "but he fellow is a clean and orderly soldier too; and though they speak against him often enough in general terms, no one seems able or willing to condescend upon particulars."

Thus were men's minds gradually alienated from a youth, to whose charge, as the adjutant justly said, no definite accusation could be laid; till at last there appeared something like a positive wish to catch the offensive individual tripping. Jackson, however, appeared no more proud than cautious. He was scrupulously attentive to every duty; nor was it till after his patience had been tried beyond the power of human endurance, that the shadow of an accusation could be brought against him.

CHAPTER II.

I have said that Jackson, by venturing to remonstrate against an unjust exercise of power on the part of a sergeant, incurred the fullest extent of that person's implacable hostility. It unfortunately happened that Sergeant Tompkins, the irritated official, was pay-sergeant of the company to which Jackson belonged; and of the influence which the pay-sergeant possesses with the captain or officer in command, all who know any thing of the customs of the service must be aware. The whole of that influence was, on the present occasion, excited to impress Jackson's captain with an unfavourable opinion of the recruit. A thousand groundless complaints were made of him, as that he was mutinous, disorderly, unsocial, and impertinent; he was represented as an artificial and dangerous hypocrite—one who took every opportunity of poisoning the minds of his comrades, at the same time that he affected to keep aloof from them—and of whom no good could possibly be expected, till his proud spirit should have been thoroughly broken. Captain Fletcher, the individual to whom these reports were carried, chanced to belong to that class of persons whom I have already represented as acknowledging no tolerance for any thing like an independent spirit in an inferior. He it was, indeed, who first took notice of the stiff and formal manner in which Jackson saluted,—a matter which he dwelt on with the greater bitterness, in consequence of a personal slight which he believed himself to have suffered from the hands of the young soldier. Having been pleased with the cleanliness and orderly behaviour of the recruit on duty, Captain Fletcher had communicated to Jackson his desire to employ him as a servant, making the communication with the condescending air of a superior, who confers some prodigious benefit upon a dependent. To his extreme surprise and indignation, Jackson declined the proposed patronage, in a manner which left no doubt on the captain's mind, that he had felt the offer not as an honour, but as an insult. Captain Fletcher could not forget that circumstance; it rankled in his mind like a cauter in a wounded limb, and he scarcely took the trouble to disguise his vehement desire of finding a fitting opportunity to chastise the scoundrel for his insolence.

It is hardly necessary to say that Jackson, thus situated, soon began to feel that in embracing the honourable profession of arms as a private sentinel, he had committed a great and fatal error. He was still the neatest and most intelligent soldier upon parade, yet the morning and evening never passed without his being compelled to submit to reproaches which he was conscious that he did not merit, whilst his hours in quarters became, before long, such as even he, patient as he was, could with difficulty endure. Hitherto the attacks made upon him were merely those of speech and gesture; now, however, that he was known to hold a mean place in his captain's favour, practical jokes were indulged in; his accommodations were no sooner cleaned, and placed in order for inspection, than some accident or other befall them; and he was compelled to go through the whole process of pipe clay and black ball over and over again. This occurred repeatedly, without his being able to fix the blame upon any individual; and he knew the temper of those about him too well to complain of all or any in general terms. But an opportunity presented itself at last of bringing the matter home to the guilty, and Jackson fully failed in taking adequate advantage of it, through a sudden impulse of passion, which he had ample reason afterwards to lament. Jackson, who had been ordered to guard over night, paid, as is customary, more than usual attention to the furnishing of his accommodations; his belts were white as the drifted snow, his breast-plate shone like the sun at noon-day, and Day himself, even though assisted by his partner Martin, would have failed in adding any thing to the glossy blackness of his pouch and shoes. Every button on his jacket received its full portion of scrubbing, and pack, great-coat, cap, and haversack, had each been duly attended to.

This done, the young man placed them all in their proper situations, and strolled out into the field behind the barrack yard, for the purpose of whiling away the time till tattoo. Whether he had overheard some plot among his comrades, or suspected from other causes that there was a disposition to do him wrong, I cannot say; but he had not sat many minutes in his favourite corner, before he experienced an irresistible inclination to return. He obeyed it, and entering the barrack room, he held a spectacle which stirred up his choler beyond the control of reason. Five or six persons, among whom Sergeant Tompkins stood conspicuous, were in the act of effacing every trace of his evening's industry. His belts were already stained with grease spots, his pouch was discoloured and defiled, and his haversack, instead of having escaped the polluting touch of the mercenaries, Jackson's temper, which had stood many previous trials, gave way at last. He sprang forward, and confronting the sergeant, while in the act of putting a finishing hand to his unworthy operations, struck him to the ground with one blow of his fist. All was now confusion and uproar. The sergeant rising from the floor, called upon those near to assist in arresting a criminal, who, by this act of desperate mutiny, had incurred the severest penalties of martial law; whilst Jackson, worked up to a pitch of absolute frenzy, dared any man to lay upon him so much as a finger. For a moment, the soldiers lung back,—for there was a wildness and desperation in the young man's eye, which bespoke him utterly reckless of consequences; but it was only for a moment. They rushed in upon him—he made a grasp at his bayonet, but failed in securing it; and then, after a fruitless struggle, which lasted scarcely a second, he was borne to the earth. In the mean while news reached the mess-room that there was a tumult in the men's apartment. The captain of the day, as fortune would have it no other than Fletcher, rushed to the spot, where he arrived just as the men of his company had secured the hands of Jackson, and were preparing to drag him before the commanding officer.

"Captain Fletcher," exclaimed the desperate man, speaking with great rapidity, and under the influence of violent excitement, "I demand justice even from you. Look here, sir! Is it thus that I ought to stand, pinioned—bound—a prisoner? Is this the consummation of so many insults and wrongs—insults which I have borne. God knows how patiently—wrongs which I could not bear, yet feel myself a man? I know that you and I entertain no love for one another—I know that I have received no marks of favour at your hands, nor you any proof of extraordinary respect from me; but if you be a gentleman, if you feel like a gentleman—may, nay, if you feel like a man, order these things to be removed. I ask no more than this. Let me be free, that is all, and leave the rest to myself."

Even Fletcher was visibly struck by the energy of the young man's manner, and with a degree of consideration hardly to be expected from him, desired to be made acquainted with the causes of the disturbance. God help the luckless wretch, who, in any situation of life, stands singly opposed to a crowd; but doubly is he to be pitied, who, whatever the cause of the quarrel may be, fills the humble station of a private sentinel, and incurs the hostility of his comrades. Not one voice, but fifty exclaimed aloud, that Jackson had struck the sergeant. The sergeant himself stepped forward, exhibiting, in an eyebrow swollen and discoloured, corroborating proofs that this serious accusation was well grounded, and Captain Fletcher became in an instant satisfied that one course, and one only, was left for him to pursue. "It mattered not a straw of what nature the provocation given might be. To raise a hand against a superior, however slight the difference in rank, is a crime, which, if committed by one under martial law, is necessarily rated at the highest; nor are there any circumstances which, by the administrators of the most rigid of all codes, can be received as a justification. Captain Fletcher's duty was imperative. He ordered the culprit to be conveyed without delay to the black hole, there to be kept in close custody against the day of trial; whilst he himself departed to make a report of the whole transaction in the proper quarter."

It would be no easy matter to recover from the change of manner and temperament which exhibited itself, as soon as these directions were given, in the person of Jackson. His fury, which but a minute ago—fill little short of madness, suddenly subsided, and in its room came no unmanly weakness, but a cold and contemptuous disdain, as if he felt how absolutely desperate was the plight into which he had rushed, yet set its worst consequences at defiance. Without uttering a syllable of complaint, far less of justification, he calmly and deliberately prepared to follow his conductors; and he smiled with a bitterness which caused his enemy to quail beneath it, upon the sergeant as he passed. "There is something in the sight of a man beset with dangers or misfortunes, who bears himself well under his trials, which the most unfeeling and desperate cannot contemplate without involuntary respect. Seldom has this truth been more forcibly illustrated than it was on the present occasion. The very persons who, but a moment before, had joined so cordially in working Jackson wrong—who, by their clamour, had consigned him to a disgraceful imprisonment, to be followed, no doubt, by a punishment still more disgraceful—exhibited, all at once, manifest symptoms that they repented of their behaviour. There was no shout of triumph as "the gentleman" was led out, nor so much as a sentence of opprobrium or insult after him. On the contrary, whilst the majority looked in silence upon the work of their own hands, there were not wanting some who condemned with open mouth, the entire tenor of the affair, and expressed their indignation that a poor fellow should thus fall a victim to the ill-natured levity, to call it by no more serious name, of persons who ought to have known better. Of these speeches, however, Jackson, if he heard them, took no more notice than he would have done of their opposites had they been uttered. He proceeded on between a file of soldiers, who so far felt for his situation as to free his wrists, as soon as the officer's back was turned, from the manacles which had hitherto confined them, till having arrived at the black hole, a sort of dungeon adjoining to the guard-room, the door was opened, and he was thrust in, to find what comfort he could in his own reflections.

In what manner the prisoner passed that night it is, of course, impossible for me to say, because it was spent in solitude and utter darkness; but we may well believe that it was to him a night of no small suffering. He knew enough of military matters to be aware, that he had rendered himself liable to a destiny against which every generous or manly feeling revolts; and that from that terrible punishment nothing short of some fortunate accident, on the occurrence of which he was not justified in counting, could deliver him. Had it been death that awaited him, though no man can look forward to a violent death without horror, still the prospect might have been endured. There is at least nothing degrading in a capital punishment, provided it be inflicted for the breach of a law purely artificial; and the culprit who feels that from moral wrong his own conscience acquits him, may meet it without shame. But to be stripped before a crowd of spectators, tied up like a dog to the halberds, and bashed till the arms of his tormentors grow weary with the exercise,—there is something in the contemplation of such a fate which the most philosophic cannot contemplate with composure. That this horrible vision floated continually before the eyes of Jackson, there is no room to doubt; and that upon a mind, constituted as his was, it worked even more than its usual effects, can be little be questioned. But whatever his internal sufferings might be, he gave no outward proof of their violence at least none of which any report could be made by the sentinel who guarded his prison door. The only symptom of uneasiness, indeed, which he exhibited, showed itself in a restlessness which drove him to pace his prison backwards and forwards,—an exercise which he intermitted not for the space of a minute, from the moment of his arrest, till that of his unlooked for liberation.

In the mean while there was no little commotion among the officers of the regiment, many of whom began to feel their old prepossessions in Jackson's favour return, now that he was involved in a scrape of so serious a nature. A variety of expedients were accordingly proposed, with the view of saving the unfortunate youth from the consequences of a court martial, from which, should his case be brought before it, only one sentence could be expected; but his crime was in itself so flagrant, and to pass it by unnoticed, would prove so destructive of every thing like subordination, that they were all one after another pronounced inadmissible, even by such as leaned most strongly to the side of mercy. Besides all which, the command of the corps had lately passed into the hands of one who knew nothing of the circumstances attending Jackson's enlistment, except by common report, and who, educated in a school of strict and unbending discipline, would not so much as listen to any proposition that had a violation of that principle for its object. Jackson's fate was sealed with in an hour after the commission of his offence. Directions were given to the adjutant to warn the customary number of officers for duty on the following day; and the witnesses to the prisoner's violence, as well as to the whole course of the proceedings out of which it arose, were desired to attend. But before these orders could be either acted upon or noted down, an event befell which turned the attention of all into a new channel, and procured for the recruit at least a temporary exemption from a disgrace to which he had resolved not to submit,—at all events not to survive.

We were still seated at the mess table, and the decided steps just specified having been taken, other topics were beginning to be introduced, when an orderly dragoon was seen to ride into the yard, and direct his course towards the colonel's quarters. For some time previously, we had been made aware that our sojourn in England was not destined to be of long continuance. Through more than one indirect channel, we had heard that the order for our immediate embarkation to join Lord Wellington's army was issued; and that a few formalities only were required to be gone through, previous to the arrival of the route. Under these circumstances, the dragon no sooner made his appearance than there was a simultaneous rush towards the window, accompanied by a general confusion, that now at last the order so long expected would be received; and in these expectations fate had decreed that we should not be disappointed.

The dragoon was summoned to approach—the colonel took the packet from him: he hastily opened it, and glanced his eye over its contents with manifest satisfaction.

"Gentlemen," said he, as he again folded it up, "I congratulate both you and myself on the fulfilment of all our wishes; we are even more fortunate than the most sanguine could have anticipated; I am instructed here, that the transports destined to receive us are already assembled at Dover, and we march to-morrow morning."

A shout, loud, hearty, and lengthened, followed this announcement. The mess was immediately dissolved; the adjutant was commanded to insert no order in the book, except that which had just arrived from the horse guards; and each individual set off to complete such preparations as he deemed essential to his own profit and future comfort: Jackson and his crime were alike forgotten in the excitement which the news produced, and the calling together of the court martial was overlooked.

Nor did many minutes elapse ere the intelligence, so joyfully received in the circle of officers, made its way among the men. In an instant the parade ground was crowded with soldiers, all eagerly demanding a repetition of details, of which each was as perfectly aware as the individual to whom he applied; till the sound of voices became loud as distant thunder, or the roar of a cataract in the woods; but it was not a sound of unmixed and unmitigated joy, neither were the figures which crowded the arena, those of happy and triumphant beings alone. There were women there—some of them rough and heartless enough, God knows; but others,—young, pure and gentle,—who read in this glorious announcement, no more than the decree which doomed them to part from all that they held dear upon earth; and there were children too,—infants in their mothers' arms, boys at their fathers' knees,—these chimed in, not with the notes of gladness, but with weeping and bitter lamentation. There may be, and doubtless are, many heart-rending scenes brought forward, even in the progress of ordinary life. It is a sad spectacle to behold the widow and the orphans follow the corpse of their natural protector to the grave, and it is a sorrowful sight to be a witness to the parting embrace between a mother and her only son; but the arrival of the route which marks a regiment for active service before the enemy, is redolent of occurrences, which are exceeded, in power to stir up the pity of the spectator, only by those which attend the commencement of the march itself.

I need not, however, dwell at much length upon this. Of the facts as they generally occur, you are all as well informed by practical experience as myself; and as nothing took place on the present occasion dissimilar to what occurs on others, your own memory or imagination will form a better guide than any ornament of mine. Let it suffice, therefore, to state that it was not without great exertion on the part of the officers, that any thing like order was restored; after which, the customary routine of inspection was hastily gone through, and the lots which determined the fate of soldiers' wives, drawn. But by this time, the increasing twilight began to render objects obscure. Every one, therefore, whether joyous or sad, retired to his quarters; and the voice of triumph and lamentation were, before long, equally heard no more.

CHAPTER III.

Whilst these things were going on, the solitude of Jackson's dungeon had been broken in upon by a messenger, who came, not indeed to set him free, but to conduct him, under an escort, to his barrack-room, that he might undergo the usual examination, and be disposed of accordingly. In him, the intelligence which so deeply affected all besides, excited no visible emotion. He followed his conductor in silence; stood in silence to undergo the scrutiny of the inspector, and being commanded to put his kit in order for marching at an early hour on the morrow, he did so without giving utterance to a remark. That done, he permitted himself to be quietly led back again to the place of his confinement, where he spent the remainder of the night, as he had spent its commencement, watchful, restless, and uneasy.

It is not necessary that I should enter into any minute detail of the events which immediately followed. At an early hour on the morrow, the bugle summoned us to our stations, which were assumed amidst the commingling of joy and sorrow usual on such occasions; and the line of march being formed, the band struck up, and the regiment pushed forward. In rear of the column, a prisoner and surrounded by a guard, moved Jackson. His arms, which he was not permitted to carry, were borne upon one of the baggage wagons, and even his parade jacket and regimental cap were denied him. Yet neither the disguise of a prisoner's dress, nor the galling appendage of manacled wrists, could rob him of that bold and haughty air which he had on all occasions maintained. Even now, indeed, with every external mark of degradation about him, it was impossible to behold him without a sense of involuntary respect. Not a murmur nor complaint passed his lips. With brow erect, and eye unclouded, he stepped forward at the given signal; and he prosecuted his journey in the same silence, and apparent abstraction, which would have distinguished him had he filled his proper station in the column.

It was late in the day before we reached the point of embarkation, and no arrangements having been made for accommodating the troops in the town, some confusion occurred in hurrying them on board. In consequence of this, as well as of an intimation from the commodore, that the wind blew fair and not a moment's delay would be allowed, more than one blunder occurred in apportioning its due share of officers to each transport, nor could any attention be paid to events not immediately connected with present contingencies. A similar cause operated in hindering any order from being issued touching the disposal of the prisoner, who was conducted to the same vessel which the rest of his company occupied; and the commandant being left without authority either to try or release him, he found himself doomed to continue a prisoner till the voyage should be accomplished. From this circumstance, however, it can hardly be said that he suffered any serious inconvenience. As I was myself the senior officer on board, I took care that none of the rigours of confinement should be imposed upon him; indeed he became from the moment of weighing anchor a prisoner merely in name. On parade occasions alone he appeared with the badge of disgrace about him, because so much was due both to military discipline and to my own character; but he took his turn with the rest in working the ship, was permitted like the rest to walk the deck when he chose, and eat, and slept, and passed his time generally in the same place, and after the same fashion, with his comrades.

We had accomplished perhaps one half of our voyage, without the occurrence of any event deserving of notice, when on a certain occasion, feeling no disposition to sleep, and being oppressed with the excessive heat and confined atmosphere of the cabin, I quitted my cot as the night bells were tolling, and ascended to the quarter-deck. Nothing could exceed the exquisite beauty of the scene which met me there. The moon shone with full lustre in a sky perfectly cloudless, and tinged, with a long and wavering line of silver, the bosom of the deep. The breeze was just sufficiently powerful to keep the canvases from flapping to the mast, and to give a direction to the tiny waves, which rose and fell like the gentle heavings of a virgin's bosom; whilst the quiet rush of waters as the vessel's bow cut through them, was the only sound that broke in upon the silence of the night. The helmsman stood to his post, motionless as a statue, and the watch lay stretched upon the fore-castle in profound sleep. I alone, indeed, of "the many mews so beautiful," appeared to live and move, and have my senses about me; and even I soon became as still, as if there had been infection in the air. I sat down upon the taffrail in a state of delicious lassitude, such as the aspect of things about me was calculated to produce; and I gazed abroad over the sea, with the eye of a happy man, who is so—he scarce knows why, and he cares not wherefore.

I was thus situated, not so much lost in thought as enjoying the blessed absence of all power of thinking, when the light step of some one approaching, as if with caution, broke upon my reverie. I turned round, and beheld Jackson standing at my side. The moonlight falling strongly upon his face at the instant, I saw that his features were agitated, as if some powerful passion were at work within, or that he had struggled hard to subdue such a passion, without having fully succeeded. Startled not more by the peculiar expression of his countenance than by the abruptness of his approach, I involuntarily rose from my seat, and assuming an attitude almost of defence, confronted him. "Jackson," said I, speaking sharply, because without consideration, "what means this? Have you forgotten that you go at large only upon sufferance?—how is it that you break in thus rudely upon the privacy of your commanding officer?"

A bitter and painful smile curled the young man's lip as I uttered these sentences.

"No, sir," replied he, after a momentary pause, "I have not forgotten that I go at large only by sufferance. I have not forgotten that I am sunk to the lowest depth of degradation, so low indeed as to be at the mercy of—but no matter. I had fancied that by you, at least, I was regarded with an eye of favour. I had persuaded myself that you took some interest in the fate of a miserable outcast; and my bosom yearned towards you with a feeling which my judgment hardly approved. I did wrong in giving admission to visions so baseless, and I thank you for restoring me to my senses."

He turned round as he spoke, and was walking away, when, instantly recovering my self-possession, I entreated him to remain.

"You are not mistaken, young man," said I. "I conceived a lively interest in your fate when I first saw you, and that interest continues unabated up to the present moment. If I appeared to treat you harshly on the present occasion, be assured that the tone of my voice belied my feelings. You came upon me suddenly,—I did not dream of your being near; and I acted as most men would have done under such circumstances, by speaking without thinking."

The softened tone of my voice, not less than these few explanatory sentences, produced an instantaneous effect upon Jackson. He stopped short, and looking back towards me, I saw that his eyes swam in tears, which it required no trifling exertion on his part to suppress.

"God bless you, Sir," cried he, in a subdued tone, "I had no right, humbled as I am, to expect any thing of apology or explanation from you; but the spell is broken. When I sought your presence, it was with the firm determination of making you acquainted with every particular in my history. Under what influence I was driven to form that resolution, I cannot tell; but form it

I did; and had you met me thus at first I should have poured out my whole soul before you; but the impulse has departed, and I cannot, if I would, unburthen this bursting heart of its load. At some other moment, perhaps, the spell may return; but now I have no power to speak." He retired as he concluded this sentence; and before I could interpose, either by word or gesture, to stop him, he had descended to his berth.

I need scarcely observe that this adventure, abrupt and fleeting as it was, produced upon me an effect not less lively than any in which, for a long while back, I had taken part. It was evident enough, either that the poor youth laboured under an aberration of intellect,—a supposition to the correctness of which his allusion to the power of impulses and spells gave at least the show of plausibility; or he really was, what he professed to be, the child of a wayward destiny. In either case, he could not fail to be an object of sincere commiseration to every considerate mind; more particularly when regarded in connection with the unhappy scrape into which he had drawn himself. It was with no ordinary violence that I blamed my own want of self-possession, which caused me to check a disposition on the boy's part to speak out; nor could all the continued beauty of the night scene, though aided by my own most strenuous exertions, restore my equanimity. After pacing the quarter-deck, therefore, for some time, not without a faint hope that he might even yet return, I determined to think no more, either of the past or the future, but to leave every thing to chance. Thus reasoning, I made haste to descend to the companion; and in a mood widely different from that which possessed me when I mounted it, I retired to my cot, and succeeded, after tossing about for some time, in falling asleep.

It was but natural, excited as my curiosity, and, let me add, my sympathy had been, that I should from that time forth lay myself out for every opportunity of again conversing with Jackson. With this view, I repeatedly kept the deck, at hours both of the night and day, when my companions had deserted it; and more than once threw myself in the young man's way so as that he could not possibly mistake my meaning. Day after day, however, stole on, and he persisted in the silence which he had hitherto maintained. It seemed, indeed, that he was really the puppet of an influence over which he possessed no control whatever—or rather, that his actions sprang not, like those of other men, from volition, but from fatality; for though he had held out a sort of promise that the time of disclosure might yet come, the fulfilment of that promise appeared not to depend upon his own choice. Not that he resumed the air of cold civility, with which he had formerly treated me not less than others; on the contrary, his salutes were now given with kindness; and more than once he lingered behind me, as if struggling with an inclination which he could not overcome; but the subject on which, above all others, I was most anxious to be instructed, he sedulously avoided, never failing to walk away as often as I referred to it. This line of conduct on his part, though it had no effect in doing away with the sympathy which had been so strongly excited in his favour, taught me to adopt a less unequivocal manner of showing it. I gradually ceased to court his presence, and returned to the habits and mode of acting which I had previously pursued.

To this system I pertinaciously adhered, no change being wrought in consequence of it in the conduct or manner of the recruit, till the joyful cry of "Land on the lee bow!" gave notice that our voyage was drawing fast to its conclusion. The land in question proved to be Cape Orange, the bold and precipitous ridge of which rises like a pillar out of the waters, and is seen for some time before any of the coast adjacent becomes visible. But, the breeze still favouring us, as it had done for the last three days, other and no less attractive objects were speedily discerned, and our voyage henceforth lay along a sea coast fertile, as the most ardent admirer of the picturesque need desire, in interesting prospects. Headland, promontory, and bay, opened and shut upon us as we swept past. In the back ground were seen rough and barren mountains, intersected here and there with lovely green valleys, through which streams of limpid water made their way; whilst convent, hamlet, or solitary shieling, rising from the midst of a grove of myrtle or gum cistus, or occupying some spot more clear and level than the rest, served to remind us that the country, though apparently in no very high state of cultivation, was not deserted. In this manner we continued to coast along, till the Tagus itself lay before us; nor did we drop anchor till a late hour on the 15th of July, about half a mile from the fortress of Belém.

The signal having been made, almost as soon as we entered the river, to prepare for immediate disembarkation, ample opportunity was afforded of arranging our baggage, and we lay down that night in readiness to step on shore as soon as the morning gun should be fired; yet you will easily believe me when I say, that few if any amongst us slept soundly. Though our passage had been made in as short a space of time as is usually required for such voyages, we had nevertheless been long enough at sea to make us heartily tired of the sameness of a sailor's life; and to give to the most ordinary sights and sounds connected with dry land, a character which, seen under other circumstances, they could scarcely have acquired. For my own part, I listened to the hum of voices and the distant rolling of carriages, with a degree of delight such as I had rarely experienced before; whilst the tolling of bells borne off upon the breeze, sounded in my ears like exquisite music. Then there were the thousand lights which mark the proximity of a great city—lights which in Lisbon rise one above the other in tiers, till the loftiest seem to mingle with the stars in the firmament:—upon these I felt as if I should not grow weary of gazing till the return of daylight had extinguished them. Besides, imagination took wing, and carried me forward into scenes, of the nature of which I as yet knew nothing from practical experience. Now, then, my military career was begun. Now at length was I about to set foot upon the land of promise to every British soldier,—the scene where, if laurels were to be gathered at all, they could not fail to be found; and the ideas which rose out of that recollection were at once too vivid, and too complicated, to permit a thought of sleep, during many hours, to obtrude itself. At last, however, nature began to raise her voice against a farther indulgence in such speculations. All the whispers of romance failed in keeping drowsiness at bay; and I made ready, about one o'clock in the morning, to follow the example of my comrades, by descending to the cabin.

I had quitted my favourite station on the poop, and was proceeding towards the companion, when there suddenly stood before me the figure of a man whom, in spite of the almost pitchy darkness, (for the moon had not yet risen) I had no difficulty in recognising as Jackson. His air was that of a person labouring under excessive agitation, and he held a packet in his hand, which he presented to me in a hurried and abrupt manner. "We land to-morrow," said he, speaking in a deep and stifled tone: "and the opportunity which I have sought, God knows how eagerly, will not now be granted. But though I have no power to speak, my mind has been free, and I have written the chief details of my unfortunate story; take it—read it, when a convenient opportunity offers; but remember, as you value your own peace, communicate its contents to no one. Whatever my fate may be, keep the secret inviolable;—betray it, were it even to save my life, and the same destiny which has governed me, will rule over you." He thrust the packet into my hand as he spoke, and before I could so far command myself as to answer him, he had disappeared. I was now quite convinced that the poor youth's mind was unlinged. I put his manuscript into my pocket, hardly caring whether the opportunity to which he alluded, would ever arrive or not; and pursuing my original intention, descended the ladder, and went to bed.

CHAPTER IV.

The first grey of the morning of the 16th of July, 1810, was just beginning to appear, when the report of an eighteen pounder fired from the flag ship in the Tagus, gave notice that the hour of disembarkation had arrived. It was immediately followed by a rolling of drums, and braying of bugles, taken up from transport to transport throughout the fleet; and in five minutes after, the deck of every vessel was crowded with soldiers, armed, clothed and equipped for immediate service. Nor did any great while elapse, ere a numerous flotilla of boats began to assemble alongside. Into these company after company entered, with as much regard to order as the circumstances of the case would permit; and long before the sun had attained any height in the heavens, the regiment was formed in column of companies along the beach.

It was but natural to suppose that at least a day or two would be granted previous to the commencement of our march up the country, for the double purpose of refreshing the men, enticed by a fortnight's confinement, and enabling the officers to provide mules and other animals for the transport of their baggage.

This was, indeed, the more confidently anticipated, because Lord Wellington's well known policy induced him to spare his young troops, by keeping them as much as possible in the rear, till they became in some degree inured to the climate; but the particular state of affairs at the present juncture was such as to set all ordinary rules at defiance, and to render the bringing up of every disposable man to the scene of action, imperative. I need scarcely remind you, that Massena was now hanging upon the frontier with an army of 70,000 men; that Ciudad Rodrigo was in a state of close siege; and that the British general, with little more than 25,000 British, and about as many half-disciplined Portuguese, could bring no relief to the garrison, being hardly competent to maintain his defensive position upon the Coa. Under these circumstances, the arrival of a fresh battalion was to him a matter of the first moment; and hence every corps which landed was hurried forward into the interior, as rapidly as the strength of the men, and the movements of pressed bullocks, would allow.

Like other regiments which had lately arrived, we were met upon the beach by a peremptory order to pass at once through the capital into the interior, intimation being at the same time conveyed, that such accommodation as the country could afford, and we were likely to need, had already been provided. In consequence of this communication, our heavy baggage, which, as a matter of course, had been brought on shore, was again sent back to the ships, whilst, a few mules being furnished from the commissariat depot at Belém, such lighter articles as could not be dispensed with were packed upon them, not without some confusion and various disappointments to individuals. This done, the word was given to march, and we pushed forward, if not perfectly satisfied still, upon the whole, in the highest possible order. But the consequence of so much haste was, that of Lisbon I was permitted to see no more than a few of the wretched streets which lead from Belém to the great northern road; that at Seavem we made no greater pause than was absolutely necessary to collect stragglers; and that, passing at the same rate through Bueelos, we arrived in the evening, jaded and hungry, at a town called Alenquer. Here the night was spent in no very comfortable plight; for the lodging was miserable, and the authorities being not over and above disposed to exert themselves in our favour, our rations proved any thing but sufficient; nevertheless, on the morrow the march was resumed with the same rapidity as at first, and for an entire week we were en route. Thus, by dint of extraordinary exertions, we contrived to come up with the division to which we were attached, about noon on the 22d,—having accomplished a march of upwards of one hundred and fifty miles in something less than seven entire days.

We found the division occupying a line considerably in advance of the main army, with its left resting upon Alentejo, its right upon a bend in the Coa, and covered in its rear by the channel of the same river. The outposts, however, extended as far as certain scattered hamlets, half way between Almeida and Villanueva; and the state of preparation in which both men and horses were kept, indicated that an attack was hourly expected. As we arrived not in the best order imaginable, the men being foot-sore to the last degree, and the officers sadly distressed for want of baggage, the general, with the consideration for which he was remarkable throughout the army, appointed us to a station better sheltered than that occupied by any other battalion under his command. We took possession of a few cottages not far from a bridge which connected the opposite banks of the river with one another, where we were given to understand, that for some days at least no service on outpost, nor any other harassing duty, would be required at our hands.

In the mean time Jackson, so far from deriving any advantage from the debarkation, had only returned, in consequence of it, to the condition of a close prisoner. Though his case had been brought before the commanding officer at the earliest opportunity, such had been the rapidity of our movements, and so excessive the fatigue attendant upon them, that no leisure for investigating it had yet offered, and he followed the column in charge of the rear guard, at once ignorant of his ultimate destiny, and, to all appearance at least, indifferent respecting it. Several fresh attempts were indeed made to obtain for him a free pardon, partly in consequence of the extreme provocation which had led to the commission of his crime, and partly because of the length of time which had seen him in confinement. But our commanding officer, as I have already stated, was one of those who cannot dissmite the ideas of manly clemency and blameable imbecility. A rigid disciplinarian, he would allow no circumstances to stand as an excuse for a breach of the great and fundamental law of subordination; and though punishment might be deferred, it never failed, sooner or later, to overtake the individual who, being under his command and in his power, set that law at defiance. Poor Jackson was doomed to become one in addition to many who received this stern justice at his hands. The remainder of the 22d being granted to rest after our own and our men's comforts, a regimental court-martial was ordered to assemble on the morrow; and, as bad luck would have it, (for, under all circumstances, I could not but consider the coincidence as unfortunate,) of the court in question I was nominated president.

At the appointed hour of noon, the court, consisting of four young subalterns, with myself, not at that time a very old man, assembled. We met together in a ruinous shed, one portion of which was set apart as a place of confinement to the disorderly; and the prisoner being summoned, as well as the witnesses against him, the customary oaths were taken, and the process began. There is no denying that a clearer case of mutiny was never brought before the cognizance of a military tribunal. A blow was inflicted by a private sentry upon his officer,—to that fact twenty persons were prepared to swear; and though the previous provocations were admitted to have been both numerous and galling, these could not for a moment be received as more than a slight extenuation of so serious a crime. Even the prisoner himself attempted no denial, nor offered any excuse for his conduct. When called upon to make his defence, he answered only with a brief declaration that his case needed no apology, for that he had acted upon an impulse which would have driven any other person so situated to a similar course. This was said in a tone of voice as calm and firm as if he had been speaking of matters, the issue of which could not affect him very deeply; and it was all that, by repeated questions, I succeeded in wringing from him. The court having listened to him patiently, and I must confess, not without a considerable share of commiseration, commanded him to withdraw; when, each member being separately required to give judgment, all, one after another, pronounced him—guilty. Finally, the severest sentence which it was in the power of a regimental court-martial to award, was awarded against him; and he was condemned to receive, at such time and place as the commanding officer should appoint, a punishment of three hundred lashes on his bare back.

Greatly as I felt shocked when this tremendous sentence was pronounced, it was impossible for me, upon any grounds of injustice or cruelty, to lift up my voice against it. My brother officers would have flinched in their duty, had they permitted any consideration foreign from the circumstances of the case, as it appeared in evidence before them, to warp their judgment, or direct their finding; and I, as president, should have been equally wanting in mine, had I interfered with the exercise of their legitimate powers, or influenced their decision. Yet it was not without a pang of deep and heartfelt sorrow that I listened to their verdict, and proceeded, as was my office required, to record it. Record it, however, I did, without betraying more of outward concern than was exhibited by the rest; and then they remained but one measure to pursue, which they all heartily united in adopting. A recommendation to mercy, expressed in the most forcible terms, was appended to the sentence of condemnation; and something like a hope was excited, that it might prove not wholly useless.

Armed with this important document, and carefully studying, as I went along, every argument which I thought at all likely to affect his mind, I hurried off to the colonel's quarters, whom I found engaged, apparently in earnest conversation, with Captain Fletcher. This was an omen so unfavourable, that in spite of my best exertions to prevent it, I found much of the confidence which had animated me by the way, evaporate; yet I determined so show myself not less the strenuous advocate of a youth who appeared to possess no friend in the regiment except myself. My business was no sooner made known, than Captain Fletcher rose to withdraw. God knows,—perhaps I do them wrong,—but I fancied then, and I fancy now, that he threw a significant look over his shoulder, just as he was quitting the apartment, and that it was answered by a look not less significant from the colonel; and the ideas to which the suspicion gave rise, were not very favourable to freedom of speech. Nevertheless, I performed my task; if not as eloquently as I intended, at all events forcibly and strenuously, though, as it very soon appeared, to little purpose.

"You have a perfect right," Captain Chakot, said the colonel, "to lay before me both the sentence and the recommendation of the court; nor do I blame you for using your best eloquence in the prisoner's favour. But it remains for me to decide, how far clemency can be here judiciously exercised; and you may rest satisfied that, in coming to that decision, I shall be guided entirely by my own sense of propriety."

He bowed as he uttered these words; and taking the hint as it was intended to be taken, I withdrew, leaving behind me every ray of hope that poor Jackson would escape degradation. I was not deceived in this painful foreboding: in an hour or two after, the sergeant of the day brought the orderly book, as usual, to my quarters; I hastily opened it, and the first announcement which met my eye, was this: "The regiment will parade to-morrow morning at seven o'clock, in heavy marching order, to witness the sentence of a regimental court-martial carried into execution."

I shut the book in indescribable disgust, and feeling incapable of supporting any society, even that of my brother officers, I walked into the open air, without knowing or caring where chance might lead me.

I wandered on for some time, in a state of high and painful excitement, cursing sometimes the extreme severity of my commander's temper, sometimes the bad-heartedness of Fletcher, and not less often the rashness of the young recruit, till I reached, without being aware of it, the edge of the precipitous cliff which on the northern side overhangs the Coa. Arrested thus suddenly in my course, I could not fail to look around; and the scene which opened upon me was sufficient to dispel, at least for the moment, every feeling besides that of intense and speechless admiration. Immediately beneath me ran the river—a brawling and noisy mountain stream; forcing its way through a narrow valley, which was closely hemmed in on either hand by rocks of gigantic dimensions. Over the faces of these were scattered detached clumps of dwarf oak and mountain ash, which, pushing themselves forward from every fissure, gave to the entire valley the appearance of an old forest thinned by time, or perhaps by human industry, but still retaining a considerable share of its pristine character. Around me, again, was an amphitheatre of woody hills, the wood broken in upon here and there by some beetling crag which reared its bald front high above the surrounding foliage; whilst of the residence of man, or proofs of his recent labour and handiwork, not a trace, from the spot which I then occupied, could be discovered. To complete the wild magnificence of the spectacle, the last rays of a setting sun were streaming over a bird ridge, which girdles in the well-known Guinda pass; and the whole wilderness was glowing in the full yellow blaze, which in this climate generally precedes the brief twilight. The effect of all this, bursting upon me, as it did, without any previous warning, was one which up to the present time I have not forgotten. In an instant, every source of care and annoyance ceased to operate; and I stood gazing about, in the full enjoyment of feelings which such a scene, and such a scene alone, is capable of exciting.

It was now almost for the first time since he put it into my hand, that the recollection of Jackson's pocket occurred to me. Blaming myself, I hardly knew why, for my inattention, I thrust my hand into my pocket, and there, sure enough, it was, just as I received it on board of ship. There could not be a more convenient opportunity, nor a place more fitting, for the perusal of a narrative, concerning the nature of which I had already pretty well made up my mind; so, sitting down under an ash, I broke the seal, and began it. As I have faithfully preserved it, and have it still about me, I think it better to read the whole than make any attempt to detail its substance; for though the latter might serve very well the purpose of my present narrative, it could not convey to you any idea of the character or disposition of the writer.

JACKSON'S NARRATIVE.

"By what secret and irresistible influence I am impelled to make a confidant of you, I know not. It is true, that, from the moment when we first met, you have appeared to feel an interest in my favour; nor have I forgotten the kind and generous manner in which you warned me of the consequences of the rash step which I was about to take; neither has your marked delicacy of conduct, since I came as a prisoner immediately under your command escaped my observation. But these things furnish no rational reason why I should disclose my shame to you; they would rather lead me, were I master of my own actions, to conceal it. I am not, however, master of my own actions. There is a curse upon me—a terrible and deadly curse, which operates at all moments of my sleeping and waking existence,—which has reduced me to what I am—a common soldier,—which has driven me to the commission of a crime, bringing a debasing punishment in its train,—which compels me, in spite of strenuous exertions to the contrary, to stand forward as a witness against myself, and which will never cease to work upon my heart, and to shape out the tenor of my movements, till that heart cease to beat, and these limbs be incapable of motion.

"I am the son, the only son, nay the only child, of a gentleman of proud lineage and considerable fortune, in the north of England. His name it would little interest you to be told, and deemed as I am to be the publisher of my own disgrace, I will not bring disgrace upon others by repeating it. Let it suffice to mention, that the estate to which I was once heir, came into the family at the Conquest, and that it has descended in lineal succession, from father to son, from its first possessor, to him—who does not now hold it.

"Of the manner in which my early years were spent, I entertain but a vague and indistinct recollection. I remember something, indeed, of a lovely and amiable woman, to whom I was taught by those about me to look as my mother. I remember, or rather I fancy that I remember, how she used to take me on her knee, and cover my cheek with kisses, whilst tears rolled down her own; and either memory, or the report of others, when heard, or where repeated, I know not,—presents me with an occasional picture of the same beautiful woman, pining like one broken-hearted, and fading in her youth. Observe, that I do not assert these things as facts; they may be mere illusions of my own disordered fancy; in all probability they are so; yet to me they are at this moment as clear and palpable as the scene of my own arrest on a recent occasion, or the late conference on the quarter deck. Whether they be realities or dreams, is, however, a matter of no moment. My mother died long before I had attained sufficient age to value her good qualities, or to miss her attentions; and I was left, when little more than an infant, to the care of my father.

"I know not how to trust myself in drawing a picture of the only parent whom I have ever known. That he was kind in his manner towards me, I cannot venture to say; at least his kindness was not so displayed as to win upon the attachment of a boy naturally warm-hearted, or to make me forget that I had sometimes seen my mother weep, when he and she and I were alone together. It is true that few days passed, few at least during which he was disengaged, without my seeing him. Occasionally, too, he would bring me a toy; and when I was old enough to ride he gave me a pony, on which I was permitted to scamper wherever I chose, provided only I returned home before dark. Yet was his manner uniformly cold and austere; I cannot recall to my recollection so much as one kiss from his lips; and as to a God bless you!—the expression never escaped him. No, no, no! it was not in blessing that he took the name of God in his mouth;—it was for a far more tremendous and more certain purpose.

"At an age as early as is usual in like cases, I was sent to a preparatory school, from whence I was in due time removed to Eton. Here, in the society of lads of my own standing, several happy years were spent, so happy indeed, that the impression which they have left upon my mind, can be erased only by death. Strange to say, however, the vacations, which brought to others so many anticipations of delight, were always hailed by me with sorrow. I had no home; that is to say, no home which I loved; for though I delighted in field sports, and the means of gratifying that propensity were abundantly within my reach, there was something in the air of—, which invariably chilled me when I drew near it. The truth is, that I did not and could not love my father. I feared him; he was a man to be feared—cold, austere, formal; proud of his family, equally proud of his own attainments; of a temper not irritable, in the ordinary acceptance of that term, yet easily offended, and ignorant how to forgive; such a man even his own son could not love, however much he might reverence, or rather dread him. Besides, my father was one of those whom no arguments, no entreaties, no motives, even of self-interest, could divert from the course which he had once made up his mind to pursue. Let him set his heart upon any object, and the whole world, were it offered in exchange, could not purchase his relinquishment of that object; difficulties, should such occur, only served to goad him to further exertions. Nor was it in essentials only that this unbending temperament displayed itself; it reached even to the most minute details of domestic life: it operated even in his distribution of his own time, and had full influence over his proceedings, which dared not take a direction in the slightest degree at variance from the channel which he had marked out for them. Between my father and myself there was not so much as the pretence of confidence. He never consulted me in any thing, whether relating to myself or others; he never spoke to me of family matters, ancient or modern; and he gave me no encouragement to communicate my feelings to him with the freedom which a son should always experience in the presence of his father. On the contrary, the little intercourse that passed between us was, uniformly distant and chilling,—like that which is sometimes kept up by a guardian towards his ward, provided no ties of blood bind them one to another, but bearing no semblance whatever to that free communion of soul, mind, and feeling, which, if it exist anywhere, might be expected to exist between a parent and a child.

"In the society of such a man, it was impossible that I could find any enjoyment, and to his society I was, when at home, almost exclusively confined; for the peculiarities of my father's temper were such, that few of his neighbours kept up with him more than a distant or formal acquaintance. Once or twice a year a stately dinner was prepared, at which some half dozen country gentlemen would make their appearance; and these meetings always passed off heavily at the time, and they led to no familiar intercourse afterwards. Indeed, my father was manifestly never loved nor courted by any one. His very servants and tenants avoided him as often as they could; and when that was impossible, they stood before him in undisguised alarm. Whence all this arose I am unable even to conjecture, for of his early history I never heard a syllable; and unless something more extraordinary occurred in his youth than took place since my memory serves, there was certainly no adequate reason for it.

"I had removed from Eton, after going through the regular course, and had kept a few terms at Cambridge, when that event befell upon which the whole of my future fortunes were doomed to turn.

"It was on a beautiful evening in June, that with feelings widely different from those which I have wished to experience, I found myself approaching the place of my nativity. There were no pleasing recollections associated with that lonely and desolate mansion. Its great empty halls and half-furnished apartments, through which the voice of mirth and revelry never echoed, its long passages and dreary corridors, where the sound of a footstep would have startled had it reached the ear, rose with no very agreeable colours before my view; and when I considered that amid this solitude the whole of a tedious summer must be passed, I could not avoid shuddering at the prospect. I was in this mood, when a sudden stopping of the horses induced me to sit forward in the chaise for the purpose of ascertaining the cause. There was no possibility of mistaking the principal objects about me. I recognised at once the beech grove that skirted the park, and the commencement of the long avenue which led up to the mansion; but in minute details a change had occurred, which set all my surmises and calculations at defiance. The lodge, which, when I last entered it, was more than half unroofed and in ruins, presented now the appearance of a neat and comfortable cottage; it was newly thatched, glazed, and whitewashed, and a spot of ground tastefully laid out in cultivation lay behind it. In like manner the pillars and gates had undergone a thorough repair; the palings seemed to have been lately renewed; and the very grass and weeds which used to overgrow the drive, had all disappeared. Instead of the slatternly dame, likewise, by whom I was accustomed to be met here, a pretty country girl, about ten or twelve years old, threw open the gate, and dropped a curtsy as the chaise rolled through, with the grace of one accustomed to the office. I need scarcely say that all this excited in me no little amazement; but if I experienced surprise at the aspect of things in themselves so unimportant, my astonishment increased tenfold, when other and still greater changes appeared.

"As I approached the house, I became at every step more and more aware, that a complete revolution had taken place in my father's style of living. The lawn, of which my most remote recollection presented no other picture than of a rough and neglected plot of grass, was now mowed with the utmost care, and tastefully adorned at different points with clumps of flowering shrubs and ornamental evergreens. A light wire fence protected it from the approach of the sheep, which in former days were accustomed to browse up to the very windows; and a wicket composed of the same materials admitted us to a well cleaned gravel walk, which extended in front of the main entrance. Then, again, on looking up towards the house itself, I beheld that the shutters of every window were open, that the frames had been lately painted, and the glass universally repaired, and that an air of comfort was cast over the entire exterior, such as I had never seen it wear until now. By this time the carriage had stopped, and the postilion having rung the bell, the hall door was opened by a servant in a neat morning livery; who, though manifestly unacquainted with my name and circumstances, civilly requested me to walk in. I followed the lacquey, not like one entering his father's house, but like a stranger in a place unknown to him; and truly the aspect of every thing had undergone a revolution so complete, that I almost doubted whether the case were not really so.

"I was conducted through the entrance hall, in the furnishing and decoration of which I found it difficult to trace out any resemblance to the cheerless and uncomfortable vestibule, so familiar to my early years. Every thing was changed: handsome mahogany chairs, marked with the family arms, had taken the place of the antique oaken benches which formerly stood here; a mosaic pavement had supplanted the slabs; marble tables stood here and there; and a stove of the newest construction held out a promise of warmth and comfort in the winter. Then, again, there were elegant folding doors, which cut off the outer from the inner hall,—a distinction which till of late had not been recognised;—and if the garnishing of the outer compartment sufficed to excite my amazement, much more forcibly was that feeling roused by what I beheld in the inner. Rich carpets covered the floor: gilded lamps hung from the ceiling; and the great oaken staircase leading up to the lodging rooms, which began here, had received a polish, bright as the art of man could bestow upon it. But greater wonders than even these awaited me.

"We had by this time reached the door of the drawing-room, when the servant, as a preparatory step to throwing it open, demanded my name. I was so confounded that I could not contrive to stammer it out so as to be understood; and the man, mistaking my words, ushered me in under some appellation, the sound of which I have forgotten. I walked forward; but my surprise amounted to positive stupefaction, when there arose to meet me—not my father, but a lady, beautiful as an angel, young, elegant, graceful in every motion, with eyes that did not look, but speak—ay, sir, speak words—plain intelligible words—dark, large, brilliant, surrounded with long lashes, which softened, whilst they took not away from, the variable expression of the orbs beneath them. But I must command myself—so let that pass.

"In what manner I received the salutation of the stranger, I cannot tell; only I remember, that when I made an effort to speak, my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and I stood like one rooted to the spot by some sudden spell, or frozen into stone. The lady seemed surprised at my emotion, I even fancied that she became alarmed, for she uttered something in a hurried tone, the purport of which I could not comprehend, and made a movement as if to retire; but before she could carry that resolution into effect, a door which communicated between the saloon and the library was thrown open, and my father entered. The sight of him recalled me instantly to my senses. I advanced to receive the hand which he held out; and in the next instant, the whole mystery around me was explained.

"You are welcome home again, Charles," said my father, with more than usual kindness in his tone: "I dare say the aspect which things have assumed since you were last here, has caused you no little astonishment; yet I am willing to hope, that astonishment is not the only feeling likely to be roused. Charlotte, my dear, continued he, turning to the lady, 'permit me to introduce to you my son, whom you will find, I trust, an agreeable companion at moments when I may be unable to enjoy your society. Charles, in this lady you see one who is entitled, by every tie of moral obligation, to your respect and affection. She has consented to make you the happiest of men; and she now stands towards you in the relation of a mother.'

"A mother?" cried I, staggering back, as if struck by some sudden and deadly blow: "A mother! Is this lady, then, your wife?"

"Yes, sir," replied my father, in his old tone of as-perity; "this lady is my wife. Is there any thing so very remarkable in that circumstance, as that you should not be able to comprehend it?"

"No, sir, no—not exactly so," said I, scarcely knowing what I said: "but the intelligence has come upon me so suddenly—I knew not that any such step was in contemplation—that, in short, I know not what to say, except that your announcement has perfectly amazed me."

"I see no reason why it should produce that effect," replied he: "there is nothing so very startling in the fact, that a man who has spent twenty years in solitude should become weary of living alone, or that he should ally himself with one every way worthy of his esteem and affections."

"This was spoken coolly and deliberately, with an emphasis of which I could not mistake the purport; yet I answered it by observing, that I had received no intimation of the intended change; and that his silence on such a subject surprised me more, than the life of conduct which he had seen fit to pursue.

"I was not aware," replied he in a sarcastic tone, into which he knew well how to throw the very glint of bitterness, "that I had ever given you cause to regard yourself as the arbiter of my destinies. I have not been in the habit of soliciting your advice on indifferent matters, and should scarcely think of desiring it on an occasion like the present. But enough of such discussion—I have told you how this lady and yourself are connected; it remains for you to behave towards her as that connection demands."

"I had by this time recovered in some degree from my agitation, and turned towards my mother-in-law, with the intention of offering an apology for the strangeness of my behaviour. She trembled violently,—whether from fear, or mere embarrassment, it was, of course, impossible for me to tell; whilst her respiration appeared to go on with difficulty, and her colour went and came like clouds over the face of the moon on a stormy night. By degrees, however, the awkwardness of manner inseparable from so extraordinary an introduction, departed. She recovered the calm and placid air which distinguished her when she rose to bid me welcome; and the ease which marked her gestures, as well as the readiness with which we entered into conversation, soon produced the happiest effect upon me. In five minutes every thing awkward in our first meeting was forgotten, and we behaved towards each other, as persons in our situation might be expected to behave.

"It was now that I found leisure to cast my eyes round upon the apartment in which we were sitting; and there, as well as elsewhere, I saw that a perfect revolution had occurred. The ancient cane-backed chairs and sofas had been displaced to make room for couches covered with the costliest silks; rose wood tables, richly carved, were scattered here and there in elegant confusion; splendid pier glasses filled up the recesses, and curtains of the finest stuffs ornamented the windows; whilst even the paper upon the walls, as well as the painting on the roof and panels, had all been renewed in the most expensive and brilliant manner. Nor was it in the saloon alone that the hand of improvement had been at work. There was not an apartment in the house, from the servants' hall to the nursery, which had not undergone some change; whilst all that were in any degree conspicuous, as well in the sleeping as in the living compartment, had been entirely refurnished. I cannot pretend to describe the effect which this change produced upon me. That it was for the better, I felt, and acknowledged; yet, with the perverseness of human nature, there were moments when the absence of this or that long remembered piece of lumber stirred up in me a sensation, of which I did not imagine that a cause so trifling could have been productive. In like manner, it was with no ordinary pain that I observed, that, of the faces of the domestics who went and came about us, none were familiar. The old servants, like the old furniture, had all been dismissed, to make way for others more sightly, perhaps, and more subservient, but whether superior in the essentials of honesty and fidelity, might well be doubted. These things cut deeply. For the first day or two, indeed, the effect of them was such as to render me but little desirous to court the society either of my father or his bride; nor was it till I had been nearly a week at home, that the former thought fit to make me in any degree acquainted with the origin and progress of his new connection.

"There was little in the story to interest me in the moment; there is still less that deserves record now. Charlotte Howard was an orphan, the penniless niece of one of our neighbours, on whose bounty she absolutely depended. Having lately returned from school, she attracted my father's notice, during a visit which he happened to pay to her uncle; and as he found her not more beautiful than amiable and accomplished, he made a tender of his hand. Charlotte was barely eighteen, my father forty-nine; but, to counterbalance this difference in their ages, she was portionless, whilst he was understood to be immensely rich. My father did not state how much he owed to the lady's personal predilection, how much to the persuasions of her guardian; on that head, he wisely left me to judge for myself; but the result was, that about six weeks previous to the commencement of the long vacation, he led her, a weeping and bashful bride, to the altar. Yes; he used the word bashful, as if her reluctance were merely feigned,—as if she, a girl, artless, innocent, gay, lovely, felt no more than the ordinary coyness of a maiden so situated, in giving her hand to one—But no matter. He admitted that she went to one—say how she went—he did not even allude to the hot scalding tears of utter misery, whose fountain lies in the innermost soul, and which run over only when hope is blighted for ever. No no; I was encouraged to conjure up an image of modest dew drops—of one or two tears cheated from the eye, more through the power of momentary excitement than by the influence of sorrow. How different was all this from the truth!

"Well, the bride was carried off to the metropolis, where, amidst the gaiety of a London life, her first lessons in the duties of the married state were learned. In the mean while all those changes in and about the park, which had so powerfully affected me, were wrought; and only one fortnight previous to my return, the happy pair took possession of their renovated mansion. Such is the substance of a conversation which I held with my father, on a certain day after dinner, to which I listened as to something neither very agreeable nor very interesting. How deeply did I deceive myself, in regarding it as devoid of interest.

"I know not whence it arose, but I experienced towards my mother-in-law, about this time, a feeling which I could not describe, but which tempted me as much as possible to shun her company, particularly when no other persons chanced to be by. Not that I ever thought of her with aversion. To look upon that countenance, to behold the varied and glowing expression of those eyes, yet entertain towards the being whose eyes met mine, any thing in the most remote degree akin to aversion, was impossible. On the contrary, I never beheld her without admiration, the deepest, the most intense. I never listened to the music of her voice, without a delight such as no other sound in nature could produce. I never thought of her when absent, without a degree of interest painful indeed, but painful only from its excess. Yet I avoided her, as if there had been a pestilence in her breath, and a pollution in her touch. It was not often that I endeavoured to account for this; but when I did, langue arose, humiliating and distressing, of the sort of tie which had brought us acquainted, and held us together. I could not bear to think of her as my father's wife—as one whom I was bound to approach with deference, and look upon with respect; yet I felt that to regard her only as the beautiful and innocent girl, and to treat her like a sister or a friend, would at once displease the man to whom I was indebted for my being, and infringe, seriously and improperly, upon the usages of society. Many days therefore elapsed, ere we could be said to know more of each other's tastes and habits than was disclosed at the moment of our first introduction:—well would it have been for both, had this just and cautious reserve been persevered in.

"With his state of celibacy, my father had, it appeared, put off that morose and haughty humour which kept him at a distance from all his neighbours. Repeatedly since their return from London, had the new married couple thrown open their doors to gay parties, and the old walls had more than once rung again to the tones of singing and minstrelsy. So excellent a custom was not to be interrupted by the arrival of the heir of the lordship; on the contrary, I was given to understand that, in honour of my visit, the entire neighbourhood had been invited to an entertainment, which was to exceed in splendour and elegance every thing of the kind which had for many years taken place in this part of the country. With what absolute indifference I listened to the announcement! What were gaiety or splendour to me? I had become all at once the most humiliated and self-condemned of human beings. All the glories of an Eastern palace, had they been spread out before me, would have failed to excite any pleasurable emotion. Nay, I pined for the gloom which was now dispelled for ever, and looked back with regret upon the very state of existence which was once the source of my most serious repining. What fickle creatures are we, even at the best! how little may our very tastes and desires be calculated upon!

"The day of gala came in its course, and brought with it a crowd of guests of all ages, of both sexes, and of every rank—from the proud wearer of the earl's coronet, down to the simple commoner. Nothing could exceed the hospitable urbanity of my father; and the gentle attentions of his bride to all within her reach, were beyond measure gratifying. Then, again, as to the banquet—no luxury which earth, air, or water could produce, was wanted. The choicest wines were passed round with exuberant liberality; a crowd of servants in rich liveries prevented every wish; and the glare of golden lamps was reflected back by a profusion of massive plate, under which the table and sideboards groaned. Next followed the dance, the conversation, the promenade, relieved and interrupted from time to time by bursts of the most exquisite music, till every sense seemed deadened by the multiplied sources of enjoyment, with which it was not so much supplied as satiated. And how was I affected by all this? I looked on with the vacant stare of a spectator at a show which he understands to be delusive and unreal. I appeared, indeed, to mingle, like the rest, in every amusement; I even gazed round upon the faces of my father's guests, seeking for one on which my eye might repose so much as for a moment. But I found none. Many fair countenances there were,—laughing, lively, happy countenances,—such as meet us in our dreams, when these are most pleasing, and leave a trace behind them when we awake. But before my eye that night they passed like shadows. There was but one countenance on which I could endure to gaze—and that one was—my mother. Heaven! what a profanation of the term. Charlotte Howard, the dark eyed lively girl of eighteen, my mother!—she, who was by two full years my junior,—who smiled upon me, not with the haughty glance of a superior, but with the mild beseeching look of one who saw my agitation, and would have calmed it had she possessed the power,—who seemed to court, not to demand my notice, as if she needed support from me, and would have taken it as a boon!—Could I think of her as my mother? No; I never beheld her in that light; I could not think of her in that fashion. I was cold and distant towards her, it is true—cold in my manner, distant in my address; but neither my coldness nor distance proceeded from that jealous aversion with which, as my step-mother, I might have been supposed to regard her. I shrank from her, because I already felt that I dared not trust myself near her,—yet my eyes followed her every movement, as if there were a spell upon them, which not all my efforts would suffice to break.

"At last she sat down to her harp. Though I had been upwards of a fortnight under the same roof with her, I had never yet heard her sing or play; for my father entertained no taste for music, and I did not presume to solicit that she would perform for my gratification. I was sitting at the moment alone in a distant corner of the saloon, pretending fatigue, which in reality I did not experience, that I might escape for a few minutes from the toil of making myself agreeable, or supporting a conversation in which I took no interest. Of all the objects in the passing pageant, I beheld but her alone; and when there was a call of silence, I held my very breath, lest its sound should interrupt it. How gracefully she stretched her fair round arm over the instrument!—with what taste she swept the chords as a prelude to her song! and then striking a few bold notes by way of symphony, she raised her eyes as if to ask for inspiration from on high. In an instant, her countenance was lighted up, and there burst from her a gush of sweet sounds, so mellow, so true, so plaintive, yet so powerful, that the most insensible could not listen without visible emotion. For me, I was entranced. All power of motion was taken away from me; I tried to draw near to her, but could not—I was spell-bound, as if by the voice of an angel.

"There was no instantaneous burst of applause when that sweet wild song ended. The effect produced by it was beyond the compass of words; it was felt, but could not be expressed. Men listened, as they are accustomed to do for the echo that follows notes which come to them over water, and they seemed disappointed when no echo was heard; but if an irresistible impulse checked them at first, a universal murmur of delight gave evidence, as soon as the charm had dissolved, that their silence arose from intensity of admiration, and that there is no tribute so pure, or so real, as that which cannot be expressed. Charlotte appeared distressed by the very plaudits which were intended to give her pleasure. She rose, blushing deeply, from her instrument, and made as if she intended to cross the saloon to a spot where a group of gay loungers were congregated together. At that instant her eye caught mine; what the expression of my gaze might be, I knew not; doubtless it was the same which had accompanied every glance that I cast upon her that night; but it produced a vivid, and as I could not but observe, a painful effect upon her. Her colour fled, and she grew pale as death; then again the blood rushed to her cheek with increased violence; her breathing became suddenly interrupted, and she staggered as if threatened with a fit. I saw her condition, and sprang forward to assist her; but before I could reach the spot, her self-command had returned. 'I thank you,' said she, in a low tone, and with a smile beautiful but melancholy: 'I am better now, it was only a momentary faintness, occasioned by the heat of the room.' But how is it that you keep so much apart?' added she, speaking more easily, and resuming at once her naturally cheerful manner: 'I have observed you withdraw more than once, as if the fatigue were too great for you; or it may be that you dislike dancing—is it so?'

"'No, no,' replied I hurriedly; 'on the contrary, I delight in it; and as to my health, it never was more sound, nor were my spirits ever higher. May I convince you of my taste for dancing by requesting the honour of your hand? or—' and I was conscious, as I uttered the last half of the sentence, that my tone of voice, no less than my assumed gaiety, fell—is it allowable in us, circumstanced as we are, to dance together?'

"'Oh, surely,' answered she calmly; 'why not? We will lead off this dance, if you please, and you shall select the figure.'

"We did so; but there was madness in the entire proceeding,—glaring, palpable madness. We danced—at least I danced—like one who knew not whether he slept or were awake; and more than once I blundered in the very figure which I had myself consented to choose. Our hands, as a matter of necessity, frequently met: as often as this occurred, a thrill passed through me like a shock of electricity, and my very brain swam confusedly. At last we gained the bottom of the set, and she rallied me, not however without a visible effort, on my forgetfulness. I tried to answer in the same strain of badinage, but my efforts proved unavailing; and I felt that to remain where I was any longer, yet retain my senses, was hopeless. I rose from the couch on which we had sat down, and complaining of a sudden indisposition, prepared to withdraw. 'Good God! then you are really ill,' exclaimed she, in a voice full of emotion; 'and I have thoughtlessly induced you to do that which has increased your indisposition.'

"'Not so,' replied I, struggling hard to appear calm; 'it is a trifling headache, which a few moments of quiet will remove. I will retire beyond the sound of music for a while, and return again when I feel better; and I walked away as I spoke. I opened the door of the saloon, but before I closed it again, looked round. She stood as I had quitted her, in an attitude of anxiety and alarm: her eye had followed my movements, and now it met mine, not designedly, but by instinct. God! what a look was that! I felt it in my heart, my soul, my brain; it stirred up thoughts, which, had they continued to burn but a moment longer, must have driven me to insanity. I saw it ever after in my waking visions, and in my sleeping dreams; at midnight and at noonday it was equally before me. I could not tell what was the language that it spoke? I could not tell; I did not dare to ask: I read in it something which I desired to read, yet which, having read, I would have given worlds not to have observed. I ran with the step of a maniac to my chamber; I closed the door, locking and bolting it as if against some deadly enemy; and I revisited the scene of festivity that night no more.

"It was late on the following morning before the breakfast bell rang. On obeying its summons, I found that most of the guests of the preceding evening were gone, but that several still remained. All appeared jaded as a matter of course; a night of revelry seldom fails to bring in a morning of languor; but on none had fatigue produced so marked an effect as upon my father and his bride. The former, though manifestly struggling to wear the smooth brow of one at peace with himself and with every one around him, could not always repress a frown which told a tale of internal suffering either in body or mind;—the latter was dejected, thoughtful, silent, and uneasy,—and the more uneasy as her efforts to appear otherwise were too palpable to escape detection. I had done nothing to produce such effects. No, no; if there were other causes besides bodily fatigue for the embarrassment which displayed itself in the manner of the new-married couple, no blame could possibly attach to me. Why then did my conscience sting me? or rather, why did the suspicion arise at all, that there were other causes besides that which both avowed, and which all but myself appeared to admit? I blushed internally as these questions occurred, and, having hastily concluded my meal, I walked abroad to commune with my own heart in the solitude of the park.

"When I reached the house, the hall clock was striking a third quarter; and on looking up, I perceived that the dinner hour was close at hand. I hurried off to my own apartment; but before I reached it, sounds smote upon my ear, which caused me unconsciously to stop. It was necessary, in order to reach my own, that I should pass my father's dressing room, the door of which happened to be ajar. Heaven knows, there is no character so contemptible in my eyes as that of an eaves-dropper; nor am I conscious that in taking the step which I took then, I incurred the guilt—for guilt it surely is—of seeking to pry into the secrets of others; but there was a magic in Charlotte's voice which I never could resist. Its tones fell around me, and I paused to drink them in, more gratefully than the wanderer in the desert drinks from a well where no water was anticipated. My feelings may be guessed at, when I discovered that she spoke not in joy but in sorrow. The words I could not overhear—I did not desire to overhear them—but the tones were those of deep distress—of bitter heart-felt misery. Then came the sound of my father's voice, stern, as I had been told it was when addressed to my mother. I could bear this no longer. Plausible as he was when strangers stood by, and smooth and oily as his outward manner might be, it was evident, that in private he gave vent to his cruel disposition, and that he exercised his cruelty upon his bride. I felt every vein in my forehead and temples swell, as the idea rose into my mind. I rushed forward, a curse trembling upon my tongue, a curse directed even against the author of my being, nor was it without an effort almost supernatural that I succeeded in repressing it. But I did suppress it. I even calmed in some degree the frenzy that raged within me; and having completed my toilette, I descended with an unruddied countenance to the dining room.

"The last of our party had taken their departure some hours before, and we sat down, my father, Charlotte, and I, to a family meal. It was not a comfortable one. He indeed had put on that rigidity of countenance, which he desired should be mistaken for an expression of perfect good humour; whilst I struggled hard to appear in my usual spirits; and even Charlotte strove to look—what she felt not—happy. But our conversation, being on all hands forced, soon became flat, and finally died away into mere question and answer. Charlotte, indeed, complained of illness, which she attributed to the exertions of last night, and quitted us almost as soon as the cloth was withdrawn; and then my father and I were left to enjoy, as we might, each other's society.

"For some minutes neither party had spoken, and my thoughts were beginning to wander. I scarce knew whether, when my father, after filling his glass, and pushing the bottle to me, desired to know how my mother-in-law. I do not believe that any peculiarity of manner accompanied this question,—I am quite sure that it was a natural one, and one which ought to have produced no such effect upon me; but I started in my seat at the words, and turned round, as if an evil spirit had spoken. My father was not so much as looking towards me: he sat with his elbow upon the table, watching, to all appearance, the sun, as he sat behind a hill; and though a second or two elapsed ere I could so far command myself as to reply, he either took, or appeared to take, no notice of my embarrassment. As may easily be imagined, I expressed myself, when I did speak, greatly delighted with the lady; I passed upon her such ordinary eulogiums as men are accustomed to bestow upon women in whom they take no great interest.

"I am glad you are pleased with her," replied he, in the same tone of indifference, and still gazing steadily upon the setting sun. "She is an extremely amiable and excellent person, somewhat young and inexperienced, no doubt; but perfectly free from deceit and affectation. Yet your manner towards her has not been such as to impress her with the belief that you really like her. So she says at least, for I have seen nothing of the kind; but she complains that you shun her on every possible occasion, and that if by any accident you cannot effect your escape, your address is always formal, and your air distant. Surely you are above the silly feeling which sometimes urges men to be jealous of their fathers' wives."

"He turned round as he spoke; but though I did my best to read his secret thoughts, I could discover nothing in the glance of his eye beyond the expression naturally connected with the subject of our conversation. Relieved beyond measure at this, I hastened to assure him that no such paltry sentiments were encouraged by me, and I strove to account for a shyness, of which I was too conscious to deny it, by reminding him of the brief standing of our acquaintance, and the peculiar circumstances under which it commenced. All this seemed to be taken as I could have wished. He admitted that our first interview was not such as to lead to an immediate intimacy, but hoped that time would gradually dispel every unpleasant association which that might have produced, and that, before long, we should be on the footing of easy familiarity which the connection subsisting between us demanded.

"Besides," continued he, "you are so nearly of the same age, that to treat one another with coldness or excess of deference were ridiculous. She must be to you rather as a sister than a mother,—indeed, she ought perhaps to have been your wife rather than mine."

"I cannot tell whether my own heart deceived me, but, as he uttered these words, I fancied that I could detect in the corner of his eye a lurking suspicion, the more hideous as it was not intended to be seen. If I was right, the expression lasted but for an instant,—so abrupt indeed were both its coming and going, that thought itself could hardly overtake it,—and then all was again smooth and placid. The speech itself, however, was sufficient to embarrass me, for I was at a loss not only how to reply, but how to understand it; so I stammered out something about behaving on all occasions to my father's wife as her station in the family required. My father took no notice of these expressions. He changed the subject, indeed, almost immediately; and the remainder of our tele-a-tete passed off as such conferences were accustomed to do.

"I know not why I have dwelt thus minutely upon the occurrences which marked the commencement of Charlotte's and my acquaintance. In themselves, I am aware that they possess few claims upon the notice of a stranger; yet their influence upon me was great and lasting—so lasting, indeed, as to control my entire destiny. They have left, too, an impression upon my mind so deep, that years will not suffice to blot it out, should years of a hated existence be forced upon me. But I will strive to write more concisely hereafter: I will dwell upon nothing which the nature of the task which I have imposed upon myself will suffer me to pass by.

"Days, weeks, nay, months passed away without the occurrence of any incident particularly deserving of notice. For a time the course of gaiety in which he had embarked, was pursued by my father with steady resolution, and visits were frequently paid to our neighbours, as they in their turn were frequently entertained at home. But by degrees his old humour began again to obtain the ascendancy over him. His pride and ill-humour broke out on more than one occasion, with a violence which no equal could endure; and his neighbours, as a necessary consequence, grew cold in civilities which seemed so little valued, and were so thanklessly received. This change on their part operated only to rouse the natural implacability of his temper. A slight offered or received, sufficed to put an end at once to all farther intercourse with the offending party, no matter how gross and glaring the provocation might be. In this manner, first one, then another of our visitors fell off, till — was left once more in the state of almost total solitude which formerly distinguished it.

"In proportion as this state of things attained its climax, my father's retired and unsocial habits resumed their ascendancy over himself. His voice recovered its natural tones; he rarely spoke except in anger, or which was infinitely worse, in bitter railery. The society of his wife appeared to possess no charms for him, and mine he rather shunned than courted. We never saw him, indeed, except at meals, for his mornings were spent constantly in the library, and he retired thither again as soon as the dinner ended; and as to any act of kindness or attention, neither the one nor the other received such at his hands. I need not after this observe that the feeling so opposed to love, which I had struggled to subdue, again oppressed me as often as a thought of my father occurred; whilst poor Charlotte's dread of him became before long too conspicuous to be concealed.

"The consequence of all this was, that she and I were thrown continually upon one another for society, for consolation, I had almost said for support; whilst the reserve which had hitherto subsisted between us melted gradually away.

"Instead of separating for the rest of the morning, as we had been accustomed to do at the breakfast table, we found ourselves occupying the same apartment—she busied with her needle or her pencil, and I reading aloud the work of some author equally a favourite with both. Then came the time of exercise; and our walks, our rides, our drives, were felt to possess many additional attractions, now that they were taken, not separately, but together. Music, too, lent its powerful attractions. Our tastes here, as in literature, accorded; and the songs which she sang with the liveliest satisfaction to herself, were listened to by me with a feeling too deep even for tears. Need I say how all this ended? Wedded to one whom she had never loved, whose years alone had been sufficient obstacle to a union so revolting, and treated, even within a few months from her bridal day, not with indifference only, but with harshness and brutality; can it be wondered at, if she unconsciously gave to another that which was no longer hers to give? No; even though that other was the son of her husband, and, as a necessary consequence, a being from whom she was divided by a gulf never to be passed—who can blame her? She but obeyed the impulses which nature has implanted in every bosom; and obeying them without a consciousness of the results to which they lead, she was innocent. But for me—no such excuse was mine. I saw even before me—plainly, clearly, saw it. I knew even from the first, that to remain near her, yet retain the mastery over myself, was impossible. Then why did I not leave her? Why did I not abandon my home for ever—a home which till she entered it, possessed no attractions, and which now that she was there, ought to have been regarded with horror. I cannot answer these questions. There was a spell upon me, which drove me on, with eyes open and senses wide awake, into the abyss that, some power higher than my own will had prepared for me; and I followed its impulse, like a sheep led to the slaughter, without so much as making one struggle to resist it.

"In this manner the remaining portion of summer rolled on, and autumn came in, with all its variegated hues and sombre beauty. How delicious were the walks which we took at that glorious season, amidst groves dark with decaying foliage! How soothing were the moments which we spent under some tall beech, or umbrageous elm, whilst the dead leaves shaken from the branches at every breath, fell one by one at our feet! True, the thought of parting came but too frequently into our minds, for the period of my sojourn at home was drawing rapidly to a close; but the parting hour was yet by several weeks distant; and when did young heart learn to anticipate distress? Never; at those blessed moments, (for blessed I must still regard them,) every thing was forgotten beyond the events of the passing hour. Yet let me not be misunderstood. Never had there passed between us one word, one syllable, one allusion which the angels of light would have blushed to witness. Our love, if such it must be called, was wholly unmixt with every earthly and debasing passion. She was to me an object of adoration—an idol—to be gazed upon in holy rapture, but with a rapture sanctified by the most profound respect; whilst to her, I was as the brother of her affections—the friend on whom alone she leaned for aid in her difficulties, and consolation in her griefs. Could there be aught impure in the intercourse of persons actuated by these sentiments, and these only? Why was it, then, that such moments never failed to bring in their train, hours of agony and remorse?

"The fatal period, so often thought of, and to which every allusion had been, as it were studiously avoided, came at last. The middle of October arrived, and brought with it the necessity for my immediate abandonment of my intercourse, and return to college. For some days previously, our intercourse, though not less constant than before, had been accompanied with a degree of restraint perfectly novel. The truth is, that we were equally desirous of hiding the sorrow of which both were equally conscious, and the effort necessary to ensure success, caused us to appear strange in each other's eyes. But the attempt, though nobly made, and for a while steadily persevered in, proved ultimately useless. Feeling, if it be really strong, will break through every restraint both of prudence and duty; and ours were far too impetuous not to sweep all such barriers before them.

"It was now the day preceding that which had been fixed for the commencement of my journey. It was Sunday, too—that day of holy rest, which in the country, at least, never dawned without bringing a blessing along with it both upon man and beast; and Charlotte and myself, according to our invariable practice, attended divine service together. My father was not of the party; indeed, many years had elapsed since he last beheld the interior of a church, of which, and of the clergy, it was too much his custom, if he spoke at all, to speak in terms of contempt.

"Not at any moment of my life was I conscious of devotional feelings deeper or more crossgrowing than came over me on this occasion. I prayed, I say not fervently, but bitterly; the very tears made their way through the hands in which my face was buried; my whole soul seemed abstracted from earthly considerations, and even Charlotte was, for a time, forgotten. How she was affected I know not; far, from the commencement of the service to its close, I never once beheld her, so entirely was my attention given up to the solemn business in which I was engaged.

"We did not return home as soon as the service concluded; but Charlotte passing her arm through mine, we sauntered on towards our favourite retreat in the beech-wood. We sat down as usual, just within the shelter of the grove, on a mound from whence a view of the whole landscape could be obtained, whilst we were ourselves concealed from observation. The day was beautifully mild and serene; there was not a cloud in the sky, nor a breath of air, as if sufficiently violent to shake a withered leaf from its stem. A universal silence was around us, broken only by the full, clear, and melodious notes of a thrush, which poured, from a brake hard by, a torrent of natural music. We looked abroad, too, upon a scene of no ordinary beauty—upon herds of deer quietly grazing—upon the modest church, more than half concealed in the grove that encircled it—upon hamlets, villages, and solitary cottages, reposing in the sanctity of the sabbath; but of human beings not a trace could be discerned. There was something in this perfect solitude particularly affecting to persons in our situation: we did not interrupt it by any attempt at conversation, to which we felt ourselves quite unequal, but sat in silence, whilst vision the most melancholy passed over our minds, like the shadows of clouds on a summer's day over the side of a hill.

"At last, the gradual inclination of the sun towards the west, warned us that it was time to quit the spot. We rose as if by common consent, to obey the impulse, just as his disk reached the horizon; and we stood motionless whilst it sank lower and lower, till it wholly disappeared. It was then that for the first time I ventured to speak: what I said I know not; I believe it was some commonplace remark, such as the circumstances of the case called forth,—as that I should be far away when next she beheld the sun set, or something to that purport; but it appeared as if the tones of my voice were alone required to break the spell which had so long bound us, and to cause the feelings of both, hitherto painfully repressed, to overflow. Charlotte burst into tears. Instinctively I threw my arm round her waist—a movement which she sought not to prevent, and then she laid her head upon my shoulder and wept bitterly. I cannot pretend to describe what I felt at that moment; I could not speak comfort to her, for my own tears choked my utterance; but I pressed her to my heart, as if it were there, and there only, that she must read the secret which my lips refused to reveal.

"We stood thus for several moments; not a sentence had been spoken, by either, though both were too fully aware of the issue to which matters had been driven; when Charlotte, by a desperate effort, checked her weeping, and raising her head from my shoulder, proposed that we should return home. I obeyed without hesitation, and giving her my arm, we set forward in the direction of the house. We had just cleared the wood, when, happening to look back, I perceived the figure of a man passing with apparent caution to the right,—and a single glance served to convince me that it was my father. A horrible consciousness struck at once to my heart. I permitted Charlotte's arm to drop from mine, my senses all but forsook me, and it was not without difficulty that I prevented myself from falling to the ground. Alarmed at my condition, though ignorant of its cause, she shrieked aloud, and addressed to me in her agony, terms such as she ought never to have employed, nor I permitted. The words, not less than the manner of the speaker, restored to me at once my self-command. I perceived that she had not observed the spectacle which had so dreadfully shocked me; and determined not to distress her by any intimation of the truth, I pretended that a sudden dizziness had come over me, to which I was occasionally subject. I then urged her to clear away every trace of tears from her cheeks; and once more taking her arm in mine, led her, at a quick pace, to the house.

"We parted in the hall, Charlotte going to the drawing-room, whilst I hurried off to my own apartment, to indulge in a train of ideas more hideous than had ever yet entered into my mind. Could it be that my father entertained any suspicion of my honour, or his wife's fidelity? Could he act the part of a spy upon us, all the while that he pretended to desire our intimacy? Above all, was it possible for him to have witnessed all that passed in the beech-wood? What then? Had we been guilty of any deed, or spoken a single word, of which there was real cause to be ashamed? No! Whatever our feelings might have been, at least they were not disclosed; and the embrace,—was it more than the peculiar circumstances in which we stood authorised? Had I done aught besides what was enjoined upon me, in behaving towards Charlotte as a brother, and a friend? And was it not natural, on the eve of parting, that we should exhibit some such proofs that we looked forward to the separation with regret? All these questions I strove to answer to my own satisfaction; but there was a fiend in the back ground which continually reminded me, that the answers, though true in words, were false in spirit. How conscience does make cowards of us! Had my own heart been able to acquit me, there would have been nothing in nature besides capable of stirring up one painful reflection; but my heart did not acquit me, and all my anticipations were, in consequence, terrible. I thought of the injury I had done, and of its probable punishment—a punishment to be poured out not upon me alone, for that I could have borne, but upon one dearer to me than life—to secure whose happiness I would have been content to sacrifice not only present peace, but eternity itself. I thought of Charlotte, not merely neglected and occasionally chid, as was her late now; but upbraided, insulted, disgraced, turned out upon a cold world, with a reputation blasted, and a broken heart, whilst I, the miserable cause of all this, could not offer to her so much as the last refuge of the guilty and the desperate. Maddened with the horrid picture, I threw myself with my face upon the bed, my whole frame shaking in convulsive agony, till the sweat-drops stood upon my brow like dew, and my brain burned as if it had been on fire.

"By degrees, however, hope, that inextinguishable principle in minds not utterly seared, began to exert its influence. There were no proofs before me, either that my father was really suspicious, or that, being so, he had watched our proceedings; still less had conclusive evidence appeared, that our proceedings on that day were observed. At the moment when I saw him, he was too far removed from the spot where we had sat, to overbear our conversation, had such passed between us; and the shape of the wood was, I felt confident, such, as to screen our very figures from his observation. Should the case be so, then all might yet be well, and I should leave Charlotte exposed to no greater risks and miseries than were already about her. But should it not,—I would not receive that impression again. There was something within, which whispered that all could not be lost. We were not sufficiently guilty to merit utter perdition; and Heaven was too just to destroy on account of errors purely involuntary, and only of the mind. No, no; my fears had been too excessive, and I did wrong to indulge them. At all events, there was no advantage to be derived from the anticipation of evil; of less comfort to which, if it were to come, I should soon receive tokens not to be misunderstood; so I determined to command myself, and to be guided in my judgment of what was likely to fall out, by the behaviour of my father when we met.

"Thus reasoning, I made haste to change my dress, and descended to the dining room. Just as I reached the door of his apartment, my father came forth, and I found, that however sturdy resolutions may be whilst the necessity of acting up to them is remote, they hold but an insecure ground if suddenly put to the test. My heart beat quick, and I would have passed on; but he spoke quick, and agitated as I was, I retained my senses sufficiently about me to be aware that the moment of trial had arrived—I stopped. His observation was one of ordinary salutation merely. He hoped that I had had a pleasant walk—said that the sun set beautifully, and predicted an agreeable day for my journey on the morrow; and he did so in a tone perfectly calm and natural; indeed, if any thing, with more of kindness in it than he had of late cared to show. I felt as if a mountain had been removed from my chest. I breathed again. I was like a person to whom liberty is unexpectedly restored,—like a criminal reprieved on the very scaffold. Hope for once had not deceived me; and my suspicions were proved to be groundless. With a light step and a joyous countenance, I continued my course to the dining-room; and I sat down to table a happier man than I had been during many weeks before.

"Moods of the mind, whether gay or melancholy, are surely infectious, where persons who take a real interest in each other's welfare are met together. We had not long been seated, when the dejection which at first marked Charlotte's air, gradually cleared away, and she joined cheerfully in the conversation, of which I was the primo mover and the chief supporter. My father, too, seemed to have laid aside for a time his constitutional oddness that he might make the last evening of my sojourn agreeable one; indeed so affectionate was his manner towards both Charlotte and myself, that had I not been under the influence of false excitement, that very affection would have stung me to the quick. I was, however, too happy in the discovery that my fears were without foundation, to permit any consideration of minor moment to ruffle me; and hence I acted and spoke, not like one about to quit a place ended to him by the most tender associations, but as if the journey to be taken were one of pleasure. My father rallied me in this; Charlotte, too, threw out some hints which I could not misunderstand—but I answered both in the same tone of levity, and then changed the subject. That the excitement might not abate, I drank wine profusely; and my father, though usually abstemious, encouraged me in so doing by imitating my example. By and by, Charlotte quitted us. There was a slight flutter of the pulse as the door closed after her,—a slight sense of apprehension, that a second trial was at hand; but nothing whatever occurring to justify the suspicion, I again became reassured; and we again plied the bottle, till I certainly, and my father, to all appearance, became considerably calvined. But we broke up from our orgie at last, and following Charlotte to the saloon, the rest of the evening was spent in listening to Handel's exquisite music, rendered doubly sublime by being expressed in the tones of a voice to which those of the seraphim were harsh and inharmonious.

"It was drawing late, and all appeared to feel that the parting moment was come; for it was necessary for me to set out at an hour when few even of the domesticities would be stirring. I did my best to appear calm; I even strove to keep up the gaiety of countenance which during the last hour or two had been worn in mockery of a heavy heart. Charlotte likewise struggled hard to repress her grief; and she succeeded so well, that not a tear burst from the lids, beneath which a torrent lay imprisoned. My father was the first to speak. 'Good night, Charles,' said he, holding out his hand; 'there is nothing to be gained by prolonging a scene like this. Part we must; and though it be for a short time, that part is never agreeable. Go, kiss your mother—pooh—pooh—kiss Charlotte, and tell her not to break her heart, for you will return to us at Christmas.'

"I had replied to the squeeze of his hand, and was preparing to salute Charlotte, when the latter part of his speech attracted my notice. It had never been customary for me to visit home during any of the shorter vacations. Thence I usually spent either in Cambridge, or in town, or with some of my college friends, whose residences were not so remote as mine from the seat of learning; and the invitation to devote now an establishment to me, and but to severely strike me. I looked at my father suspiciously, but there was an air of absolute frankness about him which fully satisfied me that the invitation was not given ironically. Still I hesitated how to answer him. God knows, my inclinations were not doubtful; had I acted as they pointed out, I should have at once closed with the proposition, no matter how pregnant with mischief; but there was an apprehension, suggested by conscience alone, lest my motives might be read, which caused me to appear undecided, if I really was not so.

"You do not mean to deny us the pleasure of your company at Christmas?" asked my father; "I am sure both Charlotte and I shall moan to death till we see you again. Try, my love, try your influence with this traitor, who seems to quit his home with smiles, and looks forward to his return with tears."

"Charlotte spoke. Her words were pronounced with difficulty, and the tone of her voice was low and plaintive; but it penetrated to my very heart, and put in jeopardy all my artificial composure. 'You will not reject your father's invitation?' said she; 'for my sake, not less than his, do not refuse him what he asks.' It was not without a desperate effort that I restrained myself; but I did restrain myself so far as to reply, in a tone meant to be that of indifference, that against such entreaties I could not think of standing out. I felt, however, that to dissemble much longer would be impossible. I accordingly took her hand, imprinted upon her cheek a cold, formal kiss, then snatching up my candle, hurried away to the privacy of my own apartment.

"I need not say that to me that was a night of intense and overwhelming misery. The steps which I had taken to support my courage, however effectual they might have been at the moment, told, now that I was alone, fearfully against me; for the excitement produced by wine soon evaporated, and left me more than ever a prey to despondency and self reproach. I could not lie down; I did not so much as think of undressing; but, with a brain distracted by a thousand fearful forebodings, and a fever raging through every vein, paced my chamber backwards and forwards, with the step of a maniac. Yet the images which passed through my mind that night, left no marked or definite form behind them. I believe indeed that they were too wild to assume a definite form,—that they were rather the shadows of terrible ideas, than ideas themselves,—vague, indistinct, uncertain, pointing to nothing tangible, nor resting upon any palpable foundation, but painful as the operations of a confused dream, when nothing more is remembered than that it was the source of exquisite distress. The truth is, that though conscience might have told a hideous tale, I was not sufficiently brave to let her voice be heard. Had I possessed courage enough, or candour enough, to listen to that monitor, the cause of my agony would have been at once displayed, and possibly all that followed might have been avoided; but I closed my ears against a warning note, which would have sounded harshly in proportion to its truth, and I have paid the full penalty of my own weakness.

"I pass over the events which immediately followed, partly because I myself retain of them but an indistinct recollection, and partly because, were the case otherwise, the detail could excite no interest in the mind of a stranger. Let it suffice to state, that morning found me thus occupied, not a single preparation having been made for my journey, and that when the arrival of the carriage was announced, I only began to take steps, which under other circumstances would have been taken many hours before. Notwithstanding the delay thus occasioned, however, I saw nothing either of my father or Charlotte. I think their usual hour of descending to the breakfast-room had arrived previous to my departure,—I am almost confident that it had; yet they made not their appearance, and the very shutters of their apartments remained closed as I passed under them. I did not look up again; on the contrary, I threw myself back in the chaise with the firm determination of forcing my thoughts into another channel;—how far I succeeded need not be told.

"At noon on the following day, I reached Cambridge; but how changed in every respect since last I traversed its venerable streets! I had been an enthusiast once in the studies of the place; I had aspired to the attainment of academic honours, and was not without a hope of succeeding to the utmost; whilst at the same time no man ever entered more freely into the gaieties, nor enjoyed more heartily the society of his fellow-students. Now I loathed them all; my books were neglected; my friends were avoided; I shut myself up in my chambers, a gloomy and discontented wretch, that I might ponder in solitude upon the single and horrible idea which began about this time to take possession of my mind.

"There are few ancient houses which have not a traditionary saying handed down from generation to generation, with which, in some way or other, the fate of the race is supposed to be connected. As I have already stated, ours was one of the oldest families in the north of England, as it had formerly been one of the most powerful; and we were not without our ominous prophecy, though when, or on what occasion spoken, I never heard. You must know that we bear as a device upon our shield, three young falcons, with a falcon likewise for our crest. Whether the rhyme has reference to these circumstances, no one presumed to say; but there was a distich well-known in the family, which obtained an increased importance in consequence of the coincidence, and which was supposed to forbid, that at some period or other, the house of ——— would become violently extinct. It was this:

"The ——— of ——— sat rue the hour,
When the young hawk carries the old hawk's bowyer."

"I have said that this venerable distich was well-known to every member of the family. It had been repeated to me a hundred times, at least, by my nurse; and even my father, during an occasional gleam of good humour, had more than once alluded to it; but, as may well be believed, it never made upon me a greater impression than any other couplet of similar import and antiquity. Now, however, the case was different. I began to see it in the prophetic character which had all along been alluded to by others. I took particular notice of its fitness, with reference to the armorial bearings of the house; and as the allusion could hardly be to an ordinary spoliation, my excited imagination was not slow in discovering another and more apt point of tendency. To speak out at once,—I fancied that the day of our house's downfall had come,—that I was the miscreant by whose sacrilegious means its ruin was to be effected,—that I had already harried the nest of my father, by stealing away the affections of his wife, and that the penalty threatened would not fail to be exacted. No language would do justice to the effect produced upon me by this hideous conviction. I have sat motionless during an entire morning, ruminating upon the prophecy till all faith in the power of my own will to regulate my actions vanished; and I have risen, not furious, nor even excited, but calmly and deliberately convinced, that there was a path before me in which I could not avoid to walk, though the precipice to which it conducted was not for an instant concealed.

"It was not customary between my father and myself to keep up any frequent or regular epistolary communication. In case either party had business to transact with the other, then indeed the usual silence was broken; but letters of affection merely had never passed between us, from the hour at which I first quitted home for school. Under these circumstances, I had no right to expect that any notice of what might be passing at ——— would be transmitted to me; and as often as I permitted sober reason to exert her power, this truth failed not to come conspicuously into view. But sober reason possesses but a very interrupted, as well as feeble influence, over a mind engrossed by one tumultuous and fatal passion. Morning after morning I examined my breakfast-table for that which was not, and ought not to have been looked for there; and on each occasion I felt as if some serious injury had been done, such as I was justified in desiring to revenge. In short, I ceased either to think or act like a man in his senses,—I became, to all intents and purposes, insane.

"Slowly and drearily the time rolled on; but, slow and dreary as was its progress, it drew gradually to a close. It was now that a wild joy, scarcely more endurable than the despair which preceded it, began to assert its supremacy over me. In a few days more I should be again an inhabitant of the same dwelling with her to whom I felt myself bound by ties stronger than any human connection acknowledges; and what to me was every consideration besides? I was no longer master of myself. The subject of a prophecy—marked out by destiny itself for one particular course—how was it possible for me to avoid my fate? and though that fate should envelope in it the ultimate misery both of myself and those most dear to me, how was I answerable? Such were the strange thoughts which pressed themselves upon me with an energy not to be resisted, and such the frame of mind into which I had fallen, when I once more quitted the university for the place of my birth.

"It was a clear frosty morning, the sun was shining brightly, and the earth, covered with a coat of hard crisp snow, was glittering as if overspread with diamonds, when I arrived at the well-remembered lodge. The gate was opened, as it had been before, by the pretty gaiter girl, who, as formerly, dropped me her nearest courtesy as the carriage rolled through; nor could my eye discover any alteration in the form and aspect of things around, greater than the change of season was calculated to produce. There was something sinister in this; why I knew not; but as the postilion drove at the full speed of his horses, though even then at a pace tedious and wearisome to my impatience, I felt as composed and happy as a man can be under such circumstances. By and by, the wicket was passed and the turning made, and I was once more in front of the home of my fathers. It was now for the first time, when the sound of the bell spoke upon my ear, that my heart fluttered violently; indeed, so great was my agitation, that, after the door had been opened and the steps let down, I found considerable difficulty in alighting. I exerted myself, however, strenuously to hide this agitation, and strove to assume, as I proceeded, an air of extreme composure, with so much success that the peculiar expression of the servant's countenance as he looked me in the face, though noticed plainly enough, did not discompose me.

"Your master and mistress are well, I hope?" said I, in what I meant to be a careless tone.

"My master is well, sir," said the man, "but—"

"But what?" exclaimed I, forgetting in a moment the resolution which I had just formed. "Speak out, man, at once—your mistress?"

"Has been extremely ill for some weeks past," replied he, "and is now, I fear, at the point of death."

"I heard no more. I threw my hat upon the table, and brushing past the servant, ran with the speed of thought up stairs. In an instant I was at the door of her apartment: it was ajar; and without considering the consequences which might accrue, I pushed it open. There was no attendant in waiting. The curtains were drawn closely round the bed; and the blinds let down, with the shutters half closed, threw a dismal light over the chamber. There was a dull noise, too, as of one who breathed with difficulty or in a slumber; and a slight movement of the bed-clothes served to indicate that the former, not the latter, was the cause. Maddened with apprehensions, I knew not of what, I lastly pulled back the hangings: it was a desperate deed, and desperately done; but it roused the sufferer from her lethargy. She opened her eyes, they fell upon my countenance, and I was immediately recognised. One shriek told this—a shriek shrill, loud, terrible—there was an effort, too, to rise—a movement as if to meet the embrace which was offered, but it failed. Before my extended arms could reach her, she fell back upon the pillow—she was dead.

"I saw this, yet I saw it with eyes dry as they are now. I looked upon her pale, smooth forehead, beautiful even in death; yet not a drop fell from my burning balls;—and I kissed her cold lips, calmly, as I would have kissed the block of marble. I had no power to weep; but, had the case been otherwise, the fountain of my tears would have been instantly congealed by the scene which followed. I was gazing upon the wreck of all that once was lovely and loveable, when a hand laid roughly upon my shoulder, caused me to turn round. My father stood beside me. There was an expression in his face of every evil passion by which the human heart is capable of being wrung—hatred, malice, pride, fury,—triumph likewise, hellish triumph, was in his eye, as he looked sometimes at the corpse of his wife, and sometimes at his son.

"Wretch!" said he at last, "behold thy handiwork! Look at that frail but beautiful image, and know that thy villany has wrought this deed—thy villany, I say—thine! Think you that I could not see through the flimsy disguise with which you sought to blind me? Think you that my eye was not upon you in all your lonely walks and secret meetings? Have I not witnessed your warm embraces, heard your protestations, watched your very looks, read your very thoughts? Villain! traitor! miscreant! begone. Quit my presence for ever; and may the curse of a father weigh upon your spirit, till it drag you to the earth!"

"There was a spell upon me which I could not resist even for a moment. I heard him out—I heard him pronounce a sentence which I felt to be just,—and I saw that fate had accomplished its purpose. With a deliberate step, I quitted the chamber of the dead. I spoke to no one, but, hurrying from the house, became from that hour a wanderer and an outcast. I would have committed suicide, had I possessed the power; but on more occasions than one I found, that the power to die, at least by my own hand, was denied me. In this plight, I wandered from place to place, sleeping under sheds and in barns, but shunning as much as possible every inhabited spot, till chance, or the fatality which has guided me from my birth, brought me to Bracburn Lees. I had been then for several weeks a vagabond; my money was expended; and even my clothes had been in part disposed of, to procure the means of subsistence; when the idea of enlisting as a common soldier occurred to me. I obeyed it; and with the consequences which have followed, you are already acquainted."

CHAPTER V.

"The last gleam of daylight served only to render the characters of this manuscript visible, and I departed almost as soon as I had finished the perusal. I leave you to judge of the effect which that perusal produced upon me. If I felt interested in the fate of the unhappy youth before, my interest was now increased a hundred fold; and I rose from the ground fully bent upon saving him from the degradation of the lash, at all hazards. I determined, indeed, should other measures fail, to put the manuscript itself into the hands of the commanding officer, who could not possess the common feelings of a man, yet inflect so debasing a punishment upon the writer. Full of this notion, I made all haste to the monuments; and I reached them just in time to ascertain, that the colonel had set out an hour before upon a visit to General Crauford, and that he was not expected to return before midnight.

It was with a sensation of no ordinary disappointment, that I turned my back from his quarters.

My first idea was to sit up till he should return, and then at every risk to force my way into his presence, and plead the young man's cause vehemently, as I felt it. But a minute's reflection served to convince me, that with a man of his temperament, such a course, so far from being productive of good, would only bring about much evil. That he would refuse to listen to my story, I knew the individual too well not to believe; or if he did listen, it would be in that frame of mind to which a man gives way, when, having made up his mind how to act, he nevertheless consents to hear the justice of his decision denied, or its policy called in question. That scheme was therefore abandoned almost as soon as it had been formed. But, between it and permitting things to take their course, one only alternative remained, and to that, after considerable doubts as to its efficacy, I made up my mind to have recourse. It was our custom at this time, as it invariably is with the divisions in the front of an army, to go out under arms every morning an hour before dawn; and I determined to make use of that breathing space for the purpose of making the colonel aware of all the circumstances which had affected myself so deeply.

Nothing occurred that night, either to myself or Jackson, worthy of repetition; the latter sent no message to me, nor, as far as I could ascertain, took any other step, to forward his own interests, but waited in silent indifference the issues of the morrow, be they what they might. As I afterwards heard, indeed, he appeared not unaware of the nature of the sentence which was awarded him, yet, with a coolness for which it would not be easy to account, sat down satisfied under the weight of his destiny. For myself, I retired to bed at my usual hour, and though for a time anxiety kept me awake, habit gradually asserted its influence, and I slept soundly.

It was still dark as pitch when the orderly sergeant entered the room to say, that the regiment was getting under arms. I sprang to my feet at the first summons, and hastily dressing myself, sallied forth to take my station at the head of my company: in five minutes after, a close column was formed upon the brow of the height, on which the corps remained till daylight began to appear; when the men being ordered to pile their arms, the officers were permitted to fall out, and to meet in groups, as was their custom, on the flank of the battalion. Now was my time for bringing forward Jackson's case; and I did not neglect it. I hastened to the spot where the colonel stood, being resolved at once to entreat his pardon of the young man's narrative; but before I could reach him an aide-de-camp rode up, and my opportunity was lost. The aide-de-camp said only a few words, and then rode on,—but these were words of moment, for the colonel instantly mounted his horse, and ordered the regiment to stand to its arms. This was of course done, and done promptly; but minute after minute passing by, and nothing of moment occurring, the colonel seemed to doubt the correctness of the information which he had just received, and, having warned the men not to struggle, nor take off their accoutrements till further notice, he dismissed the parade. In an instant all hurried back to their quarters, and addressed themselves in good earnest to their morning meal.

Another opportunity was now presented to me, of which I gladly availed myself. Having waited till I saw the colonel enter his quarters, I hastened after him, and, though no especial favourite, was not refused admission. The first sentence that I uttered, however, was all to which he would listen.

"Captain Chakott," said he sternly, "I heard your intercession in favour of that man yesterday, and I told you at the moment how I intended to act. I have only to add, that were he my own brother, he should receive the full amount of his sentence."

I would have still persisted in my suit, holding out at the same time the packet; but he made a motion with his hand that I should desist, and would listen to me no farther. I walked away more than half desirous to learn that Jackson had desisted.

No fresh alarm occurred, and the time appointed for the punishment being arrived, the bugles sounded. The call on such occasions is seldom obeyed with much alacrity; for, however obnoxious a criminal may be, there are few indeed who take pleasure in the spectacle which a military punishment presents; nor was the regiment more active in assembling now, than at other and similar moments. But it did assemble in due time. A square was then formed, the officers standing in the centre; and in a few minutes after, the prisoner was introduced under the charge of the guard.

There was now a solemn and fearful silence, whilst the colonel giving the word "attention!" proceeded to read aloud the minutes and sentence of the court. These were listened to by the regiment with an involuntary shudder; by the prisoner with an intensity of feeling, which all his assumed composure failed to conceal. His cheeks were flushed, his lip quivered, his eye rolled round the assembly, as if its movements were beyond the influence of his own control; and his limbs, though they did not quiver, were restless and uneasy, like the forefoot of a hunter when checked as the view-halloo is given. No sooner, however, had the reading ceased, than he resumed, as if by magic, a perfect command of himself, and turned upon his commanding officer a glance, beneath which the eye of the latter, though bold and proud, seemed to quiver. "You have heard your sentence, sir," said the colonel, "and now I have only to observe, that were you my nearest relative, not one lash of the number awarded you should be abated. Strip, sir."

"Never!" replied Jackson haughtily. "Had I been guilty of any crime against God or man, I should have submitted quietly even to this;—but circumstances as I am, the lash at least shall leave no debasing mark upon me." As he uttered these words, he sprang with the agility of a roe from the party surrounding him, and rushed furiously and desperately against the levelled bayonets of the square. In an instant the firelock of one man was wrenched from his grasp; and consequences the most fatal must have ensued, had not the attention of all, not even excepting the prisoner himself, been suddenly drawn away by a sound, the nature of which there was no possibility of mistaking. It was the report, first, of a solitary cannon, then of three others in rapid succession, and then, of a heavy and unintermitting roar of musketry. There required no messenger to assure us that the enemy was coming on. The colonel found time only to desire that the prisoner, who was again in custody, might be securely led to the rear, ere a mounted officer, breathless and covered with dust, arrived upon the ground; and the battalion breaking hastily into column, pushed forward to assume its station in the line.

I need scarcely remind you, that at the period to which my present narrative refers, Ciudad Rodrigo, after an obstinate defence, had fallen into the hands of the French, who in overwhelming numbers threatened an immediate advance upon the Portuguese capital. For some days past, indeed, they had been making movements sufficiently indicative that the moment of re-opening the campaign in real earnest was not very distant; and the British army had, in consequence, been kept in a condition for meeting at the shortest notice. So lately as the 21st, they had pushed forward a strong column both of infantry and cavalry, which, occupying Valdelamula, St. Pedro, and Villa Formosa, had caused our people to abandon and blow up the Fort of Concepcion; and now our most advanced corps lay resting its left upon Alameda, with its right, as well as its rear, covered by the Coa. Into that line we were pushed, and we took post in the centre, having a battalion of Cadagores on each flank, and the rocky bed of the river immediately behind us.

We had not assumed our alignment many minutes, when one of the most interesting military spectacles which it has been my good fortune to behold, opened upon us. Three British pickets, two of infantry, one of cavalry, had been posted considerably in advance of Alameda—about half way between that fortress and the village of Villanula. These having been attacked by an overwhelming force of the enemy, were of course compelled to fall back; and they now appeared, slowly and regularly retiring, before a perfect swarm of tirailleurs, supported by dense columns both of horse and foot. Nothing could exceed the cool and orderly manner in which that retrogression was conducted. Their retreat lay over a level plain, intersected here and there by hedges, stone walls, and enclosures, behind each of which, as it occurred, our people resolutely maintained themselves, till the enemy, extending far beyond their flanks, began to threaten them in rear, when they were again under the necessity of running back, as quickly as they could, to the next cover. Nor was it to infantry alone that those brave men were opposed. As soon as the country began to open sufficiently for cavalry to act, several squadrons of French dragoons dashing forward, made various attempts to intercept our people as they retreated from hedge to hedge, and from wall to wall,—inasmuch that on more than one occasion the skirmishers were compelled to throw themselves into circles, and to withstand a charge as they best might. They were not, however, uniformly successful here. Some prisoners were unfortunately taken, and several brave men sabred; till at last the pickets found that further opposition was useless, and they fell back behind the division, now drawn out to receive the enemy.

The French, finding us in position along the brow of the height, paused for a few minutes, as if to give their generals time to reconnoitre our arrangements, and to complete their own. That was a moment of deep and extraordinary interest, when, the firing having ceased, the hostile lines stood opposed to one another, in all the pomp and majesty of war in its most magnificent array; and many a bosom beat with anxiety and proud daring, whilst within an hour was destined to cease beating for ever. But the pause, though strikingly fine, was not of long continuance. The French, sending off two lesser bodies to amuse the regiments on our flanks, drew up opposite to our centre an immense column of infantry, supported, and in some degree intermixed, with several masses of cavalry; and then, having saluted us with a warm discharge of musketry, and sent no pieces of cannon, pressed forward with a fury which we found it no easy matter to withstand. Of the events which immediately followed, I can offer no minute or accurate description; I saw only the flashes of our own and of the enemy's muskets, and heard but the roar of fire-arms, like the rolling of a drum,—whilst a smoke dense as the heaviest fog that ever darkened the city of London, soon rendered every object beyond my immediate front invisible.

In this state things continued for perhaps ten minutes; the increasing brilliancy of the fire from the head of the enemy's column proving that it drew every instant nearer and nearer. Our ranks, not very numerously supplied at the first, were now sadly thinned, and the tremendous shower of bullets thrown in upon us rendered it continually thinner; when a sort of wild cry from the French, not a shout, but a confused commingling of voices in all tones, and without any regularity, gave notice that they were about to bring their bayonets to the charge. I cannot accuse our men of want of courage at the very moment when I confess that they declined the challenge. Outnumbered to an immense degree, two thirds of their original strength cut off, or dispersed with the wounded, it was not to be expected that a single battalion would meet the rush of at least five thousand men, cheered forward, as these were, by the knowledge that a numerous cavalry was on their flank, ready to act with them. Our people gave way. There were no means of rallying them; no point indeed at which we could halt on this side the river; so we fled in extreme confusion towards the bridge, by which alone the Coa could be crossed.

It was well for us at this juncture, that the pickets, having formed in our rear, and being joined by parties from other corps, were enabled to oppose so much of a second line as to cover our retreat. Had it not been so, we must, to a man, have surrendered or been cut to pieces; for the bridge, when we reached it, was literally choked up with fugitives, the Portuguese having fled some time before we gave way; and as it was, our reserve being finally driven in, the enemy were enabled to bring some guns to bear upon us, from the fire of which we suffered severely. Nevertheless the passage was, in the end, made good; and then having halted among some rocks and woods and broken ground, which overhung the opposite bank, we again faced about to resist any attempts which might be made to pursue us farther. These, however, were neither numerous nor desperate. Some squadrons of cavalry did indeed charge boldly towards the bridge, pushing a troop across, but that troop was cut to pieces by a division of German Hussars, and the fire of our artillery checked the remainder.

The cavalry being thus driven back, a few minutes' pause ensued, during which General Crauford, and the officers of his staff, rode along our line, encouraging the men by their voices, and minutely examining their arrangement. In the mean while the enemy having reformed their solid column, began to crown the ridge of the opposite height, and showed as if it were their intention to force the passage of the bridge, and carry our position by assault; but they never once arrived within the reach of musketry.

No sooner had the mass begun to move, than our artillery opened their fire, and with a precision far surpassing any thing of which I could have formed a conception. First, their shrapnells striking full into the centre of the column, caused large gaps to appear; then came the case and grape shot, literally sweeping down whole sections, till the enemy, panic-struck, first halted, then wavered, then fled over the ridge in the greatest confusion. This was the last effort made to drive us from our new alignment. Though the smoke from their bivouac showed that they still hovered near, no farther attempt was made to pass the Coa; and we, following their example, caused our men to pile their arms, and lay down to rest about our watch fires.

It was not, however, General Crauford's design to await a renewal of the attack; to which, indeed, he had exposed himself in direct opposition to the wishes of Lord Wellington. His business was to fall back with as little delay as possible upon the main body; and that he made ready to accomplish as soon as a fitting opportunity should arrive. With this view our people were commanded, as soon as darkness set in, to heap quantities of fresh fuel upon their fires; and then stealing one by one so far to the rear as that the blaze should not betray them, the different regiments formed quickly but silently into columns of march. That done, the guns, baggage, stores, and wounded, were sent off, and then battalion after battalion, leaving a brief interval between the head of one and the cue of the other, took the road to Alverca.

There remains but little for me to add connected with the fate of the Gentle Recruit. Our columns having reached their new ground without molestation, and the enemy evincing no disposition to follow them up, ample time was afforded for mustering the several battalions, and ascertaining the amount of our loss. When the regiment to which I was attached paraded, it was found that, among many others absent without leave, Jackson was not to be found. What had become of him, no one appeared accurately to know. It was ascertained, indeed, that when the firing grew sharp, and the guard was called away to join their comrades, the prisoner, instead of embracing the opportunity of escape, hastily threw on his accoutrements, and followed. That he took part in the action, therefore, no one could doubt; but whether he fell, or was taken prisoner, or fled into the woods when our line was broken, remained a mystery. Nor was the mystery ever solved from that day to this. His name was given in among the list of missing, and he was neither seen nor heard of afterwards.

Major Chakott's story being brought to a close, the company as in duty bound, spoke in high terms of its excellence, expressing themselves deeply indebted to the teller for the entertainment they had received. His health was drunk with the usual honours; after which, a general desire began to show itself, that, as the customary hour for breaking up was still distant, some other member of the mess would favour them with a legend, and at the solicitation of the company, the President called upon Captain Macdick, who with great good humour began the following tale.

Saratoga.*

CHAPTER I.

Seldom has Montreal witnessed a scene of higher excitement, or more warlike bustle, than was presented to the eyes of its inhabitants on the morning of the 8th of June, 1777. The first streaks of dawn were just beginning to redden the eastern sky, when a deafening roll of drums, and clamour of bugles, roused men, women, and children from their slumbers; whilst soldiers, pouring in great numbers from almost every habitation, hastened to assume their well known stations. It was on this day, that General Burgoyne, having drawn together the whole of his army, and made the best preparations which circumstances would allow for the transport of stores and provisions, resolved to commence his march in the direction of Fort Ticonderoga; and to open a campaign, from which the most brilliant results were expected to accrue to the cause of loyalty and British interests throughout America at large.

The corps of which General Burgoyne assumed the command, consisted, as I need scarcely inform my present auditors, of rather more than seven thousand men. It was made up of three thousand seven hundred and twenty-four British, three thousand and sixteen German soldiers of the line; four hundred and seventy-three artillery-men, and two hundred and fifty Provincials; and the train of guns attached to it, fell not short of forty pieces, including cannons, mortars, and royals, of all kinds and calibres. I know very well that in these times it is a common practice to speak slightly of the equipments and general appearance of the troops which served during the first American war. No doubt, some of their appointments were ridiculous enough; the little three cornered hat, for example, was but an inconvenient covering for a head liable to constant exposure both to sun and shower,—and the tight breeches and gaiters, with the long flapped coat, were not exactly calculated to give the greatest elasticity to the limbs, or freedom to the body. But in spite of these defects, if such they deserve to be called, you must permit me, who have looked upon the soldiers of both periods, to declare, that I never beheld a finer or more imposing band than was brought on this eventful day under my observation. The men were, for the most part, in the prime of life, well made, robust, hardy, and active; they appeared to enjoy the finest health, and their spirits were mantling to the brim; whilst among the officers, one disposition, and one only, prevailed, from the hoary veteran down to the unpledged standard-bearer. They were all confident of success, and spoke and acted, not like persons embarking upon a business beset with perils, and of dubious issue, but as if a mere triumphal journey were before them.

I have said that this splendid regular army was accompanied by two hundred and fifty Provincials, raised for the service immediately in view, and acting as militia only. These men, on whose acquaintance with the nature of Indian warfare, and the general face of the country, considerable reliance was placed, were not embodied into one corps or battalion; on the contrary, they were divided into four independent companies, called Rangers, or Marksmen; of which three were composed of Canadians, the descendants of Frenchmen, and officered by their own feudal chiefs, or Seigneurs,—whilst one, made up of Scottish emigrants, or the descendants of old soldiers who had established themselves along the St Lawrence as settlers, was headed by a gallant comrader of their own, by name Fraser. The latter company received, as without incurring the charge of undue partiality I may be permitted to assert that it deserved, marked attention from the general commanding. One hundred young men, unrivalled in point of bodily strength and activity, composed it; whose habits from their childhood had been such as to inure them to the duties of light troops, and whose aim with their own weapon, the rifle, was unerring. There was not an individual among them, who would have been at a loss to find his way, had he been cast into the centre of a wilderness, provided only he were informed in what direction the point to be attained lay, and could obtain a sight of the sun by day, and the stars by night; and as to privations, cold, hunger, thirst, and bodily fatigue, they all to a man set such at defiance. It was my good fortune to commence my military career in that very distinguished company. Being nearly related to its commander, as well as his personal acquaintance, I readily accepted his invitation to accompany him in the character of a volunteer: with the assurance, not from him only, but from those higher in rank and of superior influence, that the first commission which should fall vacant, should be conferred upon me.

A young soldier is seldom very tardy in obeying the signal which summons him to the opening of his maiden campaign. The night of the 7th had been to me a sleepless one. Aware of the mighty movements which were in preparation, my mind was a great deal too busy in comparing the past with the future, to permit my body to obtain much rest; and when I did fall into a dose, it was to dream sometimes of home and the scenes of domestic happiness which had passed there, sometimes of my prospects, and intended behaviour before the enemy. From such a slumber as this, you will not be surprised to learn that the first blast of the bugle roused me, I leaped out of bed in a moment; hurried through my toilette as if life and death depended on its completion; and then, with all the ardour of a volunteer of seventeen, sallied forth into the street.

Here all was bustle and preparation; the hum of voices, the hurried tread of feet, the rattle of arms, and the occasional brief word of command, gave notice that, even in the dark, men knew their stations, and that they jostled one another in order to reach the several points where confusion would give place to absolute order. This state of things was not, however, of long continuance. Before the increasing dawn rendered objects distinctly visible, the only sound heard was a sort of stifled shuffling, as if officers were passing along the fronts of companies to ascertain that they were correctly formed; and then, for the space of a quarter of an hour, or perhaps something more, all was as silent as the grave.

Like those about me, I had taken my wonted station on the right of the company, and was watching with an anxiety, such as I never experienced before, the gradual approach of day, when a roll of drums, taken up in the rear, and passing on slowly to the front, gave notice that the general himself was on the ground. I looked back, and my glance fell upon a spectacle well calculated to inspire the most timid with courage and confidence. Upwards of four thousand men were behind me, formed in the nicest order into columns of subdivisions, and extending farther than the eye could reach, through the whole length of the street, into a common beyond; whilst their banners, held aloft by the general and his suite passed on waved triumphantly in a slight breeze, which rose with the sun. As the mounted cavalcade swept along, regiment after regiment stood at attention, with bayonets fixed and muskets shouldered, till at last it came to my turn, whose station lay at the head of the parade, to receive our chief. We did so advancing our rifles, and holding ourselves steady to the front; while the general, pulling off his hat, answered the salute with a low bow. He then addressed himself to Captain Fraser in terms of high commendation as to the appearance and steadiness of his men; spoke cheerily to the men themselves, by reminding them of the honorable post which they held; and then solemnly wishing God speed to the right and the arms of our king and country! gave the word to advance. It was answered by a hearty cheer, which rolled back like thunder from battalion to battalion; after which we struck off into three from the right of companies, and the march began.

Long before this final movement was made, every door and window in Montreal was crowded with spectators, who bade us farewell with the waving of handkerchiefs, and some of them even with tears. Doubtless there were many in this warlike group, who felt at the moment what it is to leave behind those whom they value more than life itself. For my own part, however, I experienced no such sensation. My acquaintance extended no farther than to the family where I had been accidentally billeted, and from whom, to say the truth, I had received no particular marks of attention; so I replied to the salutations of the people with the most perfect indifference and moved on. In a few moments all thought of them and of the city was laid aside. I looked forward only to the great events in which I was about to be an actor; and my whole soul became occupied with anticipations as groundless as the rest of you, gentlemen, I do not doubt, cherished at the commencement of your career.

The spring of 1777 chanced to be remarkably inclement, even in this naturally inclement climate. Much heavy hard rain had fallen, which, cutting up the half formed road that communicated between Montreal and Fort St. John, rendered our journey not only toilsome, but extremely tardy. It is true that every possible exertion had been used to remedy this evil, strong working parties having been long employed in improving the old path, and cutting out a new one; but their efforts had failed in rendering the way practicable for heavy carriages, and even the infantry experienced no little inconvenience in traversing it. Under these circumstances, it was judged necessary to divide our force; and to send the artillery, with the commissariat and hospital stores, under a competent escort from Quebec,—whilst we alone pushed across from Montreal by land, with directions to meet at a certain point near the southern extremity of Lake Champlain.

At the period to which my present narrative refers, there was nothing particularly interesting in the general appearance of the country which separates Montreal from the banks of the Chamblé. For a while we advanced through the heart of an immense prairie, whose sandy surface was in many places left bare, and in others covered with huge patches of long dry grass; till by degrees the prairie gave place to stunted thickets, as these again were succeeded by a wide spreading forest of tall trees and impervious underwood. The case was somewhat different, when, passing the forest, we began to face the stream, and took our toilsome journey in the direction of Lake Champlain. At first, indeed, a broad and placid river, hedged in by low flat banks, covered, like the country beyond them, with majestic oaks, was all that marked the change; but as we drew nearer and nearer to its source, the character of the stream varied, and the scenery assumed at every step more and more of the bearing of a Highland landscape. First the Narrows, about half way between Fort St. John and the mouth of the South river, drew powerfully upon the admiration of the stranger,—where the level banks gradually swelled into hillocks, and became at last little else than abrupt precipices,—and where the water, hemmed in by these rugged barriers, roared and fretted over its bed with the noise of a cataract. These passed, the eye was again delighted with a broad expanse, which, in its turn, led only to rapids and broken falls; till at last, on nearing the point where it rushes from its gigantic prison, a scene of indescribable sublimity burst upon us. Before us lay the waters of Lake Champlain, an enormous sheet of unruiled glass, stretching away some ninety or a hundred miles to the south, and widening and straitening as rocks and cliffs projected, in the most fantastic shapes, into its channel. Nor is the scene, like that beside Lake Erie or Ontario, rendered desolate by the very extent of water embraced in it. Though measuring, as I have already said, full a hundred miles in length, Lake Champlain no where exceeds fifteen, and in many places falls short of one mile, in breadth; whilst its bosom is beautifully diversified by islands and promontories, all of them rich with the most luxuriant vegetation and varied foliage. On each side, again, is a thick and uninhabited wilderness, now rising up into mountain, now falling down into glen: where the lorkly oak mingles with the chestnut and the pine, and shrubs of every hue and form are abundant; while a noble background is presented towards the west by the Green Mountains, whose summits appear to pierce even into the clouds. I cannot by any powers of language do justice to such a scene, which to be understood must be looked upon; far less can I describe the emotions which it excited in me, on the day when I first beheld it.

* Mr. Gleig, for his facts and dates in the following narrative, has no doubt been indebted to General Burgoyne's "State of the Expedition from Canada," and to the "Letters and Memoirs relating to the war of American Independence, and the capture of the German troops at Saratoga, by Madame de Reidesel," a translation of which from the German appeared in New York in 1827. It is rather an interesting book, and perhaps the only journal of the period from a female pen. We have added a few notes illustrative of the text. This story differently treated, would properly form part of a work yet to be written, under the title of "Romance of History, America," for which ample materials exist both in the north and southern continents.—Ed.

I have said that throughout the whole of our journey we found the roads extremely bad, and that the march was in consequence performed, not only with great fatigue, but slowly. From the hour of our arrival at the Narrows, a series of difficulties came in our way, which it required all the patience and zeal of men and officers to meet and overcome. For the space of many miles, not only were the batteaux rendered useless, as a means of conveying the stores and guns; but both stores and vessels were necessarily dragged to the shore, and carried, by the land column, beyond the influence of the easterly wind. This fell heavily upon persons who, as is usual at the outset of an undertaking, were less able to cope with difficulties than after experience had taught them to disregard them: and it was the more burthensome at present, because, through a distressing deficiency in horses, the men were compelled to perform tasks, upon which neither they nor their officers had been led to calculate. Nevertheless, every thing was done, if not without a murmur, at all events in perfect good humour; and we were rewarded for our exertions, by beholding the flotilla move in majestic order up the lake.

The place of rendezvous fixed upon by General Burgoyne was the left bank of the river Bonquet, a small stream which rising in the Green Mountains, falls into the lake at no great distance from Crown Point. The head of the column reached it on the 15th, having performed a march of upwards of ninety miles in ten days; and by the 26th, the rear was well closed up, and all the barges and vessels of war and transport were at anchor. Here tents, with other conveniences, such as blankets, kettles, and culinary utensils of various kinds, were served out; and here, for the first time since quitting Montreal, was a regular encampment formed. And seldom has an army halted in a position more favourable. We occupied a beautiful valley, surrounded on three sides by gentle hills, and on the fourth by the lake, sufficiently clear to allow of pasturage for our animals, yet wooded, so as to screen us from the rays of a summer's sun; whilst, our outposts stretching along the heights, which, in case of need, were marked out as the battle ground, every feeling of apprehension on the score of an attack was prevented.

You are, doubtless, aware that General Burgoyne took up his present ground, not so much with a view of refreshing his troops, as to make his final arrangements with certain Indian tribes, for whose assistance in the projected inroad he had already applied. Having appointed this spot as the proper point of conference, he was met, immediately on his arrival, by a runner, who informed him, that the Chiefs of the Five Nations, with a formidable body of warriors, were encamped in the hills, and ready to receive him. The general made no hesitation as to complying with the proposition of these chiefs: he appointed the 21st as the day of meeting; and he set out at an early hour, attended by most of his principal officers, under an escort of certain light companies, to keep his appointment.

As Fraser's riflemen were so fortunate as to compose part of the force employed on this occasion, I had an opportunity of being an eye witness to the ceremonies which ensued; and extremely curious as well as interesting they proved to be. After a short march of about half a mile, in a direction towards the source of the Bonquet, we arrived at a sort of glade, or woody ravine, in which a band of four hundred warriors were assembled, their tents or wigwags being but partially concealed along the side of a sloping eminence in the rear. Nothing could exceed the grotesque but striking appearance which that extraordinary group presented. As we entered the valley at the lower end, the assembly, which occupied the opposite extremity, gradually opened upon us, and we beheld them seated cross-legged, and in profound silence, except three or four chiefs, who alone stood upright. Having advanced within a short distance of them, the escort halted, when the general proceeded alone towards the front, and made the sign of peace, by raising his hands in the air, and then laying them on his bosom. The chiefs immediately acknowledged the salutation, approached him, knelt down, and kissed his hand in token both of amity and submission. He was then invited to sit, the chiefs seating themselves near him; and for some moments all were again silent.

Whilst these ceremonies were passing between the leaders of the two hosts, both the warriors and the general's escort maintained an attitude of perfect indifference and self-possession. The former appeared, indeed, to take no interest whatever in matters which were well known to have occupied long and painfully their whole thoughts; but when the interpreter arose, and gave notice that the English chief was about to speak, they drew gradually round him, and listened with the deepest attention. You might have heard a pin drop at every interval in a discourse which assured this savage throng of the esteem and protection of their Great Father; and when the conditions on which their services would be accepted and rewarded, came to be explained, their very breathing seemed repressed, lest the most minute syllable should escape them. It was not, however, in accordance with their dispositions or fancies to be told that all bloodshed, except in fair fight, was prohibited; and that he who took the scalp of a woman or a child, or put to death a prisoner who had once submitted, would receive, not reward, but the most summary punishment. A gloomy silence, interrupted only by an occasional low growl, followed the conclusion of this portion of the address; indeed, it appeared as if the very purpose for which the assembly had been called together was about to be defeated. But at last an old chief, whom we observed whispering, for some time, first to one and then to another of the warriors near him, stood up, and spoke with extreme vehemence of manner, as follows:

"I stand up in the name of all the nations present, to assure our father that we have attentively listened to his discourse. We receive you as our father, because, when you speak, we hear the voice of our Great Father beyond the great lake. We rejoice in the approbation you have expressed of our behaviour. We have been tried and tempted by the Bostonians; but we have loved our father, and our hatchets have been sharpened. In proof of the sincerity of our professions, our whole villages, able to go to war, are come forth. The old and infirm, our infants and squaws, alone remain at home. With one common assent we promise a constant obedience to all you may order; and may the Father of days give you many, and success!"

This brief address was received on our parts with expressions of satisfaction,—by the Indians with a murmur of approval; after which the congress, as it was called, breaking up, we returned, as we had come forth, to the camp.

CHAPTER II.

Nothing particularly worthy of being mentioned occurred from this date, up to the arrival of the last day in June. It is true that on the morning after the palaver, the whole army with its Indian allies moved forward; but the movement carried us no further than to Crown Point, about thirty miles in advance of the Bonquet, and half that distance from Ticonderoga. Here the tents were again pitched; and here, for something more than a week, we enjoyed as much of relaxation and social amusement, as men in our circumstances could desire. I say social amusement, for seldom has an army, in progress towards the heart of an enemy's country, marched as we marched on that occasion. Among our camp followers were ladies of all ranks and descriptions, the wives of generals, and officers in command of regiments, as well as of subalterns and privates, who, being abundantly supplied with the means of conveyance, travelled with their children, servants, and household stuff in their train. The consequence was, that but a short space apart from the tents of the men, stood the marquises of the Baroness Reidesdel, the Lady Harriet Ackland, with many others, who made it their business to receive, as often as circumstances would allow, crowds of visitors to their evening parties. You may smile, gentlemen, if you please, at this account, but I assure you that it is strictly true; and though I dare say the animals required to convey these ladies and their attendances, might have been employed more beneficially for the good of the service, heaven forbid that even now I should raise my voice against them! I have spent few evenings more pleasantly, than I spent under their hospitable canvass, in the position of Crown Point.

It was not, however, in such occupations as these, that General Burgoyne expended the whole of these eight days. He carefully matured his plans, established depots and magazines, reviewed his army, and distributed it as follows:

The entire force, numbering, as I have already stated, something more than seven thousand men, was divided into five corps or columns, one of which received the appellation of the advance, another of the reserve, and the remaining three of brigades. The advance, to which our company was attached, consisted of the British light infantry and grenadiers, the 24th regiment, the Indians, placed particularly under Captain Fraser's orders, a body of Canadians, and ten pieces of light cannon. It was led by Brigadier General Fraser, an officer of great promise and high character, and mustered in all about fifteen hundred men. The reserve, under Lieutenant Colonel Breyman, was composed of Germans, namely, of the Brunswick Chasseurs, a remarkably fine battalion, and the grenadiers and light companies of the other regiments. Of the composition of the three brigades it is not necessary that I should say more, than that two of them were made up of British, one of German troops, and that they were severally commanded by Major General Phillips, Brigadier General Hamilton, and Major General Reidesdel. The latter had under his orders a regiment of German dragoons; but they were not mounted, there being at this time barely horses enough in camp to supply the wants of the 1,000, the general and staff officers, and to drag a slender portion of our somewhat cumbersome and overgrown artillery.

It was on a beautiful morning, the last in the month of June, that the advance, after standing the customary time under arms, began its march. As we were now in the immediate vicinity of the enemy, and knew not how soon his outposts might be fallen in with, our progress this day was at once more circumspect, and more interesting, than any which we had yet made. The Indians, supported by the Marksmen, formed the advanced patrols, and spread themselves in a disorderly, but efficient manner, over the front and flank of the column. They were armed with rifles, knives and tomahawks, and being in their war-paint, presented an appearance, which, to the eye of one unaccustomed to such spectacles, must have been extremely imposing.

We, again, sending out a few files to communicate with them, and prevent the possibility of a surprise, advanced in a compact body, about two hundred yards in their rear. Another interval, similar to that which separated the Marksmen from the Indians, now occurred, after which came the head of the Light Brigade, its guns being in the centre, between the grenadiers and light companies, and the 24th regiment. Then followed the heavy brigades in their respective orders; and the whole was covered in rear by scattered parties, similar to those which protected it in front.

Our march, though silent, proved upon the whole an extremely interesting and agreeable one. In the first place, the face of the country became at every step more and more striking, the hills assuming a rougher and bolder outline, and the wood becoming more broken and irregular; whilst the lake, along the margin of which our column moved, seemed alive with the galleys and small frigates of which our fleet was composed. In the next place, the thought of what might be impending,—the expectation of meeting at every pass an armed force prepared to defend it, caused us to look with more than ordinary interest upon surrounding objects; whilst an occasional whoop, sometimes a straggling shot, sounding through the woods, kept up to its highest pitch the anxiety of those who heard it. All these combinations of sight and sound struck forcibly upon the imaginations of men to whom such things were new: nor was their power diminished when an aide-de-camp riding up, gave directions for the leading files to turn to the right, and prepare for immediate action. There was an excitement in the very word which caused the blood to rush back to its fountain, and the colour to forsake the cheeks even of the bravest, for a moment; but it was destined to lead to nothing. The detachment which we expected to engage, fell back as soon as our Indians showed themselves, and that night we bivouacked in quiet at Three Mile Point.

Ticonderoga, the place against which our first operations were directed, stands upon a peninsula or point of land, which is washed on one side by Lake Champlain, on another by Lake George, and on a third by the confidence of the latter lake with the South river. The front of this position, as they occupied by the enemy, lay between Lakes George and Champlain, bending round in a sort of semicircle; the whole of which was covered with redoubts, batteries, traverses, and abatis; its left was appurged by three block houses, and some fortified mills; its right by two block houses and a battery, which looked towards Lake Champlain. Across the lake, and communicating by means of a flying bridge with the main position, stood Mount Independence, its summit strongly fortified, and well supplied with artillery; whilst along its base ran rows of abatis, with here and there a ditch, and breastwork for infantry. To protect the bridge, again, the enemy had constructed a boom, composed of large pieces of timber well secured together, and riveted with bolts of iron; and the boom was, in its turn, covered by a double iron chain, the links of which measured an inch and a half in diameter. On the whole, the post was at once a vitally important and exceedingly formidable one; and as it was understood to be well manned, and amply supplied with all manner of stores and provisions, there were few amongst us who anticipated any other result besides a protracted and desperate resistance.

With such a prospect before us, it is scarcely necessary to say, that the night of the first of July was, to many, one of the deepest interest and most intense anxiety. We had halted, just before dark, on an eminence, barely three miles from the enemy's position; and the blaze of their fires became, as night drew on, distinctly visible. We saw them stretching far and wide in long and formidable array; now shining clear and bright on the brow of a bare hill, now sending up a dark red mass of vapour from among trees and underwood in the hollows; whilst from time to time their brilliancy would disappear, as heaps of fuel were thrown on, only that it might burst forth again with increased splendour. Nor was the spectacle embraced by a glance in the opposite direction less striking or less warlike. There lay our own army in two magnificent lines, part occupying this side, part the opposite side of the lake; whilst the Royal George and Infelixible frigates, with a swarm of gun boats and luggers, kept up the communication; and the very extent of these seemed to convey an assurance that we exceeded the enemy in numbers, no less than we knew that we surpassed them in the quality and constitution of our troops. But it was not by looking to generals alone, that a tyro like myself found his courage involuntarily increased. Around me were crowds of hardy veterans, whose free and merry chat, their careless laugh and lively repartee, could not be listened to by any one without emotion; since it was impossible not to believe that they were thus light-hearted, because they entertained not the shadow of a misgiving as to the result. I need not describe to men who have breathed the atmosphere of a bivouac, the effect which these sights and sounds produced. Even upon Fraser, cool and deliberative as he was, they were not without their influence. They stirred up in him numerous warlike associations, bringing the events of other days vividly to his remembrance; and never had story-teller a more willing auditor than I proved when he began their recital. Thus, in listening to his accounts of former bivouacs, which he occasionally interrupted as the wild notes of the soldiers' songs rose high, I passed the better portion of that night; nor did I so much as lie down till long after he had ceased to speak, and the majority of the army were fast asleep.

It was still dark, when a general stir among the troops put an end to my slumbers. I started up, and found that our people were already forming, though, whether as a measure of mere precaution, or as a preparation for an attack, no one appeared to know. Like the rest, I seized my arms, and hurried to my post; but hour after hour stole on, without bringing matters to an issue, and when day had fully dawned, we were still stationary. At last an order arrived for the men to pile their arms, and prepare breakfast; and it was surmised at once, that on this day at least, no attempt would be made upon the enemy's entrenchments.

Though disappointed in no trifling degree at the tenor of these instructions, we lost no time in carrying them implicitly into effect. We addressed ourselves to the office of cooking, and a hearty meal came not the less acceptably on account of the regret which we could not but experience that our moments should be wasted at a juncture so critical. This was barely finished, and Fraser and myself were preparing to pass the day as men are accustomed to spend their time in camp during a season of temporary rest, when a dense smoke suddenly rising from the left of the enemy's position, arrested our attention. An alarm spread that our opponents were moving; and the bugles sounding to arms, the troops were accoutred and in order of march in five minutes. By and by, an Indian was seen at full speed hastening from the outposts, who paused only to ascertain where General Borgeyne was to be found, and then hurried on, without so much as dropping a hint touching the cause of his abrupt arrival. As a matter of course, these occurrences happening thus closely the one upon the other, stirred up in us a confident expectation of immediate service; nor were we deceived. The Indian had not passed ten minutes, when an aide-de-camp made his appearance on the ground, with orders for Fraser's Marksmen and the red warriors to move briskly to the left, and the rest of the brigade to advance at the same moment more slowly and steadily to the front. The Americans, it appeared, having set fire to their block house, and abandoned the saw mills, were concentrating upon their main position; to prevent which, by cutting off the corps in retrogression, was the design of our present movement.

Not a moment was lost in carrying these orders into execution. Whilst the main body, in compact and imposing array, took the road to Mount Hope; the marksmen, with their savage allies, filed to the left, and were soon concealed from the observation both of friends and foes, in a deep forest. But we were guided by a savage, to whom every foot of ground in this country was familiar. He led us through a winding gully round the base of the very hill from which the enemy's column was ascertained to be descending, and brought us to a point of all others the best suited for the particular object which we desired to attain. It was a thick copse skirting the open path which communicated between the saw mills and the lines, and by which the garrison of the former must of necessity pass, in order to effect a junction with their comrades.

We lay here perhaps a quarter of an hour, when the scouts who had been extended to the right, in order to give notice of the enemy's movements, came in with intelligence that they were approaching. Every man was instantly on the qui vive, and with the exception of a ticking of gun locks, not a sound could be heard from one flank of the ambuscade to the other. We now listened, with what feelings I leave you to judge, for the tread of feet; nor did any great space of time elapse ere it became audible. It was easily ascertained, likewise, from the cadence of the march, that a considerable body of men were near us, and that they were pursuing their journey, rapidly indeed, but apparently in little order, and altogether unsuspecting of danger. All this was as it was desired to be. The great end to be obtained by us, was to permit the enemy's line of march to come so completely in contact with us, that every shot thrown in upon their flank would tell; and had this been done, there is little probability that a man of the detached corps would have escaped. But, strange to say, the Indians, on other occasions so noted for patience, ruined all by precipitancy. The head of the enemy's column was yet a full hundred yards from our ambuscade, when several of the red warriors fired. Their example was instantly followed by the whole body, who threw away their ammunition for no purpose, and then springing forward with hideous yells, rushed hither and thither towards the enemy. The latter, who had halted and begun to form as soon as the first shots alarmed them, now broke and fled in all directions; and though we, as well as the Indians, pursued with all our might, they easily contrived to outstrip us. Scarcely a dozen men fell under the scattering fire which was kept up upon them; and the remainder escaped, by twos and threes, within their lines.

Nothing could exceed the chagrin and mortification experienced by our gallant leader on this occasion,—a feeling in which his company, one and all, deeply shared. Our plans had been digested with so much care, and matters had, up to the last moment, proceeded so happily, that we laid our account with a victory, not more easy of attainment than important in its results. Our disappointment was, in consequence, the greater, when the miserable issue became certain; nor was it possible to hinder the men from expressing themselves in terms which were far from proving satisfactory to the haughty savages. From that time, it may be said that all cordiality between us and the Indians ceased. The latter followed us, indeed, in the hope of plunder, and because they regarded us as the more powerful of the belligerent parties; but they were no longer allies on whom it would have been prudent to depend in case of any serious difficulties or reverses. Nevertheless, the reconnaissance, generally, was not without its advantages. Fraser's and Phillips's corps possessed themselves of Mount Hope, a point from which a commanding view could be obtained over the whole chain of the enemy's works; and here we passed the night, as we had done the preceding, in bivouac round our fires.

Little occurred during the two following days worthy of particular notice. The enemy having turned a battery of four pieces towards the ground of our encampment, kept up a ceaseless cannonade, from which no loss, and very little uneasiness was experienced; whilst on our parts the greatest exertions were made to bring up guns, stores, baggage, and provisions. But with the exception of a trifling skirmish or two of no moment, at the outposts, all remained, as far as we were concerned, profoundly quiet. But decisive measures were nevertheless in progress, and steps were quietly but surely taken, to render the lines of Ticonderoga untenable.

On the south side of the communication between Lakes George and Champlain, stands a bold and rocky mountain, called Mount Defiance, which completely commands and overlooks both the Fort of Ticonderoga, and the line of entrenchments which leant upon it. How the enemy came to neglect this height I know not, unless indeed the abruptness of its ascent led them to suppose that it would be impracticable to drag cannon to its summit, and hence that its occupation by us would either not be attempted, or if attempted would produce no useful consequences. If such was really their expectation, nothing could be more groundless; for the hill being seized in the night by a party of light infantry, long before dawn some pieces of heavy artillery were at its base, and the most active preparations were immediately made for transporting them, with a due supply of ammunition, to the summit. But for the latter operation there was no need. The enemy no sooner observed that we had established a post there, than the perils of their situation became manifest to them, and their future directions were directed exclusively to secure a speedy and safe retreat.

On the night of the 5th of July, it fell to the lot of Fraser's Marksmen to be put in charge of a picket. The proximity of our post, which lay about half-way down the steep, and on that side of the hill which commands a view of Ticonderoga, enabled us to ascertain with perfect accuracy all that was passing within the lines. Not a movement was made, nor a word spoken, which our advanced sentries failed to detect; and as we had been particularly cautioned to keep our senses fully on the alert, there was no lack of attention on the part either of men or officers. For some hours after sunset all things went on as they had been in the habit of proceeding during many evenings before. The American videttes took their customary stations upon the rampart, and a patrol pushed out from time to time, felt its way, as it had previously done, as far as the challenge of our people permitted. In like manner we stole forward at intervals, so as to look down into the ditch; and except when an occasional shot told that one or other of these reconnoitring parties had been discovered, nothing took place calculated to draw our thoughts out of their ordinary channel. But things were destined not to continue thus for ever. Midnight must have been close at hand when a change took place in the order of affairs; and our vigilance, which had begun in some degree to relax, was again called into full exercise.

The moon, which, during the early part of the night, shed a feeble glimmer abroad, sank beneath the horizon, and its setting was followed by an exceedingly thick darkness. No stars could be distinguished, for there was a sort of fog hanging in the atmosphere which completely shrouded them, though it gave no indication of rain or stormy weather: when there arose all at once from the interior of the fort and lines a clamour of voices, as if thousands of persons were anxious to give, and none willing to receive instructions. This was followed by a sudden smothering up of the fires, which had hitherto shrouded redly and gloomily; and then a confused tread of feet, like that of men hurrying to and fro in confusion, became distinctly audible. As we were fully aware of the great importance of Mount Defiance as well to the enemy as to ourselves, the idea naturally occurred that a sortie was about to be made; and we stood to our arms in the firm expectation that in a few moments more we should be engaged. But after listening with intense anxiety a full hour, during which time not a shot nor a challenge gave warning of advancing columns, that suspicion gradually yielded to another, and we began to calculate upon the very manoeuvre which General St. Clair was performing. Information was accordingly sent to General Fraser's head quarters, and we held ourselves in readiness to act in any manner which he might point out.

Whilst the rest of the company remained in an attitude of defence, I took with me a single trusty companion, and stole forward with the view of penetrating, if possible, within the enemy's works, and of ascertaining by personal observation the object of this commotion. The darkness favoured us greatly, and we found, on reaching the crest of the glacis, that the sentinels, more attentive to what was passing among their friends than their enemies, paid no heed whatever to us or our movements. We accordingly descended, unnoticed, into the ditch, and turning to the right groped our way along, till a palisade friezed at the top, arrested us. With some difficulty we scrambled over it; after which we found ourselves in a covered way leading from one of the more advanced works into the body of the place, and beheld a large portion of the American army formed beside their fires, at the distance of some twenty or thirty paces from the spot where we were standing. Fortunately for us, these men were too busy to overhear the noise which we had made in passing the palisade; and though the light of their fires rendered them visible to us, we, who kept in the shade, remained concealed. We instantly crouched down upon our bellies, and creeping close to the parapet, lay at length under its shadow, where we could overhear distinctly every word that was spoken, and yet ran little risk of detection.

A few minutes sufficed to complete what now proved to be the preparatory arrangement of the parade,—when a mounted officer giving the word "March," the enemy's column advanced, to our great horror, along the covered way. They moved, however, in the strictest order, and in profound silence, no man apparently looking either to his right or left; and two entire battalions filed past, within three feet of us, without discovering that we were there. How my comrade felt during this tremendous interval I know not, but I confess that with me physical alarm far outweighed every other emotion; and that I did not even attempt to ascertain the numbers or quality of the troops which passed me thus closely. On the contrary, I lay flat upon my face, keeping my mouth close to the ground, lest my breathing, or the violent beating of my heart, should betray me; nor was it till the receding noise of footsteps assured me of danger past, that I took courage to look round. That glance, however, proved abundantly satisfactory. It informed me that the army was gone, that the fort and lines were entirely evacuated, and that the enemy, from whom we anticipated a resistance so desperate, were in full retreat. With feelings of the liveliest satisfaction we hastened back to our post in order to report this very unlooked-for event to our commander; and in two hours after, the whole British army was roused, and a vigorous pursuit began.

CHAPTER III.

General Burgoyne, who had passed the night on board of one of the frigates, was no sooner informed of the enemy's flight, than he made dispositions to follow them up with the greatest vigour. The fleet immediately weighed anchor, and bearing down with irresistible impetuosity upon the boom, destroyed, in the course of two hours, a barrier which it had occupied almost as many weeks to construct. This done, and a considerable body of troops embarked, all sail was set in pursuit of the American flotilla, of which, long before evening, our brave seamen gave, to use their own phraseology, an excellent account. They overtook their opponents moored, and perfectly ignorant of their danger, beside the wharf at Skeneborough; and though they failed in making many prisoners, every galley and bateau was either captured or destroyed.

In the mean while our brigade followed, at an interval somewhat too great, by that of General Reidesdel, crossed Lake Champlain, and commenced a rapid pursuit after the enemy's land column, which was ascertained to have fallen back on the road to Hubbardton. No great while elapsed ere the marksmen and Indians, of whom the advanced guard was composed, overtook the rear of the flying enemy, when a broken and desultory, but not very destructive skirmish, began. But though interesting enough to witness, the skirmish led to no important results; for the country was thick and encumbered, the enemy quick in their movements, and our people, worn out with a night of watching, began before long to exhibit symptoms of fatigue. Besides, we were far ahead of all support, even the rest of the brigade being many miles behind us; and hence, whatever advantages we might happen to obtain, could not, for want of physical force, be turned to account. Our leader, under these circumstances, determined, after driving in the rear of the Americans upon their main body, to halt; and this he accordingly did in a grove not far from Castletown; where our people, after refreshing themselves from the contents of their haversacks, lay down, and slept soundly for about two hours.

Whilst we were thus employed, General Reidesdel, with his brigade, came up, and a sort of council of war was immediately held between him and our brigadier. The latter, having ascertained that the enemy's rear guard was in force, and that it lay considerably apart from the main body, being only three leagues ahead of our present position, suggested the possibility of cutting it off; and proposed for that purpose to resume his march, so that he might pass the night in the immediate presence of the Americans. By this means he hoped to take them by surprise on the first return of light; and he entertained no doubt, in case this could be done, of obtaining an easy victory. General Reidesdel, though naturally cautious, offered no objection to the measure; our people were accordingly roused about an hour before sunset, and we once more advanced with great caution and in good order. Every thing was conducted with the happiest success. No scouts or flying parties met us, and we bivouacked that night within three miles of the American pickets, which entertained not the slightest suspicion that we had passed Castletown. I need not add, that strenuous exertions were used to hinder the intelligence of our approach from reaching them. No fires were lighted, nor did any man dream of wandering beyond the ground of the bivouac; indeed, the sentries received strict orders not to permit any individual, no matter what his rank or occupation might be, to pass their chain either to the front or rear. All parties obeyed these instructions with the most exact fidelity, and the success of the morrow's operations served amply to recompense the corps for the privations to which this temporary confinement subjected them.

It was yet perfectly dark, when the word to rise and fall in, passed quietly from man to man, put an end to our repose. It was obeyed in profound silence; and in silence equally profound, our little column pushed forward. We followed a sort of rude path through the heart of a forest, which seemed to have been lately cut, and led to the point where the roads from Skeneborough to Hubbardton and Castletown in the New Hampshire Grants diverge. It was here that we came in sight of the American outposts. They occupied the ridge of a steep hill, sending down their sentries almost to its base; and though it was very evident, from the bustle which pervaded them, that our arrival had not been anticipated, they nevertheless stood to their arms like men, and made ready to receive us.

To dislodge them from the high ground, and take possession of it ourselves, was the work of a moment. Not a shot, indeed, was fired on our side, in bringing this about; nor did the enemy pause for more than a single discharge, when, setting the orders and remonstrances of their officers at defiance, they broke, and fled with precipitation down the opposite slope. There they joined the main body, which, we were given to understand, fell not short of fifteen hundred men; and which, under the orders of a gallant soldier, Colonel Francis, was already in order either to receive or give an attack.

For a moment or two after our little column crowned the ridge, there was a sort of pause, during which the hostile leaders mutually reconnoitred the force and dispositions of the enemy. It was sufficient to satisfy both of the steps which it behoved them to follow, and it was not needlessly protracted. There was a commanding hill on the left, which, to both parties, presented peculiar advantages, and General Fraser instantly resolved to occupy it. For this purpose, Fraser's marksmen were directed to move off in double quick time—an order which was promptly obeyed; but we were yet half way from the summit, when an American detachment showed itself pushing for the same point, and ascending by one side, as we mounted the other. The enemy crowned the hill before us, and saluting us as we drew near, with a sharp volley, seemed resolute to maintain it. But their resolution soon gave way. Raising a cheer, we rushed forward, firing in files as we proceeded; upon which the enemy first wavered, then fell back, and finally fled in confusion. We gave them no time to rally, but, rushing down the declivity in pursuit, found ourselves in a few moments warmly engaged with a force, which, at the most moderate calculation, doubled us in numbers.

The Americans felt their superiority, and being well led on by a very brave soldier, they stood their ground nobly. Declining a little to their right, they soon outflanked us, and poured in so heavy a fire from behind certain logs and fallen trees, that the Indians gave way, and we ourselves were compelled, after losing several of our comrades, to yield ground. But at this moment, two companies of grenadiers scrambling up the steep face of Mount Pittsford, unexpectedly showed themselves upon our left; when the enemy were again checked, again wavered, and appeared on the point of giving way. Colonel Francis, however, was too well aware of the importance of this height lightly to abandon it. He brought up fresh troops, giving them courage and confidence by his example; and, rallying the fugitives round him, renewed the contest with obstinate valour. The firing now extended on both sides from right to left of the line, both parties fighting, as the nature of the country required, à la tirailleur; but there was this marked difference between them, that the American skirmishers were animated by seeing their support at hand, whereas, we were far in advance of ours, and knew not when it might arrive. Happily, however, it was not very distant. General Reidesdel had heard the firing, and pressed on with the head of his column; and he brought up about two hundred men at a moment when they were sorely needed; these no sooner showed themselves than a panic seized the Americans, who broke and fled in all directions. Nothing could exceed the gallantry of Colonel Francis at this juncture. He rode from rank to rank, and from man to man, seizing some by the collar, striking others with the flat of his sword, and cheering, and doing his utmost to arrest the flight; nor is it by any means impossible, considering the great superiority of the enemy's numbers, that even now his efforts might have insured the victory. But just as he had succeeded in rallying a few companies, and was advancing boldly at their head, a bullet struck him in the throat, and he fell lifeless from his horse. The Americans scarcely paused to look upon him as he lay. Diving into the recesses of the forest, they were soon beyond the reach of any other than a scattered and disorderly pursuit.

Our loss in this affair was not great, and the facility with which a half brigade, mustering in all no more than eight hundred and fifty men, had driven a very superior force from a position of great strength and difficulty, served not a little to increase the confidence which all of us experienced, both in ourselves and in our leaders. We assembled upon the field in that state of excitement, which invariably affects men after an affair in which they have been victorious, and prepared to push forward whithersoever the general might direct; but the last glimmer of light having already expired, and the troops suffering severely from fatigue and inanition, it was not judged prudent to advance far beyond the ground which we had won. A bivouac was accordingly formed in front of the position lately occupied by the enemy, where our little corps was soon joined by the rest of the German brigade; and here, after burying the dead, arranging the pickets, and regaling ourselves upon such provision as still remained in our haversacks, we passed an extremely agreeable and quiet night.—I need not say that our slumbers were thoroughly unbroken.

Long before dawn on the morning of the 8th, our little column was again under arms; and having waited only till there was light enough to guide our steps, the march, in the direction of Skeneborough, was resumed. This was certainly not one of the many pleasant days which it has been my good fortune to pass in the service. When we first fell in, the heavens were black with clouds; and the movement had scarcely commenced, ere the rain began to descend with a degree of violence, such as in England, at least, cannot be conceived. It was not so much a shower, as a sheet of water, which came as if a river had been diverted from its course, and was falling over some broken bank; inasmuch that in five minutes there was not a man in the whole corps whose garments were not thoroughly saturated. Nevertheless we pushed on, if not with our usual cheerfulness, at all events without repining, and came in without the occurrence of a single adventure, soon after noon, to Skeensborough. It was a large and thriving village, well situated at the extremity of Lake Champlain, at the head of Wood Creek, and near the confluence of the South and East rivers; and could boast even then of a tolerable wharf, beside which was moored the whole of our flotilla, whilst the head quarters of the army were established in the town itself. I need scarcely add, that we found all classes of persons here in the highest imaginable spirits. The fleet and army, though acting independently of one another—the latter, indeed, in numerous petty detachments, and as it were in detail—had proved victorious every where; and of the good effects of victory at the outset of a campaign, every one acquainted with such matters must be aware. There was not a man attached to the expedition who appeared to doubt as to its ultimate success, or desired any thing further than permission to press forward without a moment's delay. Unfortunately, however, the general saw, or imagined obstacles, such as to hinder his immediate indulgence of that gallant longing. The detached parties being called in, a second review took place, after which we were formally placed in position; and from that hour our privations, as well as evil fortune, may be said to have had their commencement.

By this new arrangement the main body of the army found itself placed in line along the heights of Skeensborough, with its left upon Wood Creek, and its right on a rugged mountain. To protect it from any thing like surprise, as well as to secure water carriage in all directions, flying corps were at the same time established at various points—one upon the Castletown road, another upon the roads to Putney and Rutland, and a third in communication between East river and Castletown. This done, strong working parties were sent out day after day, for the purpose of removing such obstacles as the enemy had thrown in the way of our farther progress. I need scarcely remind you, that forty years ago British armies moved rather more according to rule than they do at present, and that the possibility of undertaking any thing until magazines had been established, was rarely, if ever admitted. In the true spirit of these tactics, it was no sooner discovered that the enemy, by sinking stones and logs of wood in the channel of Wood Creek, had rendered the navigation difficult, except to the lightest bateaux, than the whole army was employed in weighing them; and as we were miserably supplied with the implements necessary for such operations, our progress was at once very slow and very painful. Then again, though the greater portion of the summer was yet before us, and the country abounded with wood and other natural cover, it was deemed totally irregular to move without tents; and as these had all been left behind at Ticonderoga, much precious time was expended in bringing them up. The consequence of all this was, first, that the enemy were enabled to collect their scattered columns, to cut up the roads in our front, and mature their plans for defence; and secondly, that the ardour of our own people, which, had proper advantage been taken of it, would have overcome all difficulties, was allowed to evaporate. Though we reached Skeensborough on the 9th, the end of June was at hand ere we quitted it, and the 30th found us only at Fort Edward: twenty days having been expended in traversing twenty miles of road, which the labour of our own hands had constructed.

It is not worth while to offer any lengthened detail of our proceedings for some time after we had reached that fort. They resembled in most particulars those which marked our previous progress; for the enemy having retreated to Saratoga, on the other side of the river, the faint hope which had been nourished of bringing them to action disappeared. Let it suffice to pronounce these melancholy words—We halted. True, our provisions were short,—how could they be otherwise, with an army which marched at the rate of only one mile per day?—and our chief could not go on till he had collected supplies sufficient to ensure him against all risk of starving; but the halt was the reverse of a season of rest to the unfortunate troops, who were more than ever oppressed in bringing up stores, which, had common diligence been used, would not have been needed. Not a day passed which saw not whole brigades executing the offices of baggage animals, carrying by manual labour stores which were consumed as fast as brought up, and wasting their strength for no purpose. But there is as little satisfaction in reporting such transactions, as in listening to the report when made. Let me therefore avail myself of this leisure to state to you more fully than I have yet done, the general plan of the campaign in which we were now embarked.

The great object which General Burgoyne sought to obtain was to force his way down the course of the Hudson, and rallying round him, as he proceeded, as many loyalists as chose to follow his fortunes, to effect a junction with the army of General Howe, then blockaded in New York. To facilitate this measure, by distracting the attention of the enemy, a smaller expedition, under the orders of Colonel St. Leger, had been organised, which, moving through the western part of Chester County, threatened Fort Stanwix, a rudely fortified station upon the Mohawk. Colonel St. Leger's force was extremely weak, particularly in troops of the line,—of which no more than four hundred, and those composed of detachments from different regiments, served under him; and the whole, including Provincials, Canadians, and some hundreds of Indians, barely came up to twelve hundred men. He pushed forward, however, with diligence, and on the 3d of August invested the fortress, sending intelligence at the same time to the general in chief of his situation; and in two days afterwards he had the good fortune to surprise and cut to pieces a body of eight hundred Americans, when on their march to relieve the garrison. So far all things had succeeded according to our wish; but Colonel St. Leger gradually found, that in the expectations which he had been led to form respecting the loyalty of the inhabitants of the invaded district, the grossest impositions had been practised on him. Instead of crowds of volunteers, scarcely an individual came to his camp; and of the few who did come, it was more than suspected, that by far the greater proportion came with a treacherous intention.

That these advantages, trifling as they were, might not be wholly wasted, it became incumbent on General Burgoyne to advance without delay,—whilst the deplorable deficiency in the means of transport under which he laboured, seemed to render all attempts at moving the army fruitless. Though our troops had toiled without intermission during three whole weeks, there was in camp no greater stock of provisions than promised to suffice for four days' consumption; and to move forward with a supply so slender, into a desert country, appeared to a leader of the old school little better than insanity. I have called it a desert country, not only with reference to its natural sterility,—and Heaven knows it was sterile enough,—but because of the pains which were taken, and unfortunately with too great success, to sweep its few cultivated spots of all articles likely to benefit the invaders. In doing this, the enemy showed no economy either to friend or foe. All the fields of standing corn were laid waste, the cattle was driven away, and every particle of grain, as well as morsel of grass, carefully removed,—so that we could depend for subsistence, both for men and horses, only upon the magazines which we might ourselves establish. But our draft animals were so inadequate to the conveyance of stores, that no magazine had as yet been formed farther in advance than Fort George; and Fort George was too much in the rear to be of service as a base of operations, after we should have quitted the position which we now occupied.

I have said that the American army retreated as we advanced, cutting up the roads, and devastating the face of the country over which they passed. They were now, according to the best accounts which we could receive, at Saratoga, a hamlet, or rather farm on the left bank of the Hudson, and about half way between Fort Edward and the Mohawk. It seemed advisable to General Burgoyne to threaten them there: for if they risked an action, he had no apprehensions as to the result; if they retired,

Colonel St. Leger would be in their rear; and should they succeed in escaping both divisions, then was the road to Albany thrown open, and the principal design of the inroad attained. Increased exertions were accordingly used to bring a flotilla from the lakes to the nearest navigable point in the river; and so unremitting were they, that before the close of the first week in August, a considerable number of boats and barges, laden with such stores as could be forwarded, were launched upon the stream, and ready to accompany the army.

Whilst these projects were in contemplation, and the above means adopted for bringing them to an issue, a piece of information was obtained at head quarters, which promised to bring about the happiest results, by relieving us at once from all the embarrassments attendant upon meagre supplies and inadequate means of transport. About twenty miles to the eastward of the Hudson, lies the obscure village of Bennington,—a cluster of poor cottages, situated in a wild country, between the forks of the Housac. Here the enemy had gathered together a considerable depot of cattle, corn, horses, and wheel carriages, most of which were drawn across the Connecticut River from the provinces of New England; and as it was understood to be guarded by a party of militia only, an attempt to surprise it seemed by no means unjustifiable. It is true that between Fort Edward and Bennington, the means of communication were exceedingly defective. One prodigious forest bottomed in swamps and morasses, covered the whole face of the country; through which, no body of men, unless familiarly accustomed to such expeditions, could hope to make their way, at all events with celerity. But the necessities of the army were pressing; the state of the campaign was a critical one; and the risk, though doubtless great, was considered by no means to outweigh the advantages to be derived from success. General Burgoyne determined to incur it; and a few hours sufficed for the final arrangement of his plan, and drawing up of his instructions.

There were attached to our little army, two hundred German dragoons; men of tried valour and enterprise, but destitute of horses. These the general selected as part of the force to be employed in the surprise of Bennington; not only because he entertained the most perfect confidence in their steadiness, but because he conceived that in the country into which they were about to penetrate, they might be able to pick up a sufficient number of horses for their own use. In addition to these, the Canadian Rangers, a detachment of Provencials, about one hundred Indians, and Captain Fraser's Marksmen, with two pieces of light cannon, were allotted to this service; and the whole, amounting to five hundred men, were placed under the orders of Lieutenant Colonel Baume. The latter officer received special instructions to proceed with extreme caution. He was particularly enjoined to keep his dragoons together, and to feel his way, foot by foot, with his light troops alone; and whilst it was broadly insinuated that he might look for recruits among the well disposed inhabitants, the greatest care was taken to impress him with the conviction, that they were not to be implicitly trusted. It would have been well both for himself and his followers, had these advices been somewhat more carefully remembered. But there was a fatality attending all our measures, which soon began to develop itself; and perhaps the fate of the present expedition ought to have been taken as a fair warning of the destiny which awaited the army at large.

CHAPTER IV.

Though all these arrangements were completed, and the troops destined to fulfil them told off so early as the beginning of August, the middle of the month was approaching ere this attempt, on the success of which so much was supposed to depend, was made. Perhaps there was no great error here, more especially as the column broke up from its bivouac, and advanced to the point where the Hudson was to be crossed. It was a toilsome and a tedious march—a little, and but a little enlivened, by a harmless skirmish, which some straggling Americans chose to maintain with our detached Indians. After enduring great privations with a spirit which failed not to the last, our army at length reached its destined resting place, and took up a position on the eastern bank of the Hudson, immediately opposite to the heights of Saratoga.

This done, and the enemy having withdrawn as far as Still Water, the general proceeded to carry into execution his projected design against Bennington. At an early hour in the morning of the 12th, our little band, unincumbered with any quantity of baggage besides that which each man could conveniently carry upon his back, set out in direction of Batten Kill, where it arrived, without meeting with any adventure, by four o'clock in the afternoon. Here we halted for the night, by which means a company of fifty chassours overtook us, whom General Burgoyne, distrustful of our strength, sent to reinforce us; but at five next morning, we were again in motion, and pushed cautiously, though with a quick pace, in the direction of Cambridge. Our journey this day proved in many respects more interesting than any which we had performed since the pursuit from Tienderoga. The country, as we advanced, exhibited greater signs of cultivation, a field or two interposing here and there amidst the plains, and a few detached cottages lying by the way side; whilst several of the country people voluntarily joined us, and took the oath of allegiance to the king. From them we learned that a company of Americans had been left in Cambridge as a guard over some cattle which were on their way to Bennington; and as it was deemed of importance to seize such, wherever they could be found, our scouts were commanded to quicken their pace, and surprise them.

I was not one of the party thus sent forward, that duty having been entrusted to thirty Provincials and fifty Indians; but the latter attained their object after a trifling skirmish, in which one man only was wounded. Nothing could be finer than the effect produced by the desultory firing which was kept up on that occasion by the retreating enemy and our pursuers. It so happened that the point where they first met, though covered with a deep and extensive forest, was not incumbered by brush wood or other dealing substances; and hence each report, as it rolled from tree to tree and glade to glade, sounded as if not one but fifty muskets had been fired. You will easily believe that the first discharge caused us to quicken our pace, and to recover our ranks, which had begun to straggle; but no opportunity was afforded us of joining. The enemy fought only to escape; and hence, when we reached Cambridge, we found it in full occupation of our advance, which had made prizes of no inconsiderable quantity of carts and wagons, as well as of cattle and horses.

The satisfaction arising from this first success was not, however, so great as to render us indifferent to the nature of the intelligence which met us there. Instead of four or five hundred men, it was accurately ascertained that not fewer than eighteen hundred were in Bennington; and though some appeared to be of opinion that they would not wait to receive us, there were others who scrupled not to foretell a widely different result. Now, in spite of our late reinforcement, our whole strength fell considerably short of six hundred men; and of these a full hundred were Indians, on whom no great reliance could be placed. Still, Colonel Baume appeared to consider his situation secure. He spoke, as far as we could understand him, in very contemptuous terms of the Americans, and busily employed himself in receiving the submission of the inhabitants, who in great numbers flocked to his standard. Unfortunately, Colonel Baume forgot the cautions which had been so strongly impressed upon him. He considered all persons sincere who professed attachment to the royal cause; allying in their presence, and without reserve, both to his own numbers and designs; and as by far the greater proportion were in reality traitors to us, every circumstance connected with our dispositions and plans became as well known to the enemy as to ourselves.

It was their leader's intention to march at once upon Bennington; for which purpose his little corps was under arms and in column, long before sunrise on the 14th. For some time our progress was, as it had hitherto been, unimpeded; but as we approached the northern branch of the Hossa, by the farm and bridge of Sankioick, the arrangements of the enemy began gradually to develop themselves.

A flying party of Americans were discovered in front of the farm, which, on the approach of our people, spread themselves along the underwood; and they were not dislodged till after a good deal of firing, which caused us some loss in several of the most forward among the savages. At last, however, they retreated, abandoning a mill which they had previously fortified, and breaking down the bridge; and long before the latter could be repaired, they were safe from farther molestation. There was a good deal to excite apprehension even in this unimportant rencontre. The Americans, though they gave way at last, fought like men conscious of their own prowess, and confident in the strength of the support which was behind them; and this, coupled with the rumours which had reached us relative to the amount of the garrison of Bennington, failed not to startle both Colonel Baume and the boldest of his troops. Besides, much time was lost by the destruction of the bridge. It required a full hour so far to repair it as to enable the guns and horses to pass; and when this was done, the day had declined so far as to render any attempt to reach the point of our destination before sunset fruitless. We accordingly bivouacked at the farm of Walmescott, about four miles from Sankioick, and three from Bennington; where the night was spent, if not in a sense of absolute security, at all events without the occurrence of any accident capable of exciting alarm.

The morning of the 15th came in with heavy rains and a perfect hurricane of wind; consequently the little column, instead of pressing forward, was fain to keep under shelter of the farm building. But it was not permitted to remain long in a situation so comfortable. Our early parade had just been dismissed, when a few shots in the direction of the advanced sentries gave notice that the Americans instead of waiting to be attacked, were on the move; and in a few minutes afterwards a general commotion at the outposts, indicated more by the shouts of the Indians than the report of their arms, warned us to make ready for an immediate attack. Colonel Baume lost no time in preparing to meet it. Forming his dismounted dragoons in close column among the homestead, he directed the Provincials, supported by Frazar's Marksmen, to advance to the assistance of the pickets, with orders to dispute every inch of ground to the utmost, and finally to retire upon the reserve, should all their efforts to maintain themselves prove ineffectual.

In an instant we were in motion, and a few minutes sufficed to bring us to the scene of action. We found our Indians threatened, rather than seriously assailed, by a considerable body of militia-men, before whom they were falling back, leisurely and in order; but such was the violence of the storm, that not one out of a dozen muskets would explode, and hence the skirmish was neither very animated nor very bloody. On seeing us, our savage allies uttered a yell, which seemed to strike panic into the bosoms of their assailants: for the latter instantly paused, hung back as it were irresolute, and finally retired. We followed for a time, briskly and impetuously; but we likewise felt the bad effects of the weather too much to seek a general engagement; and as the movements of the enemy seemed to indicate a wish on their parts to draw us on, we were of course extremely shy in trusting ourselves beyond our own limits. We accordingly halted as soon as we had recovered the ground which the savages had lost, and, lying down behind the trees, contented ourselves with watching the result during many hours, and striving as well as we could, to keep the priming of our rifles from the rain.

Whether the Americans ever entertained any serious intention of attacking this day, I cannot pretend to determine; but if they did, the state of the weather compelled them to relinquish it. Yet they ventured to advance, from time to time, in considerable numbers, as if resolved to try how far our position was tenable; and on each occasion a little firing took place; but no impression was made upon us, and the rain continuing to fall without intermission, they at last desisted from their efforts, and withdrew. Their proceedings were not, however, of a nature to be disregarded, or held in contempt, by a force so insignificant as ours. Colonel Baume immediately despatched a messenger to the rear, for the purpose of bringing up an additional corps which General Burgoyne had stationed at Batten Kill to support us; whilst he set sedulously to the task of fortifying a position in which he might await the coming up of supplies, of which he began now to be conscious that he stood in need.

The farm of Walmescott lies upon both banks of the Hossa, and consisted at this time of some six or eight log built huts, scattered here and there over the narrow expanse of cultivated ground. To the left was a height, which Colonel Baume hastened to occupy; he posted here the dragoons with a portion of the Marksmen on their right, in rear of a little zigzag breastwork, composed of logs and loose earth. Such of the detached houses as came within the compass of his position, he filled with Canadians, supporting them with detachments of chassours and grenadiers, likewise entrenched behind breastworks; and he kept the whole, with the exception of about a hundred men, on the north side of the stream, holding the woods upon his flanks, in his front and rear, by the Indians.

To complete these arrangements, and throw up the few works which were to render them efficient, occupied the entire day, and some portion of the night of the 15th; and seldom have men undergone hardships more severe than our people endured whilst thus employed. Let it be borne in mind, that the 15th was a day of continued rain; not such rain as we are accustomed to witness in this country, but an absolute torrent, to afford shelter against which human ingenuity has yet devised no covering. Under this, the men toiled on, the earth which they threw up, being repeatedly washed down again, and the holes and ditches which they dug out, filled in a moment, and so rendered worse than useless. But their patience equalled the difficulties which it was called upon to surmount. Each man felt, too, that he was labouring for his own personal safety, not less than for the benefit of the whole; and all were, in consequence, inspired with a principle of perfect heroism and self-devotion. Poor fellows! their spirit and perseverance were, on the present occasion, of little avail. They sufficed, indeed, to save their possessors from dishonour, and enabled them to sell their lives dearly; but they were quite inadequate to secure victory, or even to ward off defeat.

As soon as darkness fairly set in, our corps, which had kept its station on the opposite side of the stream, was silently withdrawn, and took ground beside Reidesdell's dragoons on the little hill above alluded to. There we passed the night, not very comfortably, as may be well supposed, seeing that no fires were lighted, and that we were all impressed with a powerful sense of impending danger; but if there was an absence of mirth from amongst us, there was no approximation to terror; for we held our own valour at the highest, and rated that of our opponents somewhat too cheaply. Yet there were few amongst us that slept very soundly. We could not but remember that we were cut off, by a wide tract of desolate country, from all communication with our friends, and exposed to attacks on every side from a numerous enemy; and the whoop which the savages raised from time to time, as well as an occasional musket shot, gave notice, that even now that enemy was not inactive. Our anxiety for the return of day was greater by far than perhaps any of us would have been willing to acknowledge, even to his dearest friend; and the feeling of satisfaction was general, when the gradual reddening of the eastern sky denoted that it was fast approaching.

The morning of the 16th rose beautifully serene. The storm of the preceding day having expended itself, not a cloud was left to darken the face of the heavens; whilst the very leaves hung motionless, and the long grass waved not, under the influence of a perfect calm. Every object around, too, appeared to peculiar advantage; for the fields looked green and refreshed, the river was swollen and tumultuous, and the branches were all loaded with dew-drops, which glittered in the sun's early rays like so many diamonds. Nor would it be easy to imagine any scene more rift with peaceful and even pastoral beauty. Looking down from the summit of the rising ground, I beheld immediately beneath me a wide sweep of stately forest, interrupted at remote intervals by green meadows or yellow corn-fields; whilst here and there a cottage, a shed, or some other primitive edifice, reared its modest head, as if for the purpose of reminding the spectator, that man had begun his inroads upon nature, without as yet taking away from her simplicity and grandeur. I hardly recollect a scene which struck me at the moment more forcibly, or which has left a deeper, or more lasting impression on my memory.

I have said that the morning of the 16th rose beautifully serene; and it is not to the operations of the elements alone that my expression applies. All was perfectly quiet at the outposts, not an enemy having been seen, nor an alarming sound heard, for several hours previous to sunrise. So peaceable, indeed, was the aspect which matters bore, that our leaders felt warmly disposed to resume the offensive, without waiting the arrival of the additional corps for which they had applied; and orders were already issued for the men to eat their breakfasts, preparatory to more active operations. But the arms were scarcely piled, and the haversacks unslung, when symptoms of a state of affairs different from that which had been anticipated, began to show themselves, and our people were recalled to their ranks in all haste, almost as soon as they had quitted them. From more than one quarter scouts came in to report, that columns of armed men were approaching; though whether with a friendly or hostile intention, neither their appearance nor actions enabled our informants to ascertain.

It has been stated, that during the last day's march our little corps was joined by many of the country people; most of whom demanded and obtained arms, as persons friendly to the royal cause. How Colonel Baume became so completely duped as to place reliance on these men, I know not; but having listened with complacency to their previous assurances, that in Bennington a large majority of the populace were our friends, he was somehow or other persuaded to believe, that the armed bands of whose approach he was warned, were loyalists on their way to make a tender of their services to the leader of the king's troops. Filled with this idea, he despatched positive orders to the outposts, that no molestations should be offered to the advancing columns; but that the pickets retiring before them should join the main body, where every disposition was made to receive either friend or foe. Unfortunately for us, these orders were but too faithfully obeyed. About half past nine o'clock, I, who was not in the secret, beheld, to my utter amazement, our advanced parties withdraw without firing a shot, from thickets which might have been maintained for hours against any superiority of numbers; and the same thickets quickly occupied by men, whose whole demeanour, as well as their dress and style of equipment, plainly and incontestably pointed them out as Americans.

I cannot pretend to describe the state of excitation and alarm into which our little band was now thrown. With the solitary exception of our leader, there was not a man amongst us who appeared otherwise than satisfied that those to whom he had listened were traitors; and that unless some prompt and vigorous measures were adopted, their treachery would be crowned with its full reward. Captain Fraser, in particular, seemed to be strongly imbued with the conviction that we were wilfully deceived. He pointed out in plain language the extreme improbability of the story which these deserters had told, and warmly urged the chief to withdraw his confidence from them; but all his arguments proved fruitless. Colonel Baume remained convinced of their fidelity. He saw no reason to doubt that the people whose approach excited so much apprehension were the same of whose arrival he had been forewarned; and he was prevented from placing himself entirely in their power, only by the positive refusal of his followers to obey orders given to that effect, and the rash impetuosity of the enemy.

We might have stood about half an hour under arms, watching the proceedings of a column of four or five hundred men, who, after dislodging the pickets, had halted just at the edge of the open country, when a sudden tramping of feet in the forest on our right, followed by the report of several muskets, attracted our attention. A patrol was instantly sent in the direction of the sound; but before the party composing it had proceeded many yards from the lines, a loud shout, followed by a rapid though straggling fire of musketry, warned us to prepare for a meeting the reverse of friendly. Instantly the Indians came pouring in, carrying dismay and confusion in their countenance and gestures. We were surrounded on all sides; and those were advancing everywhere against us, and those whom we had hitherto treated as friends had only waited till the arrival of their support might justify them in advancing. There was no falsehood in these reports, though made by men who spoke rather from their fears than their knowledge. The column in our front no sooner heard the shout than they replied cordially and loudly to it; then, firing a volley with deliberate and murderous aim, rushed furiously towards us. Now then, at length, our leader's dreams of security were dispelled. He found himself attacked in front and flank by thrice his numbers, who pressed forward with the confidence which our late proceedings were calculated to produce; whilst the very persons in whom he had trusted, and to whom he had given arms, lost no time in turning them against him. These fellows no sooner heard their comrades cry, than they deliberately discharged their muskets amongst Reidesdel's dragoons; and dispersing before any steps could be taken to seize them, escaped, with the exception of one or two, to their friends.

If Colonel Baume had permitted himself to be duped into a great error, it is no more than to justice to confess, that he exerted himself manfully to remedy the evil, and avert its consequences. Our little band, which had hitherto remained in column, was instantly ordered to extend, and the troops living the breast work replied to the fire of the Americans with extreme celerity and considerable effect. So close and destructive, indeed, was our first volley, that the assailants recoiled before it, and would have retreated, in all probability, within the wood; but ere we could take advantage of the confusion produced, fresh attacks developed themselves, and we were warmly engaged on every side and from all quarters. It became evident that each of our detached posts was about to be assailed at the same instant. Not one of our dispositions had been concealed from the enemy, who, on the contrary, seemed to be aware of the exact number of men stationed at each point; and they were one and all threatened by a force perfectly adequate to bear down opposition, and yet by no means disproportionately large, or such as to render the main body inefficient. All, moreover, was done with the sagacity and coolness of veterans, who perfectly understood the nature of the resistance to be expected, and the difficulties to be overcome, and who, having well considered and matured their plans, were resolved to carry them into execution at all hazards, and at every expense of life.

It was at this moment, when the heads of columns began to show themselves in rear of our right and left, that the Indians, who had hitherto acted with spirit, and something like order, lost all confidence, and fled. Alarmed at the prospect of having their retreat cut off, they stole away, after their own fashion, in single files, in spite of the strenuous remonstrances of Baume, and of their own officers, leaving us more than ever exposed, by the abandonment of that angle of the intrenchments which they had been appointed to maintain. But even this spectacle, distressing as it doubtless was, failed in affecting our people with a feeling at all akin to despair. The vacancy which the retreat of the savages occasioned, was promptly filled up by one of our two field-pieces, whilst the other poured destruction among the enemy in front, as often as they showed themselves in the open country, or threatened to advance.

In this state things continued upwards of three quarters of an hour. Though repeatedly assailed in front, flanks and rear, we maintained ourselves with so much obstinacy, as to inspire a hope that the enemy might even yet be kept at bay till the arrival of Breyman's corps, now momentarily expected; when an accident occurred, which at once put an end to this expectation, and exposed us, almost defenceless, to our fate. The solitary tumbril which contained the whole of our spare ammunition, became ignited, and blew up with a violence, which shook the very ground under our feet, and caused a momentary cessation in firing, both on our side and that of the enemy. But the cessation was only for a moment. The American officers, guessing the extent of our calamity, elicited their men on to fresh exertions. They rushed up the ascent with redoubled ardour, in spite of the heavy volley which we poured in to check them; and finding our guns silent, they sprang over the parapet, and dashed within our works. For a few seconds the scene which ensued, defies all power of language to describe. The bayonet, the butt of the rifle, the sabre, the pike, were in full play; and men fell, as they rarely fall in modern war, under the direct blows of their enemies. But such a struggle could not be in the nature of things be of long continuance. Outnumbered, broken, and somewhat disheartened by late events, our people wavered, and fell back, or fought singly and uncoordinatedly, till they were either cut down at their posts obstinately defending themselves, or compelled to surrender. Of Reidesdel's dismounted dragoons, few survived to tell how nobly they had behaved; Colonel Baume, shot through the body by a rifle ball, fell mortally wounded; and all order and discipline being lost, flight, or submission was alone thought of. For my own part, whether the feeling arose from desperation or accident I cannot tell, but I resolved not to be taken. As yet I had escaped almost unhurt, a slight flesh wound in the left arm having alone fallen to my share; and gathering round me about thirty of my comrades, we made a rush where the enemy's ranks appeared weakest, and burst through. This done, each man made haste to shift for himself, without pausing to consider the fate of his neighbour; and losing one third of our number from the enemy's fire, the remainder took refuge, in groups of two or three, within the forest.

CHAPTER V.

It were no easy matter to describe the sensations which take possession of a man who has just escaped from a field of carnage and defeat, and finds himself all at once a fugitive and a wanderer in a country every where hostile to him. Though oppressed, and ready to drop to the earth through thirst and fatigue, I could not pause even to look behind, whilst as yet the shouts of the victors and the tumult of the strife rang in my ears; nor was it till an alarming sense of giddiness warned me to proceed no farther, that I at last ventured to cast myself at length under a spreading oak. The giddiness in question, I was not long in discovering, arose from loss of blood. Whilst running down the slope, a ball had passed through my thigh, of which at the moment I was not aware; but several of the smaller arteries having been cut, it bled profusely, and now occasioned so much weakness, that it was with difficulty I succeeded in preserving my consciousness. Happily for me, a stream of pure water flowed from a mossy fountain near, of which I drank the sweetest and most luxurious draught that ever passed my lips; and being refreshed and invigorated by it, I so far recovered self-command, as to look, as well as I could, to the state of my hurt. I wrapped my handkerchief tightly round it, so as to stanch the bleeding, and lay down again, with the design, if possible, of courting sleep.

I have said that it would be no easy matter to describe the sensations which obtain the mastery over a man who has just escaped from a field of carnage and defeat; and no where could a proof more striking of the justice of this remark be found, than I myself exhibited on that unfortunate day. Though I would have given worlds for one hour of undisturbed slumber, and though the bodily machine felt as if its vigour had departed for ever, sleep refused to come upon me. I closed my eyes for a moment, it was merely to fall into a feverish doze, during which images the most hideous and alarming crowded my imagination, and from which the slightest waving of the rushes, or the rustling of the long grass, sufficed to rouse me. I started at the sound of my own breathing; and without knowing what it was that I feared, I found myself the slave of the most hideous terror. Nor was it over my mind alone that this nervous irritability exerted its influence. I have often travelled, and bled, and bled, and bled, whilst suffering under wounds more dangerous and troublesome than those which then disabled me; but on that day my limbs refused to do their office, or to carry me one step beyond the spot where I first halted. I accordingly lay for two whole hours in a condition as deplorable as has frequently been filled by a human being; cut off from all hope or chance of receiving support or assistance from my friends, and anticipating nothing else than either to perish from want, or to fall a sacrifice to some wandering party of hostile savages.

I was thus situated, having dropped into a sort of trance, such as forms the connecting link between sleeping and waking, when a sound which had hitherto smote upon the ear of fancy alone, suddenly arose, and burst in a moment the spell which bound me. It was a roar of musketry, with an occasional boom of cannon, echoed back in tremendous tumult by the surrounding forests; and I was not slow in conjecturing that it arose from Colonel Breyman's party engaged with the same force by which we had just been overthrown. It will readily be imagined that I listened to the awful sound with an intensity of interest such as hardly any other in nature could have produced, and that my hopes and fears obtained by turns the mastery, in proportion as it appeared to approach or recede from the spot where I lay. Now it seemed to draw rapidly towards me, now it swept away in the opposite direction; now I judged that the Americans were falling back, now that the king's troops were retreating,—so wavering and uncertain a guide is the ear, unassisted by the operation of other senses. By degrees, however, matters assumed a more decided character. The firing, which for a time had extended over a considerable space, gradually narrowed, as if the skirmishers were called in, and lines were formed for a charge; and then a shout, of which I well knew the import, rang through the air. It was followed by a momentary silence, more awful by far than the tumult which ushered it in; and then succeeded a tirade so warm and so confused, as plainly to indicate that one side or other had given way. It was no longer, now, the steady discharges of hostile armies, each in firm array, and eager for victory; but the desultory firing of detached parties, some in flight, others in hot pursuit. I could bear this state of suspense no longer; so, mustering all my resolution, I struggled to rise, and after several ineffectual attempts, succeeded.

The sun had set, and twilight was closing in fast, when I began my tedious and painful journey towards the open country. My limbs, swollen and stiff, refused at first to support the weight of my body; and my whole frame, enfeebled by inattention, no less than by loss of blood, with difficulty obeyed the motions of a mind, to which something like its natural tone was restored. I reeled like a drunken man, and felt as if at every step I should have fallen again. But a strange sense of the necessity for exertion kept me up, and as long as the faintest light remained, and the firing continued to direct me, I pushed on. At last, however, the firing ceased entirely, and darkness the deepest and most profound covered the face of the sky. Now, then, I gave myself up absolutely to despair, and casting myself once more upon the ground, I shut my eyes, and resigned myself, without a groan, to my fate.

How long I remained in this plight I cannot tell, for either sleep, or, which is more probable, a fainting fit, soon overpowered me; but when I recovered my senses, I found myself in the midst of a group of armed men, one of whom was kindly supporting my head upon his knee. A large fire was blazing near, the light of which fell strongly upon my companions; but so confused were my senses, and so vague and unsatisfactory the workings of memory itself, that I could not tell for many minutes whether I was in the hands of friends or foes. Nay, my situation was to me altogether inexplicable. I recollected something, indeed, of the events of the morning, as that we had sustained a severe action, and that I had myself been alone in the woods; but how I came there, whether we had been defeated or victorious, and, above all, why I should be as I now was, were mysteries which all my exertions failed to solve. My degrees, however, reason resumed her influence. I raised my head, and gazing around began to receive some faint impression that the faces before me were familiar, when a well-known voice restored me at once to myself, and I found that I was really among friends. The voice was that of my brave leader, on whom I was leaning; and to my inexpressible delight I now saw, that the group was composed entirely of old comrades—the members of my own corps, Fraser's Marksmen.

As soon as the first gush of joy had subsided, I eagerly inquired of Fraser by what means he had escaped from the carnage of yesterday, and how fortune had so ordered it as to bring him to my relief. The first portion of his story resembled my own in almost every particular; the last contained details but little calculated to raise the spirits of one already humbled by defeat, and debilitated by bodily suffering. Like me, he had cut his way through the circle of Americans, but, instead of plunging into the heart of the forest, he contented himself with such shelter as the banks of the river afforded, with the intention of escaping by the main road, as soon as darkness should set in. He was thus situated when Colonel Breyman's detachment arrived at the very ground where he had sustained his defeat. To this he hastened to attack himself; but before he found an opportunity of making his leader aware of the events which had just occurred, it too was furiously attacked by General Starke. A sanguinary affair ensued, in which, for a time, our people appeared to have the advantage; but their ammunition beginning to fail, they were compelled to slacken their fire, and put all upon the hazard of a single charge. The charge was indeed successful,—that is to say, the enemy fled before it, and the field was for a moment won,—but it was only for a moment; for Starke, rallying his people, threw them in small bands round Breyman's flanks, and soon broke, by an incessant fire, ranks which could no longer be maintained except by the bayonet. Finally, the Hessians retreated in disorder, leaving their guns, and many prisoners, in the hands of the victors; and were saved from absolute destruction only by the approach of night.

It was whilst escaping a second time from a contest so disastrous, that chance directed Fraser to the spot where I lay. I had taken, it appeared, the exact route which I had pursued it a little further, must have brought me to the left of Breyman's line; and when all means of guiding my steps failed, I lay down, happily for myself, upon the very track which most of the fugitives from the battle were compelled to follow. Being discovered here, and recognised by my relative, I was conveyed at his request to the spot which we now occupied; where my hurts were carefully dressed, and every attention was shown to me by men, in whom personal suffering had not yet produced its ordinary effect, of rendering them callous to the miseries of others.

I would willingly pass over that portion of my history which refers to our painful progress back from the Moccasin to the Hudson. Were I, indeed, to enter into a detail of it, my descriptions would be only of sufferings the most acute, arising partly from the absence of common nutriment, and partly from a consciousness of individual degradation, of which none among us could divest ourselves. Of the remains of Breyman's corps, he it observed, we lost sight entirely. It fell back, I believe, in tolerable order by the main road, and not being pursued, regained the banks of the Hudson in safety; but the party to which I found myself attached, had separated from the main body, and of course knew nothing of its fate from the moment when the separation took place. We accordingly kept the woods during three entire days, deriving our subsistence chiefly from wild fruits, and the few crumles which remained in our haversacks; and our progress was the more tardy, because I could not move without assistance, and my comrades refused to abandon me. But we gained the camp at last, though in a plight which bore ample testimony to the privations which we had endured; and I became for some time the inhabitant of that most melancholy of all abodes, a military hospital.

My wounds, though originally slight, had become, from neglect and the hardships which I had been condemned to undergo, so inflamed, that several days elapsed ere I was able to pay attention to any circumstance not immediately connected with my own feelings. I lay all this while upon a wretched pallet, in the same room with twelve unfortunate creatures, of whom seven died delirious and raving. So acute were my own agonies, and so overwhelming their influence over me, that I could not experience so much as pity for any one except myself. If my miserable comrades groaned or complained, I answered only with a curse, because they disturbed my meditations or interrupted my repose; so perfectly selfish do men become when their miseries pass a certain point, or exceed their powers of endurance. Yet let me do justice to myself. It was only whilst matters were at the worst with me, that feelings so unworthy obtained an ascendancy, which they gradually but surely lost, as my own case obtained amelioration. The paroxysm was no sooner over, than my past unkindness affected me with deep shame; and I thenceforth exerted myself to the utmost, in order to make amends for it. Nor were my exertions useless. The poor fellows about me had themselves suffered too much not to experience something of the same selfishness to which I gave way, and they readily and kindly accepted the apologies which I offered for having displayed it so rudely.

In this manner nearly a fortnight was passed; during which time the army remained stationary: its energies being chiefly devoted to the bringing up of stores from the rear, and the construction of rafts with which to pass the river. Whilst our own people were thus employed, the Indians, spreading themselves over the face of the country, brought havoc and dismay into all districts, and perpetuated all the cruelties of the recollection of which the mind even at this distance of time shudders. Irritated by the trifling progress which had been made, and indignant at the check imposed upon plunder, these savages put to death every man, woman, or child, that fell into their hands; inasmuch that General Burgoyne was driven to the necessity of threatening their very chiefs with punishment, in the event of their failing to restrain the cruelties of their followers. But his threats and entreaties were alike disregarded, enormity after enormity occurring, till at last a deed was perpetrated which will for ever leave an indelible stain upon the honour of the British arms. The deed to which I now allude, was the cold-blooded murder of an innocent girl, the child of a loyal father, and the betrothed of a brave youth who bore a commission in the king's service.

About ten miles from the site of our present encampment, and something more from the post of Fort Edward, stood a neat cottage, the residence of an aged and loyal emigrant, by name Macrea. He had served as officer in one of the Highland regiments, in former wars against the French; and having been rewarded at the peace by a grant of land, he beat his sword into a ploughshare, and sat down to cultivate his farm, and to train up his children in principles of loyalty and honour. For a time all things went well with him: his labours were crowned with success; under his own exertions and those of his sons, the barren wilderness became a smiling garden, and the old man considered himself, as he was considered by his neighbours, one of the most prosperous individuals in the settlement. To complete his good fortune, a fine young man, the son of an old comrade, and now a fellow settler, made proposals for the hand of his daughter; and being equally acceptable to the maid as to her father, he was duly received in the character of an accepted lover.

Things were in this state, and the wedding-day was understood to be approaching, when the breaking out of the rebellion, with the subsequent operations against Canada, dissipated for a time all thoughts of domestic arrangements. Macrea espoused the cause of his sovereign warmly; and his sons, as well as his proposed son-in-law, took up arms in the royal service. Of the former, one fell in the affair of Fort St. John, the other during the assault at Quebec; and Macrea became, in consequence, dependent wholly upon his daughter, for that support which his increasing infirmities demanded. Yet the old man bore his misfortunes like a hero. His sons, he said, had died as he wished them to die, in the service of a kind and gracious monarch; and his daughter being still left to be the light of his dim eyes, it would ill become him to raise his voice against Providence. Besides, his future son-in-law, whom he loved not less tenderly than his own boys, survived; and in the prospect of beholding a union, on the completion of which he had set his heart, he found many sources of comfort under his present calamities.

Strange to say, Macrea, though well known as a partisan of the government, suffered neither insult nor molestation from the colonists near him. Allowances seem to have been made for the prejudices of an old soldier; and though he never disguised his wishes as to the final results of the war, he continued on the best terms with men, whose principles and feelings all led to an opposite line of conduct. The consequence was, that when Burgoyne's invasion began, though most of his neighbours abandoned their houses, and sought shelter at a distance from our line of march, no one dreamt of offering insult or injury to him, because he adopted a different course of conduct; and he remained with his daughter to welcome the coming of men, whom his principles taught him to regard as deliverers.

Macrea's farm lay somewhat out of the track of either of our columns in the pursuit from Ticonderoga; consequently it escaped a visit, which, if paid in the first moment of angry triumph, might have been far from agreeable. Probably it would have passed unscathed altogether, had our progress been more rapid, or our future successes more brilliant; but the ill-judged halt opposite to Saratoga afforded an opportunity to marauders, of which they failed not to take advantage, and by which the old colonist became a severe sufferer.

A party of Indians stealing from the lines, made their way to his house. They burst upon him during the night, driving the old man into the woods for safety, and wantonly destroying such of his effects as they possessed not the means to remove; and above all, they seized his daughter, of whom, in the confusion, Macrea had for a moment lost sight. Had matters ended here, all might have yet been well; Macrea was not a man to resent even this injury, knowing, as he well knew, the nature of those who inflicted it; whilst government would have doubtless made compensation for any loss which the inroad might have caused. But the Indians among into whose hands the maiden fell, quarrelled among themselves respecting their right to the captive; and one, more inhuman than the rest, clove her skull with his tomahawk.

When intelligence of this horrid murder reached the camp, the indignation of all, from the general down to the meanest sentinel, was roused to the utmost pitch of fury. It so happened that the girl's betrothed was amongst us, and of the state of his feelings I leave you to judge; yet it was necessary, situated as we were, to deal mercifully with the perpetrators of the black deed, to whom, from motives of policy, no public punishment was awarded. The cordiality, however, which had already begun to wax faint between us and our native warriors, was by this last act of devilish treachery destroyed. We regarded them now as little better than fiends—useless in the field, and worse than useless out of it; and if we turned not against them the arms which our legitimate enemy gave us no opportunity to exercise, it was only because our chief took care to keep them entirely apart from us. But it is time that I return to my detail of military events, to which every successive day added a deeper and more awful interest.

We were yet writhing under the effects of the repulse at Pennington, when intelligence of the failure of Colonel St. Leger's attempts upon Fort Stanwix was communicated to us. Threatened by a force greatly superior to his own, and deserted and betrayed by his Indian allies, that officer was reluctantly compelled to relinquish several important advantages which he had obtained; and he was now in full retreat across the country, with the intention, if possible, of effecting his escape upon Montreal. I need not observe that such a communication, received at such a moment, excited no little alarm among all to whom it was communicated. If the enemy were in sufficient force to detach largely from our immediate front, at a moment when an attack might daily be anticipated, what probability was there that they would be unable to oppose as successfully, our forcing one of the many admirable positions with which the country around Albany abounded? and should we fail in penetrating to that place before the winter set fairly in, our prospects would, indeed, be of the most gloomy nature. Nor was this the only consideration which thrust itself fearfully into view. Rumours, apparently not without foundation, were afloat, of detached corps hanging upon our communications. Fort Edward was already menaced; even Fort William had been threatened; nor was it safe to forward the smallest convoy of stores, except under the protection of a numerous and well-appointed guard. But, above all, our information proved to be, not only defective, but incorrect. Instead of a country every where friendly, we found ourselves in the heart of a district decidedly and bitterly hostile. Few recruits joined our standards, and of these few, many were not to be trusted; whilst the American General Greene was well known to receive daily reinforcements of militia, gathered, as well from this, as from the more remote settlements. Then, again, desertions began to be with us matters of frequent occurrence. Of the two hundred and fifty provincials which originally formed part of our strength, scarcely one hundred remained; and of these, one or two usually went over to the enemy every night. True, a reinforcement of some hundreds of Germans came in about this time, as well as drafts for several of the British battalions, and a few recruits for ourselves; but on the whole, the army was greatly diminished, and was daily diminishing in numbers, whilst its morale had undeniably undergone a change by no means for the better. Nor did the evil end even here. Our leader's proceedings began to form the subject of frequent, and not very favourable discussion, in all parts of the camp. Whilst some condemned the inconsiderate rashness which had carried us thus far from our supplies and entangled us in a desert country, others exclaimed loudly against the wavering and timid policy which kept us so long inactive, at a moment when every consideration of common prudence required a prompt advance. Even our generals themselves restrained not their tongues from giving utterance to such criticisms. General Philips, in particular, was loud in condemning the indecision by which all our operations were marked; and Fraser, though personally a friend of General Burgoyne, could hardly smother his impatience, or suppress similar complaints. Yet is it no more than just towards Burgoyne to observe, that he laboured at this juncture under disadvantages of no ordinary nature; and if his movements were less prompt than they might, and perhaps ought to have been, it is very possible that they were dictated by a sense of what was due, both to himself, and to the brave army of which he was in command.

General Burgoyne had as yet received no advices from New York, indicative of any intention on the part of Sir William Clinton to operate in his favour by an advance up the Hudson. Now, this of itself was a grievous disappointment to one whose plans were all formed with a view to such co-operation, and who had anticipated, on setting out, that a junction of forces would take place, if not at Albany, certainly a few leagues below it. But from Albany we were now distant not more than forty miles, whereas the corps which we had expected to meet there, was not yet, as far as we knew, in march from the entrenched camp, situated at three times that distance from the point of rendezvous. Again, our means of transport, originally scanty, became every hour more and more inadequate to the demands of the army; for the horses knocked up by incessant labour, and all our efforts to recruit them failed—while the necessity which existed of leaving strong garrisons at the posts in our rear, operated as a serious drain upon a force, from the first scarcely competent to the successful accomplishment of an enterprise so hazardous as that in which we were engaged. All these matters were doubtless felt in their full force by General Burgoyne, to whom a separate command was new; and if they produced a thousand doubts and misgivings, as to the proper measures which it behoved him to adopt, these emergencies were not different from what might have been expected. Still his doubts and misgivings were rendered but too manifest to the troops. They also began to entertain suspicions that all things went not on aright; and the confidence which they had originally experienced, both in themselves and their leaders, suffered from that moment considerable diminution.

CHAPTER VI.

It was now the month of September, and my health being in a great measure restored, I was about to return to my duty, when I received a message one morning, through an orderly sergeant, indicating that the general desired to see me. I obeyed the summons without delay, and following my conductor, was led towards a sort of log hut, which the pioneers had erected about a quarter of a mile in rear of the regular encampment. It was here that our commander in chief had fixed his headquarters; several tents in which his staff and attendants lodged, being beside it, whilst about a stone's throw apart, was a tall marquee, inhabited, as I was given to understand, by the lady of Baron Reidesdel, her children, and female servants.

On entering the hut, I beheld General Burgoyne seated beside a table on which lay a multitude of maps and papers; and near him stood my friend and relation, Captain Fraser, with whom he seemed to be in earnest conversation. He turned his face towards me, and having ascertained from Fraser who I was, pointed to a stool, on which he desired that I would sit down.

"Young man," said he, "I have sent for you, because I have received from Captain Fraser the most favourable report of your gallantry and good conduct; and because I am desirous, at his recommendation, of employing you upon a service, which will entitle you to the highest rewards which it may be in my power to bestow. Are you willing to embark upon an enterprise of no ordinary hazard? Have you any reluctance to risk your life, in order to advance the fortunes of this army?"

To say that I heard this speech without emotion, would be to speak falsely. My heart leaped, as it were, to my throat; but if there was something of apprehension in the feeling which at first caused this agitation, it soon gave way to a sense of honest pride, that I had been thus spoken of, and was thus favoured. I replied without hesitation, that I was both willing and ready to undertake any duty on which it should please the general to employ me; and that I would gladly, not only hazard, but lay down my life at once, to secure the smallest benefit either to the army or its leader.

"You have spoken bravely, sir," replied the general, smiling; "and that you may have at once a forecast of the fortune that awaits you, provided your zeal and diligence be as I anticipate, permit me to present you to this commission. It confers temporary and local rank only, because to such only my authority extends; but you may rely upon having it confirmed, as soon as the despatch which I am now preparing to send off shall reach the Horse Guards. And now, Mr. Maedirk, you may retire. Captain Fraser will fully instruct you in the business which you are about to undertake, and you will, of course, consider all that is said to you, as spoken in the strictest confidence. Till the fitting moment arrive, you will continue to do duty with your old leader, though you will be prepared to give me your personal attendance as often as I may require." So saying, the general rose and bowed; upon which Fraser put his arm within mine, and we quitted the hut.

It were utterly impossible for me to describe the state of mind into which the preceding scene threw me. I found myself of a sudden, and when I least expected it, advanced to the rank of a commissioned officer, and gladdened with the promise of future advancement from one who possessed every means of fulfilling it. So far all my thoughts were agreeable—so agreeable, indeed, as to border upon extravagance. But then there were conditions to be attended to, there was some service to be accomplished more than ordinarily hazardous, upon the happy accomplishment of which my prospects were made distinctly to depend. What could this be? I neither can, nor ever was a coward, yet let me confess the truth, though there was nothing for which I feared more earnestly than an explanation, I shrank with instinctive dread from demanding it. I was afraid, fairly and positively afraid—not to face death, for that I had faced often enough already to have acquired a sort of constitutional contempt for it; but I dreaded my own inability to support the brilliant character which it was very evident my friend Fraser had bestowed on me. It was my prudence and discretion, not my physical courage that I doubted. Fraser read my agitation in my countenance, though I did my best to conceal it, and laughed at it. "Why, Maedirk!" said he, "I gave you credit for greater nerve than you seem to possess. What ails you, man? Are you not extremely fortunate in obtaining promotion thus early? and is it not honourable to you in the highest degree, that you should be deemed worthy of our general's confidence?" I could only answer these questions in the affirmative; "but," continued I, "who knows whether I be competent to fulfil the task which he has done me the honour to assign me? It may require greater experience and more intelligence than I possess; for you know I am as yet a young soldier, though certainly a very zealous one."

"Tut, tut!" replied he, "I will answer for your fitness. And now let us withdraw to some place apart, that I may explain to you the nature of the undertaking in which you are about to embark."

We walked on for some time, clearing the encampment, and passing the sentries, till we gained an open elevated spot, where no intruder could break in upon us without timely warning being given of his approach. Here Fraser seated himself, and inviting me to do the same, he began a conversation, of which I need scarcely observe that it was to me a deeply interesting one.

"Maedirk," said he, "you are not so unskilful in the business of campaigning, as to be ignorant that this army has got itself into a devil of a scrape. Whether Burgoyne be to blame, or Howe or Clinton, or the government; it home, or all combined, is a matter of very little moment now; but that we are entangled in a net from which it will be no easy matter to extricate ourselves with honour, the rawest recruit amongst us must perceive. Don't you think, that to be the means of cutting this Gordian knot, would of itself be satisfactory to any man?"

I nodded, rather than spoke, an assent; upon which he continued.

"The great question to be solved at present is, whether it be prudent to advance or retreat; for to remain where we are much longer, is to ensure our certain destruction. Now that is a matter which cannot be ascertained, unless some communication be opened with the troops in New York. How do you think this might be done?"

I answered with perfect truth, that I could offer no opinion upon such a subject, but that I supposed General Howe or Sir William Clinton would take care to inform us, as soon as they had matured their plans and were ready to act upon them. "They mature their plans!"

answered he, with a smile of bitter scorn. "As to old Howe, the fellow never had head enough to form any plan, unless it were to entrup some silly wretch, or pick some young fellow's pocket; and Clinton is eternally forming plans, upon which he never acts, and making schemes, for the happy execution of which he never finds a fitting season. If we wait for information communicated spontaneously from them, we shall wait, I suspect, till doomsday. No, no, my friend, it is we that must open this communication; and you are the man to do so, or I greatly mistake you."

"I open this communication! In the name of common sense, how can I, ignorant as I am of the country, pretend to make my way through the heart of the American army?"

Fraser was silent for some minutes, during which he looked steadily into my face, as if he would have read my inmost soul, and weighed my very feelings before they were roused. "Maedirk," said he at length, "these are not times when a man who loves his country must be very fastidious as to the means which he adopts to serve her. As I said before, we are in a desperate plight, and desperate measures only will save us. You must undertake this business, for I have pledged myself that you should; and though you put your neck in jeopardy by so doing, what matters it? If you be prudent, you may escape, and then a rapid promotion awaits you."

Another pause of some moments occurred, for my assurances that I would attempt any thing practicable can hardly be said to have broken it, when Fraser again resumed. "I presume you are possessed of too much good sense not to be aware, that the character of every action takes its tone, not from the opinions of others respecting it, but from the motive which dictates its performance. You are likewise too much of a soldier not to be convinced, that he who obeys his general only does his duty, let the order be of what nature or tendency it may."

To both of these propositions, I readily assented. "Well, then," continued he, "suppose General Burgoyne were to require you or me to desert our colours,—not for the purpose of really acting as traitors, but to further some great end of his own,—do you think that we should be justified in obeying him?" Even now I could not comprehend the object at which he was driving; so I replied vaguely and in general terms, that I did not believe any general would demand such a sacrifice from the meanest of his followers, and that it would be time enough to discuss the propriety of obedience or disobedience, when an order so singular were issued. "Then, my good fellow," said he, speaking in a tone of great earnestness, and laying his hand upon my shoulder, "that moment has actually come. I will cut this matter short. Of the difficulties into which we have fallen I have already told you. We advance, it is true, on the morrow,—that is to say, we cross the river, and shall probably push forward at all hazards as far as Albany; but beyond that point we cannot move till the troops from New York be induced to lend us their assistance. How are they to be told of our perilous situation?—for if we be in jeopardy now, we shall be a thousand times more in danger when the Hudson is between us and our communications. There is but one way of effecting this end. To attempt a passage through the enemy's lines unnoticed, would be to expose yourself to certain destruction. Five messengers have been already sent out, and all five have, as our spies inform us, suffered death. You must desert; you must pretend to pass over to the enemy, and then you must find your way as you best can, to the coast. No doubt you will have obstacles to overcome both numerous and severe; but the thing must be done,—and you must do it."

I was so confounded at this declaration, that for some time after Fraser had ceased to speak, I sat absolutely at a loss for a reply. Had he proposed to me to make my way in disguise, though I should have felt that the service was a desperate one, I would have undertaken it, if not cheerfully, at all events without a murmur; but to adopt the method now pointed out was to put in jeopardy, not only my life, but my honour. As soon as I could so far command myself as to speak, I positively and flatly declined the trust. I expressed not only my disinclination to the arrangement, but the absolute impossibility of performing it with effect; for what excuse could I offer to the enemy for such a proceeding, should I be so fortunate as to reach their lines unhurt? and if I did reach them, where was the probability that I should be permitted to penetrate as far as New York? "No, no," continued I, "propose any thing to me except this, and I will accomplish it, or perish in the attempt; but if I must put my reputation in hazard, in order to purchase advancement in a profession which requires in its members the nicest sense of honour, I will rather continue as I am, unknown and disregarded, for ever."

I spoke teetlingly and warily, and my tone was not without its effect upon Fraser; but he persisted in urging the task upon me. He pointed out, that of my reputation that General Burgoyne and himself would take charge; that if I perished, ample justice would be done to my memory; whereas, if I succeeded, my renown would brighten in proportion to the temporary cloud that had been cast over it. Above all, he urged me to take into consideration the prodigious benefits which I might be the means of conferring upon an entire army. Though I could not but acknowledge that there was great justice in many of his arguments, they were not yet such as to convince me. I persisted in my refusal, at all events, whilst things continued as little desperate as they were, and begged him to urge me no more on a point on which my mind was quite made up. Fraser (either was, or pretended to be, both hurt and offended by my manner, "And your commission," said he, "for what purpose was that conferred upon you? Will you retain the reward without having striven to merit it?")

"Captain Fraser," replied I haughtily, "the commission was conferred upon me,—at least, I accepted it,—not as a retaining fee for future services, but as a reward for the past; but since there appears to be a doubt on the subject, let it be solved at once. Here is the bit of paper, carry it back to the general, and tell him, that I would rather serve as a private volunteer, honourably and uprightly, than earn the dignity of field-marshal, by conduct such as my own conscience cannot approve." I held out the parchment whilst I spoke, my face glowing with a sense of insulted dignity; but Fraser pushed it aside, and throwing his arms about my neck, begged me to forget his hasty observation.

"Keep your commission, my dear boy," cried he; "you never appeared more worthy of it than now; for though I think your scruples ill-founded and even ridiculous, I cannot but respect the principle from which they spring. Let the tenor of our past conversation be kept strictly to ourselves. Think over my proposal again, and perhaps the moment may arrive when you will discover, that a soldier never acts so nobly as when he risks, in his country's service, all that is most dear to him." So saying, he rose from the ground, and we strolled back to the camp, arm in arm, as we had quitted it, on the best terms, and in perfect good humour.

You will readily believe that the proceedings of the evening were of such a nature as utterly to unfit me for entering upon any of those employments in which it was customary to spend our time during the season of inaction. The society of my comrades was distasteful to me,—I could not meet them as formerly; so I withdrew to my own wigwag, to indulge in a train of thought, in which it would be difficult to say whether the pleasant or the painful most predominated. On one hand I considered, that an opportunity was now presented of advancing my fortunes, such as might never offer again; and that if I neglected it, the time might, and probably would come, when I should bitterly lament my folly. On the other, the risk of perishing, and perishing like a coward, with a reputation tarnished, and a name never to be pronounced without reproach,—these considerations operated powerfully with me, to adhere to the determination which I had already expressed, of absolutely refusing the part assigned to me. For it had been explicitly stated, that no step would be taken to preserve my memory from disgrace, till the fact of my having fallen a sacrifice should be ascertained. My own safety, indeed, required that neither the general nor Fraser should intrust me with any written document, from which, in case of untoward events occurring, a justification might be drawn; and to permit the circumstance of their connivance with my pretended crime to get abroad, would infallibly ruin the entire plot. Real deserters passed over to the enemy's lines every day; and should it be known in our camp that a spy had assumed that character, no great time would elapse ere the Americans would become equally aware of it. Besides, what probability existed, even allowing that I reached their army in safety, that I should be permitted to pass unobserved to the rear? and if I did, were there not numerous posts in the highlands, through which it would be necessary to make my way, in order to reach New York? The whole affair accordingly appeared in a light so little satisfactory, that though ambition pulled forcibly to one side, prudence, and what I was willing to dignify by the name of honour, pulled no less strongly to the other; and I found myself, after many hours' intense cogitation, as far from arriving at a final determination as when the proposal was first laid before me.

The same doubts and misgiving which had tormented me during the day, continued to torment me when it departed. I lay down, indeed, but it was not to sleep, for with sleep the fever under which I laboured was totally at variance. After tossing about, therefore, for some time, I fancied that the night air might refresh me, and, wrapping my cloak about me, I walked forth. It was one of those lovely autumnal nights, when the full harvest moon shines in all her brilliancy, and every plant and leaf glitters in the dew, which never falls so fast as after a day of burning sunshine. The sky was blue and cloudless, and there was a silence throughout the lines, deep and unbroken, like that which reigned in the camp of the Assyrians, when the Angel of Death fought for Jerusalem. Even the sentinels, as if weary of promenade, stood still, and leaning upon the muzzles of their firelocks, looked up into the heavens, whilst the only sound distinguishable was the murmur of the river as it swept with a quiet rush over its rocky channel. Of the effect of such a scene upon spirits somewhat over-wrought, I need not speak. A calm fell upon me, similar in all respects to that which appeared to dwell upon the rest of Nature's works; and I strolled forward in the direction of the outposts, forgetful of every idea or sensation, except those which surrounding objects were calculated to excite.

It was not long before the bodily machine began to feel the influence of a mind reconciled to itself, and eased of troublesome speculations. A desire to sleep, which by my efforts to promote had failed in exciting, stole gradually but imperceptibly over me; and I returned soon after midnight to my tent, where a sound and refreshing slumber fell upon me.

CHAPTER VII.

At an early hour in the morning of the 13th, I was awake by the entrance of an orderly, who came to inform me that the troops were getting under arms, and that the passage of the river was expected immediately to take place. Of the preparations for this step, which had for some time back been carried on, I was not ignorant. A flotilla of boats having been collected, and an adequate number of rafts constructed, our people had thrown a bridge across the Hudson, a task to the completion of which no interruption was offered by the Americans; and now all things being in readiness, even to the bringing up of stores and provisions, it was determined to lose no time in turning the work in question to account. I was not surprised at this information, because Fraser, in our conference of the preceding day, had led me to expect it; so I arose, dressed with all haste, and hurried off to assume my proper station with the Marksmen.

Nothing could be finer or more imposing, than the spectacle which this eventful morning produced. The army, though diminished in point of numbers, and somewhat shorn of its splendour by long and severe service, was still such as no military eye could behold without admiration; and as it defiled over the narrow bridge in column of sections, the regularity of its movements, and the steadiness of its well ordered tread, failed not to excite, at least in me, much of my former enthusiasm. Nor was the scene without its effect upon others, as well as upon myself. The officers, generally, cleared away from their brows the clouds which had of late hung over them, and exhibited, by their bearing and cheerful countenances, that even yet they anticipated success; whilst the soldiers resumed in a moment that bold and careless demeanour, of which a prolonged inactivity, for which they cannot satisfactorily account, never fails to deprive British troops. Even the commander in chief, of whose disposition to despond ample proof had already been exhibited, sat in evident delight to watch the progress of an operation touching the ultimate consequences of which he forbore to form a guess; and spoke and acted like one who had not yet resigned all hope of a fortunate issue. Fraser alone took, or appeared to take, no interest in passing events.

"You see, Macdirl," said he to me, "that the general still trusts to your zeal. I have not told him, nor will I tell him, that you reject his offers, and refuse to obey his wishes; but this much I do not hesitate to say to yourself, that on you now, more than on any other individual, must the safety of this army depend. By crossing the river we commit ourselves, beyond the hope of redemption; and we are utterly ruined, unless Clinton move to support us."

No opportunity was furnished of giving an answer to this speech, for the speaker passed on before I could utter a syllable, and I could only follow in a state of feeling, not very easily described, though certainly far from being so agreeable as had but a few moments before possessed me.

To transport the army with its guns, stores, and ammunition, over the Hudson, occupied the whole of the 13th and the greater part of the 14th of September. It was true that no very vigorous exertions were made to conduct the movement with greater celerity; but as the weather chanced to be particularly favourable, and the enemy showed no disposition to interfere, little immediate inconvenience arose out of their absence. We took up a position, partly upon the heights, partly in the plains near Saratoga, where we remained unmolested till a late hour in the evening of the 15th.

It is hardly necessary for me to remind you, that in the prosecution of the American war, caution, amounting to timidity, sometimes received the appellation of prudence, and that indecisive and dilatory proceedings, from whatever cause they might arise, passed in too many instances current for the results of wise and sober consideration. There was a sort of instinctive apprehension of unseen dangers in the minds of our leaders in general, which seldom failed to operate with the greatest power on occasions where there existed the feeblest ground for it; and to such General Burgoyne proved himself, on this as on other occasions, not less a slave than his brother commanders. Instead of pushing vigorously forward to Albany at once, for which we were now distant little more than thirty miles, he put his columns in motion on the 15th, only that he might again halt, after compassing a journey of barely five miles. There, at a place called Davout's, a second position was assumed, with the parade of persons satisfied with the successes which they had already obtained, and anxious to secure them; and there, during the whole of the 16th, the main body was kept in a state of useless and deplorable inactivity.

Whilst the army was thus wasting its time, and furnishing the enemy with all the leisure which they could desire for the completion of their preparations, one or two reconnoitring parties were sent out, confessedly with a view to ascertain the nature and resources of the surrounding country, but more truly, I believe, as a sort of excuse to the mind of the general himself. On this service I chanced to be employed. We found no trace of the Americans within the space which our orders marked out for us, and very little from which to draw up a report different from that which our guides and spies had given previous to the commencement of the campaign. Here, as in the direction of Bennington, sweeping forests universally prevailed. In the heart of these, and at considerable intervals one from another, a few farm houses and other settlements were placed, and wherever such occurred, there was the usual proportion of green meadow and open fields; but for the most part the scenery was such as prevails in other quarters of America, especially near the lakes, or by the courses of the large rivers. Creeks and smaller streams were, indeed, more abundant here than we had yet found them, falling in, across the line of our route, with the Hudson; but these were almost all extremely narrow, some of them quite shallow, and not one capable of impeding the progress either of infantry or artillery for a single hour. Yet General Burgoyne saw fit to delay the march of his columns till they should all be furnished with bridges constructed after a settled model; and the consequence was, that when it did begin again to move, our march was at once tardy, irregular, and cruelly interrupted.

On the 17th we were once more in motion; but the same caution that had hitherto cramped us, continued to exert its influence. No doubt, the road by which we traveled was a bad one. Swamps and creeks intervened so frequently, that occasional halts to enable the pioneers to do their office, were indispensable; whilst detached bodies of the enemy began by degrees to show themselves, though they studiously avoided a rencontre with our advance. But these inconveniences, through unquestionably considerable, were not such as to produce the result which actually occurred. Our progress was ridiculously slow, and we again halted, about four miles from Stillwater, having compassed barely one league and a half from sunrise till afternoon. Here, upon a spot of ground as favourable as could be selected, the camp was pitched, and all things were arranged, as if for a sojourn, not of a few hours, but of many weeks.

It was my fortune this night to be placed in command of a very important and hazardous outpost. Our station lay in front of the army, in an open meadow covered with long rank grass, and intersected by a stream, which, though neither very deep nor very broad, was rendered difficult to pass on account of the steepness of its banks and the rapidity of its current. Over that stream my little band was pushed for the purpose of covering a working party, which immediately after nightfall was ordered up to construct a bridge; and being wholly unsupported, or rather entirely in advance of the regular chain, we were left to provide as we best could against such contingencies as might befall. I need not say that in such a situation my feelings were not of the most enviable description. There was nothing on either of my flanks to which I could look; no line of sentinels connecting me with other pickets, or even keeping open my communication with the rear; but I stood alone as it were, in the midst of an open plain, exposed on all sides to attack, yet myself expected to give protection to others.

As the sun had not set when I first took up my ground, some opportunity was given to provide against accidents, of which I gladly and eagerly proceeded to avail myself. I planted my guard, consisting of fifty men, directly in front of the spot marked out for the bridge, and pushed out my sentries in a convex line, some two or three hundred yards in advance. By this arrangement I flattered myself with giving at least some security both to my front and flanks, for the line of sentries fell back on both hands to the river; and trusting to a patrol for the protection of my rear, I endeavoured to persuade myself that all was safe. But as daylight departed, my apprehensions began to gather strength, more especially as the appearance of the sunset seemed to foretell a coming tempest; and when night closed in darkness the most impenetrable, I trembled for the fate which might await not myself only but the entire army. That no blame, however, might attach to me, in case any untoward event did occur, I resolved not so much as to lie down; and the more to deceive an enemy, should any such approach, I caused the fires to be extinguished, and commanded the men to maintain a profound but watchful silence.

You will easily believe, that with such impressions upon my mind, I experienced no inclination whatever to sleep. With the departure of the sun's last ray, my perambulations began; and from that moment I ceased not to wander round from one flank of the chain of sentries to another. For some time these excursions were productive of no other results than usually attend the visitations of their videttes by careful officers: the men were all kept active to their duty; but of danger or the appearance of it, no symptom whatever was exhibited. Once indeed, and only once, when the patrol challenged from the rear, I was put completely on my mettle; but as the persons halted proved to be friends—as they were indeed the artificers come up to fulfil their task, the sense of alarm which their arrival created, soon gave place to a degree of confidence more decided than I had heretofore experienced. Yet I could not wholly divest myself of the persuasion that the Americans were aware of our exposed situation, and would avail themselves of it; and the issue proved that neither my forebodings nor suspicions were groundless.

It might be about ten or eleven o'clock, our artificers being in full and rather loquacious employment in the rear, when, on going my rounds, I suddenly caught a sound as of persons moving slowly and with extreme caution through the grass. I stopped short, and, applying my ear to the ground, became instantly satisfied that my sense of hearing had not deceived me, though, to assist that sense with the sense of sight not my utmost exertions availed any thing. The moon, already in the wane, had not yet risen, and the few stars which from time to time shot forth, were almost immediately darkened by a mass of black clouds, which a strong southerly breeze drove through the sky. I could not, therefore, distinguish any object at the distance of five yards; and even noises became every moment more and more indistinct, as the increasing force of the wind caused the weeds and boughs to wave with greater and greater violence. The tread of men is, however, a sound which when once heard it is not easy to forget; and hence, though the sighing of the wind and the rustling of the long grass caused frequent and long interruptions, I still caught at intervals the trampling of feet, as if people were defiling past me. I challenged loudly, and my challenge was repeated by the line of sentries, one after another. At this instant, there came a lull in the storm; for the fresh breeze had gradually increased to a storm; and that lull, in all probability, saved us. Not I alone, but the sentinels every where overheard the shuffling which a halt suddenly and quietly ordered never fails to produce; and it became apparent to all, that our post would shortly be maintained only by dint of courage and hard fighting.

This circumstance, I felt that not a moment was to be lost. Getting my picket under arms, and despatching a corporal to warn the artificers of their danger, I took with me a patrol of six men, and stole quietly forward towards the spot from whence the sounds seemed to proceed. We had advanced but a few paces in front of the videttes, when the leading file, in obedience to the orders which I had given them, fired. Instantly there arose a clamour of voices; and the shots being answered by a discharge of twenty or thirty firelocks, a strong body of Americans advanced. They came on, too, upon our right, as if they had been moving for some time unobserved, in the direction of the river, and had succeeded in passing the greater number of our sentinels; and in a minute after, we found ourselves warmly and awkwardly engaged with men of whose position, as well as of their numerical strength, we were necessarily ignorant.

In all night attacks, the assailing party has, and must have, at least at the beginning of the fray, a decided advantage. Men do not care, when first fired upon, to face they know not what danger, or from whence proceeding; and hence, if a night attack be not vigorously and prudently followed up, it seldom fails of success. But to be thus followed up, it must be made not by raw militiamen, however individually brave, but by regular troops, well disciplined, and accustomed to act together by word of command. Now the Americans happened not to be disciplined, as our people happened to be the reverse; and hence, though we gave way at first, retreating almost to the edge of the stream, the assaults failed to turn their advantage to a just account. They kept up, indeed, a heavy and incessant fire, more magnificent to behold than destructive in its effects; but they hung back, happily for us, in their advance, and hence gave us ample time to recover from the panic into which they had at first thrown us. Our entire strength was by this means brought together, and formed a chain across the point at which the pioneers were employed; after which, instead of waiting to be again attacked, we pushed forward boldly, but with extreme caution, so as to meet and discomfit the arrangements of the enemy.

Stealing on in this plight, and preserving a silence the most profound, we gradually drew upon the blaze of the American misdeeds. As we were ourselves totally unseen all the while, we contrived to approach so near, that at last the faces of the men themselves became perceptible, and we saw before us a dark line, regularly drawn up, and covering in close order a space of several hundred feet, from right to left. The spectacle was at once grand and imposing, for, whatever might be their deficiency in discipline, the fellows showed, by their immovable front, that in courage, at least, they were not deficient; and as they outnumbered us by at least six to one, it savoured somewhat of excess of rashness, to think of closing with them. But I knew that my situation was a desperate one; I knew also that my followers were brave, and could safely be depended on; so I gave the word, in a loud tone, to fire a volley, and close. The order was instantly obeyed. My people, though in extended files, rushed forward to the charge, and in an instant we were engaged hand to hand with our assailants.

The immediate effect of a charge so spirited was to cause the enemy to recoil; they even lost their order for a time, and in some parts of the line turned and fled; but the odds against us were tremendous, and soon began to tell. The Americans' fire alone was overwhelming; and though our brave fellows withstood it nobly, they were at last compelled to give ground. And now it may truly be said, that we fought for life or death. Borne back to the edge of the stream, at a point where its steep and rocky bank rendered all effort to pass hopeless, nothing seemed left to us, except to sell our lives at the dearest; for a cry suddenly arose of most perilous import, forbidding all expectation of quarter, even in case of submission. Where this cry originated, I know not; for, to do them justice, it was no part of the American policy to render the war one of extermination; but that it did sound over the noise of the strife, and was repeated from man to man, I have the evidence of my senses for declaring. Yet I much question whether it did not, upon the whole, prove serviceable to us. If any man had previously entertained an idea of surrender, the shout of "No Quarter!" caused him instantly to abandon it; and hence all fought like persons labouring under the sure conviction, that their lives must pay the forfeit either of cowardice or insubordination.

There was, upon the summit of the right bank, a stripe of low underwood, of the slender cover afforded by which we gladly availed ourselves. There we lay for a full hour, exposed to a fusillade, which, but for the thick darkness which rendered it comparatively harmless, must have annihilated us in a few minutes; and, strange to say, not an effort was made by the troops in our rear, either to support us in our position, or bring us off. That the alarm was, indeed, communicated to them, a variety of circumstances pointed out. In an instant all the fires in the camp were extinguished; the roll of drums, and the braying of bugles, came up upon the blast, and every other sound which usually accompanies the sudden calling of men from sleep to arms, was distinctly heard. But not a company was put in motion, at least as far as we could discover, though of the extreme peril of our situation, it appeared impossible that our leader could be ignorant. Fortunately for us, however, the Americans were slow to believe that a British general could give up one of his advanced posts to destruction. These indications of a general stir in the camp were no sooner observed, than the fire of the enemy began to slacken, and they gradually withdrew from before a handful of men, not one of whom, had they persevered a few minutes longer, could have escaped. I need not say, that never has a conqueror rejoiced more sincerely at his victory, than we rejoiced this night at the retrogression of our enemies, over whom, however, we were hardly weak enough to triumph, as if by dint of our own personal valour we had repulsed them.

The last shot had been long fired, and the last shadow of an American withdrawn, before we ventured to emerge from the thicket, or feel our way towards the front. Scarcely, however, that no cuncty rallied, we at length took courage to approach the open country; and our satisfaction was far from trifling, when we found that not a vestige of the force, with which we had just been engaged, remained. They were gone, leaving behind them manifest traces of their route in the long grass trodden down into numerous pathways; and great and well-founded was our joy, when we perceived that these all led in a direction decidedly towards the front. Thus assured that the retrogression was no fict to draw us from our place of safety, and expose us to fresh assaults, we proceeded to assume once more the ground from which we had so lately been driven; whilst a messenger was despatched, with all haste, to the rear, in order to acquaint the general with the result of the skirmish.

It was not without considerable difficulty that the latter contrived, during the darkness of this tempestuous night, to make his way across the stream; but he did cross it, and in due time the pioneers, who had retreated on the first fire, returned to complete their tasks. In the mean while, having carefully replaced my sentinels, I sent out parties in all directions, to examine the field, as well as they could, for the wounded and dying. On our side, thirty and twenty men had fallen, of whom fifteen were soon brought in, some more, and others less severely hurt; but of the enemy no more than six were discovered, and of these, all, except one, died before medical assistance could arrive. That the number of wounded among the Americans fell short of ours, I can hardly believe: for their dense order exposed them terribly; and our fire, though more broken than theirs, was not less deliberate: but being very superior in numbers, they doubtless removed all that appeared capable of removal when they retreated; and perhaps these were left behind, only because they failed by their cries or motions to attract the notice of their retreating comrades. Be this, however, as it may, it is very certain that we could testify to the destiny of no more than six wounded men of our assailants, whilst, as I have already stated, our own wounded fell not short of twenty-three. Nor was the proportion between the numbers killed on both sides very different. Seven British, with only three Americans, were found dead when daylight came in; and hence, unless it be supposed that they removed their dead also, the loss experienced by us was, even in point of numbers, far greater than that suffered by the enemy. But I am anticipating.

It might be about one or two o'clock in the morning when the Americans retreated; from which period, however, up to the return of dawn, no fresh alarm occurred. As may well be believed, that was to us a period of no common anxiety and interest. It is true that the general was no sooner made aware of our deliverance than he ordered up an entire battalion, for the double purpose of supporting us, and more effectually covering the operations of the artificers; but even the presence of this large force in our rear was far from rendering us satisfied with our position, or allaying that agitation and excitement which the events of the earlier part of the night had occasioned. No man closed an eye; whilst all watched, with an impatience the most unbounded, the gradual approach of light. To add to our sources of grievance, the storm which had hitherto confined itself entirely to wind, broke up into passing, but tremendous showers. They were cold and cutting, driving furiously from the north, and partaking as much of the character of hail as of rain; and they came not unaccompanied by the usual attendants on such gusts, an occasional flash of lightning and burst of thunder. The effect of all this was, it must be confessed, extremely fine—at least it would have been considered so, had it occurred at any other season, or under different circumstances; but we already felt the influence of too many causes of excitation, not to feel that such an addition to them was far from being agreeable. True, the lightning laid bare, from time to time, every surrounding object. We could distinctly observe, for example, as often as a flash occurred, not only the chain of videttes leaning on their firelocks, but the trampled grass where the light had taken place, with caps, pouches, arms, and even bodies scattered over it; whilst the same blaze satisfied us for the moment, that no fresh columns were hovering near, nor fresh ambuscades threatening us. But there was an irritability about us which caused us to derive from such displays no gratification whatever; indeed the very sound of the thunder was distressing, as all loud noises are, to men who labour under nervous agitation. In a word, the night, though marked by no fresh adventures, passed painfully and heavily away; and we hailed the first streaks of dawn with a degree of delight, for which I am sure there was no solid foundation in the circumstances by which we were surrounded.

CHAPTER VIII.

There was no necessity on the morning of the 18th for any particular exertion of authority in order to get both the pickets and the supporting battalion under arms. The former, indeed, from the close of the nocturnal encounter, had not quitted their ranks, merely sitting down upon the ground, with their firelocks in their hands; the latter, if they slept at all, slept so lightly, that the faintest cry sufficed to rouse them. And it was well for us that such precautions had been taken. Though unsuccessful in their night attack, the Americans appeared determined not to permit the construction of our bridges to proceed without interruption; for the morning was yet grey and obscure when a large body of infantry, supported by a few cavalry, were observed moving towards us.

Not a moment was lost on our side in making proper preparations to meet and repel the threatened attack. There was a small wood or rather copse upon the right, somewhat in advance of our line of sentries, which we immediately pushed forward to occupy; whilst the regiment in support hastily passed the stream, and took up the ground which my picket had abandoned. At the same time a couple of six pounders were planted under the ridge of a rising ground, so as to enfilade any column which might approach the spot where the workmen were still busy; and a company of light infantry, being thrown in extended order forward, lay down, for the sake of concealment, in the long grass. It is to be observed, that the country immediately in our front chanced to be particularly clear and open. The forest, parting, as it were, to the right and left, gave room to a bare district, full of hills and valleys and natural inequalities, along which a formidable force of Americans was now approaching, with the evident intention of driving back our outposts, and breaking down the bridges already in a state of forwardness.

Every man who has faced danger by night as well as by day, must be aware, how different his sensations are on each of these occasions. Having ample light to direct us, and seeing clearly how and from what quarter we were about to be assailed, our arrangements were made and our posts assumed with perfect coolness; and as the storm had died wholly away, and a clear but frosty atmosphere succeeded, we made ready in the highest spirits to give the Americans a reception. They came on, for a while, in compact and regular order, the head of their column covered by clouds of skirmishers, who pressed forward apparently in confusion, but with every demonstration of courage, till, having reached the brow of an eminence about long musket shot from our position, they halted, as if irresolute what further course to pursue. From the height of the swell on which they stood, we were at no loss to conjecture that they had obtained a perfect view of our dispositions; and their evident wavering gave testimony that these were not according to their wishes. Nevertheless, it seemed as if some spirit moved during than the rest at last gained the ascendancy; for after a pause of several minutes, the skirmishers again pressed on, and the column began to descend.

These movements were no sooner ascertained than our riflemen threw themselves each behind a tree or knoll, and the light infantry, rising from their places of concealment, assumed an attitude of defiance. For half a minute perhaps, or something more, all remained thus; till, the enemy arriving within point blank range, our bugles sounded, and a dropping and desultory tirailade began. It was kept up with considerable warmth on both sides, the enemy sometimes pressing forward, at other times retiring; but on our part no change of ground was effected, for our sole object was to maintain ourselves where we were, and keep the assailants in check. As the column advanced, however, our light infantry gradually and reluctantly fell back, till at last they fairly turned the copse, and we riflemen were fain to withdraw, in order to escape capture. But we had not thus long held our post for no purpose. Of the enemy's skirmishers several were seen to drop, and many more to steal away like men disabled, whilst their column itself received one well-directed volley, just as it gained the left of the copse, and was preparing to deploy.

In the meanwhile the battalion in rear had formed line, and advanced so far as to render the escape of the skirmishers safe and speedy. Opening to the right and left, that its front might be left clear, we threw ourselves on either flank; and the enemy deploying at the same moment, a close and desperate contest was anticipated.

But before a musket was fired on either side, the enemy began suddenly to waver, and all the exertions of their officers failed in preserving order in the ranks. At this moment, our guns, which had hitherto been kept with great judgment concealed, were run to the brow of the hill, and opened with round and grape. They were admirably served; and the first discharge striking full into the American line, the confusion, which had already begun, became complete. They turned and fled, not so much as a skirmisher pausing to cover them; and though we pursued with all haste, firing from time to time as an opportunity offered, they escaped with the loss of some eight or ten men killed and wounded. This was the last effort made to interrupt our operations, or hinder our passage of the creek; and the remainder of the day was spent in quiet, as well at the outposts, as in camp.

In the mean while, the working parties, so far from intermitting in their tasks, toiled on with increased diligence and in greater numbers. Not one bridge, but three, were by this means completed, each capable of bearing the heaviest ordnance which we had brought with us into the field; and an advance, as the immediate prelude of a general action, was talked of, as the occurrence of the morning.

Being relieved from the dangerous and toilsome duty of outpost, the 18th was spent by me, partly in the refreshment of a sound sleep, and partly in examining the nature of the position occupied by our army. It was a range of heights, which advanced on the left till it became parallel with the course of the Hudson and gradually shelved away towards the right, where it ended in a valley. Short as our sojourn here had been, General Burgoyne appeared to have bestowed much labour on its fortification; for there were breastworks here and there, a redoubt in the centre, and a battery covered by a ditch to enfilade the whole. Besides this, he had constructed several forts, in which his stores of provision and other necessities were laid up, and the bateaux and vessels were all moored under cover of our guns, close to the extreme left of the line. To say the truth, the ground appeared to be chosen with some judgment, as well as strengthened with considerable skill, though it may admit of a question whether both the judgment and skill exhibited would not have been greater, had no pause, beyond that of a few hours, been made here.

Nothing fell during the night, either to the army at large or to myself in particular, worthy of being repeated. The Americans, as if satisfied with the results of their former attempts, did not molest us; and my private meditations received no interruption from any renewed applications on the part of Fraser, or our chief. But on the morrow affairs assumed a widely different aspect. An hour before sunrise the whole army formed in three columns of march, each fronting one of the bridges which had been constructed for it; and as soon as there was light enough to distinguish objects at the distance of a mile, the long expected and long wished for movement began.

As this was certainly one of the most memorable steps taken during the whole campaign, and may be said with perfect truth to have decided our fate, it may not be amiss, if I lay before you a minute and particular account of it.

Having already described the nature of the position occupied by the British army previous to its advance, it is not necessary that I should say more than has been said on that subject. With respect to the enemy, again, they had withdrawn from Saratoga several weeks before, and having established themselves at Stillwater, about half way between the former place and Albany, it was expected that they would there abide an encounter. We were the more confirmed in this notion, as several deserters came in with intelligence, that General Gates was busily engaged in the erection of works; that he had recalled Arnold from Fort Stanwix, whither on the alarm of Colonel St. Leger's successes he had hastened; and that all the militiamen who could be prevailed on to bear arms, were moved into the camp, and there enrolled in battalions. It is hardly necessary to add, that the site of our own camp, which we quitted on the 19th, was not many leagues distant from that of General Gates. We calculated, indeed, on reaching the vicinity of the latter an hour or two before sunset, provided no attempts were made to harass or interrupt us by the way; and we looked forward to the 20th, as to the day which should decide the fate of New England, as well as of the brave army which was now invading it.

With respect to the general bearings of the country which divided one corps from the other, almost enough has been stated to convey to your minds a tolerably accurate conception. For a mile or two beyond the stream, little or no wood intervened; but there were several valleys, hemmed in on each side by hills; and one which, from its peculiar roughness, as well as the rugged nature of its banks, deserves to be styled a ravine. Across that, it was necessary for our troops to move; and as it chanced to be pretty extensive, stretching on one side almost to the river, whilst on the other it pushed into the woods, a good deal of caution seemed necessary, in order to avoid being arrested there. I have said that the army formed this morning in three distinct columns of march; the following is the order which these assumed, and the routes which they followed.

On the left of the whole, were arranged the brigade of General Reidesdel, with the entire park of artillery under the command of Major-general Phillips. This column pursued the main road, which wound through the meadows parallel with the Hudson, and was covered in its progress by a detachment of rangers, led on by a gallant Hessian called Rembach. The right column, again, consisted of Brigadier-general Fraser's corps, sustained by Colonel Breyman's Germans, which made a circuit so as to pass the ravine without plunging into it, and afterwards to protect the advance of the centre or main body. Its front and flanks were covered by the marksmen, by the Canadian companies, and the Indians; who struck off towards the woods, as most convenient for their particular style of fighting. Between these detached corps moved the main body, under the immediate orders of General Burgoyne. It was directed to advance straight to the front; to descend one side of the glen and mount the other, without pausing; and to form on the former height, where it might wait in comparative safety till the detached corps should have made good their passage, and resumed their communications. Finally, one regiment, the 47th, was left behind, partly as a reserve and partly to defend the batteries and stores; whilst proper signals were agreed upon, to give notice of the progress which each corps was making, should they become unavoidably separated the one from the other.

Being myself attached to the right column, I can pretend to give no very exact or regular account of the movements either of the left or centre; for, the moment when the word was given to advance, all took the directions severally pointed out to them. For ourselves, we moved on, following the bend of a semicircular hill, till we became lost in the mazes of a forest apparently interminable; but we met with no opposition during a march of some hours, even our skirmishers failing to discover an enemy, though most assiduous in looking for him. We heard, indeed, soon after our separation from Burgoyne's column, a desultory fire of musketry, as if his advance were engaged with an American picket, or some ambuscade had been beaten up and dispersed; but as the sound manifestly inclined every moment more and more to the rear, it created no feeling of uneasiness either among men or officers. On the contrary, a thousand rude jokes were bandied about, especially among the younger men, and those least accustomed to the nature of American warfare; and even some veterans scrupled not to express their ardent desire that the Yankees would hazard an action for once, on what they were pleased to term a fair field. For my own part, the recollection of what Yankees had done at Bennington taught me to think of them more respectfully than many of my neighbours; and though, like them, I could not but regard our opponents as more formidable in an inclosed than an open country, I was far from supposing that they would prove themselves contemptible in either situation. Nay more, I knew from a variety of circumstances, that the Americans had of late acquired a degree of confidence, for which we hardly gave them credit. Their attacks upon my own picket, though not very judiciously managed, displayed, nevertheless, no little spirit of enterprise and daring; and however anxious I might be to see things brought to the issue of a battle, I confess that I looked forward to that event with some apprehension. Still, my confidence in the people around me was boundless; and if I did not exactly join in the taunts and gibes with which they thought fit during the present movement to amuse themselves, I at least pushed on as resolutely determined as any to do my duty, whenever I should be called upon to do it.

The orders given to us at starting were, to gain the extremity of the ravine with as little delay as possible; and then, declining to the left, to take possession of a lofty eminence which overlooked the crest of the range of hills which the centre and left columns were ascending. A journey of two hours brought us to this point, where, just as the woodlands began, the valley ended, and we commenced our march in echelon towards the left, without having as yet been called upon to fire a musket or deploy a company. This movement, however, had hardly been made, when the report of several cannon gave intimation that more than a skirmish was impending; and we pressed forward in the firm expectation of being engaged as soon as we should clear the thicket and emerge into the open country. It can hardly be said that our expectations were without foundation. It is true that we were not instantly moved up to oppose a hostile line, nor yet brought at once under the range of the enemy's artillery; but the first spectacle which presented itself was a heavy column of Americans in full march to fall upon our main body. The latter had, it appeared, passed the ravine previous to our arrival at the height which we were directed to occupy; and the former, not expecting a second column to debouch from woods which they had regarded as impervious, were preparing to assault what they considered the extreme right of the British line.

As yet little else than an exchange of cannon shots had passed between the hostile armies, when the head of our column showing itself upon the hill, the enemy instantly halted, and the firing ceased. For a moment, and only for a moment, all things remained quiet; but the Americans, suddenly facing about, began to counter-march, and in less than a quarter of an hour were lost to our view. They fell back, however, not like men bent on a precipitate retreat, nor yet with the wavering step which usually characterises the manoeuvres of generals doubtful what course to pursue, but promptly, briskly, and in admirable order, giving us the best ground for supposing that their plans, instead of being deranged, were merely altered. Whoever entertained such ideas at the moment, was certainly not mistaken in the ground on which he formed them; for in as short a time as the state of the case would permit, we received evidence enough, that a new arrangement of attack had been made, and was already in process of being pursued.

Our troops had all come up, and were in full possession of the hill, when there arose suddenly from the extreme left a fire of musketry, which continued in volleys, like the rolling of drums, for several minutes. How or where this was going on, it was impossible for us to say; for though our position was a commanding one, not only the natural inequalities of the ground, but a good deal of wood scattered here and there, hindered us from seeing farther towards the left, than the post occupied by the centre column. It appeared, however, that even this attack, fierce as it must have doubtless been, was not that on which the enemy mainly depended for success. Before we could well arrange our thoughts, far less reply to the questions which each eagerly put to the other, a fresh operation developed itself, and the main body became warmly, and, as it struck us, very unequally engaged, at a moment when such an event was least expected. A corps of some four or five thousand men, led on as we afterwards heard by General Arnold, suddenly pushed against the left of Burgoyne's division; and a contest began as warm and as well contested as it has ever been my fortune to witness, either as an actor or spectator.

To oppose this tremendous assault, only three British battalions, and these extremely weak, could be brought up. So well had the enemy arranged matters, that for nearly four hours our left could bring no assistance to the centre, nor even one flank of the centre support the other; whilst we upon the right had received orders so decisive on no account whatever to give up the high ground, that Fraser, though as enterprising an officer as any in the service, felt himself perfectly paralysed. We were accordingly condemned to stand passive spectators of an affair, in which nothing short of the most determined courage, as well as a state of discipline the most commendable, could have saved a whole brigade from utter annihilation. As I am speaking to men who have themselves served, and know how laudably jealous regiments are of their renown, it would be unjust in me to conceal the numbers of the corps which on that day covered themselves with glory. They were the 20th, the 21st, and the 63d, who, from three o'clock in the afternoon till seven in the evening, remained unbroken under a fire which left not one fourth of their originally inadequate numbers fit to do duty.

Whilst this was going on, General Fraser, whose impatience was sufficiently manifested by his look and gestures, despatched aide-de-camp after aide-de-camp to General Burgoyne, requesting permission to move from his vantage ground, should it be only for a time. What became of these messengers it is not for me to surmise; but as I happened to be near the general during the greater part of the day, I can testify that not one returned,—a contingency which failed not to increase, to a degree beyond all endurance, the anxiety under which that gallant fellow had previously laboured. At last, despairing of receiving instructions, he determined to act for himself. Leaving a body of German grenadiers to defend the hill, he gave the word for the rest of the brigade to advance, and in two seconds we were in full march, upon the flank of the American column of attack.

It was a splendid spectacle to behold the cool and soldier-like manner in which General Arnold disposed himself to keep in check this bold advance. Wheeling up a couple of his rearmost battalions, he caused several hundred riflemen to extend across the open country, and then urged them forward to meet the Marksmen and Canadians, who covered the approach of Fraser's column. No great while elapsed ere we were engaged. The enemy, however, knew their ground; they were well drilled, admirable shots, and by no means deficient in bravery; and hence, though bravely attacked by men not more ignorant than themselves in the art of skirmishing, they would not be driven in. Even the advance of Breyman's corps in solid column hardly succeeded in moving them; nor is it easy to say what result might have ensued, had not other aid been at hand. But at this critical juncture a fresh force came up from a quarter where we scarcely expected it; and the victory, which for so many hours had hung doubtful, finally inclined to the side of the British arms.

I have said that the enemy, on observing the arrival of Fraser's corps on the high ground at the right of the ravine, suddenly suspended the attack which they had at first directed against our centre, and turned a heavy column, supported by a couple of light guns, towards our left. This soon fell in with General Reidesdel's brigade, with which it exchanged several close and well-directed volleys; but, contenting himself with alarming these troops, the officer in command of the Americans immediately withdrew again, and united himself with the corps which General Arnold was preparing to lead against the regiments above specified. Some light troops were, however, left, if not sufficient to hold the wood, at all events capable of embarrassing the movements of a column incumbered rather than assisted, in a close country, by the presence of a numerous artillery; and these contrived, by dint of repeated demonstrations, to impose for some time upon General Reidesdel, so as to hinder him from detaching any portion of his force to the assistance of Burgoyne. General Philips, however, who accompanied Reidesdel, and took charge, in a peculiar manner, of the park, was not slow in seeing through the veil which sufficed to blind the eyes of his brother officer. As the sound of firing increased on his right, he became more and more convinced, that to their column no serious injury was intended; and he at length prevailed upon General Reidesdel to sanction a movement with four guns and a battalion towards the scene of action.

Driving in the American riflemen, General Philips succeeded, by dint of extraordinary perseverance, in making his way through the wood. He arrived just as the 20th, after behaving with a degree of gallantry almost unprecedented, had begun to give way, and the enemy were pushing forward to occupy a point, from which they might have enfiladed the other battalions, already more than sufficiently pressed. Philips saw this, and made haste to remedy the evil. He dashed forward, bringing with him only a few followers, rallied the broken regiment, led it back in the most magnificent style to the charge, and then hurrying away to the right, brought up his guns to the edge of the wood, from which they opened a tremendous fire of grape and canister upon the enemy's flank. The effect of these arrangements became manifest in a moment. After a brave but ineffectual attempt to carry the cannon at the point of the bayonet, the Americans were compelled to give way; and fresh troops joining the 20th already advancing to the charge, the rout became complete. Nor was the case different on our side. The riflemen, perceiving that their comrades were in full retreat, fell back with precipitation on their support, which in its return retired upon the column from which it had been drawn, and that being exposed to a sweeping fire from Philips's guns, soon lost its order and fled. Yet were our people too much worn down by past exertions, and too much enfeebled, many of them, by wounds, not less than fatigue, to take full advantage of the panic. The closing in of night, likewise, was favourable to the Americans, who, to do them justice, fought bravely and steadily to the last. Their flight, for such, at first, it certainly was, speedily assumed the aspect of an orderly retreat; and they quitted, rather than fled from, a well-contested field.

CHAPTER IX.

Though successful at every point, and perfectly aware that they were so, it can hardly be said that their present victory produced any very remarkable effect upon the spirits of the British troops. It was a new feature in the war for the Americans to become the assailants, and their armies to meet ours in the open field, rivals for glory; nor was there a man amongst us who appeared not perfectly to feel that such a step would not have been taken, were not their numbers much more formidable than our most liberal calculations led us to expect. Again, though undeniably foiled in all their efforts, the colonists had fought like men who possessed confidence in themselves. There was no longer that deference for discipline, which in the earlier campaigns distinguished them; leading them to regard themselves as totally inadequate to meet a regular force, except under cover of an inclosed country, or in the rear of intrenchments. On the contrary, their militia, vying with the continentals, had left behind them all the shelter which the woodlands might have furnished; and marching boldly up to the teeth both of English and German grenadiers, engaged them muzzle to muzzle, and occasionally hand to hand. These facts tended to prove, that the moral superiority which we had hitherto been accustomed to evince, was no more,—and hence that our future successes must arise out of the superior skill of our leaders, not less than from the trained valour of our inferior officers and men.

But it was not on these accounts alone, influential as they doubtless were, that most of us felt disposed to regard the late affair in the light rather of a misadventure than a victory. Our loss in killed and wounded was tremendous. Upwards of five hundred men, including some of the most promising officers in the army, had fallen; and that, too, to purchase nothing more than a little empty honour. Among the number of the slain was poor Jones, the destined husband of Miss Marcella. Though he never held up his head from the moment when his mistress's murder was communicated to him, and declined all intercourse even with the most beloved of his former friends, Jones was too much of a soldier, not to speak of him in the light of a man of honour, ever to neglect his duty because of the pressure of private grief. Wherever his post might be, there he was sure to be found; and to the last he remained, in heart and affections, as warmly devoted as ever to the cause which he had espoused. It was, indeed, abundantly evident, that to him life possessed no farther attractions. Unless unavoidably hindered by other matters, he took part in every skirmish, exposing himself with the greatest deliberation to the enemy's fire; and to-day he met the fate which no man could doubt that he had long coveted. He fell covered with wounds when defending the guns of which he was in charge, and was found lying beside two Americans, both of whom, in all probability, perished by his hand.

As soon as the firing had totally ceased, and it was ascertained that the enemy had withdrawn, orders were issued for the concentration of our divisions on the field of battle; and the whole army made ready to bivouack on the crest of the hill which had been so long contested. Whilst this was going on, parties went abroad in all directions, to collect such of the wounded as had not been removed during the fray; and the return of these with their melancholy burdens, presented a spectacle upon which no man could look with indifference. As they passed between the fires, which already blazed through the line, it was piteous to behold the drooping heads and powerless limbs of men who but a few hours before had been our liveliest and most esteemed companions; whilst their shrieks and groans smote fearfully upon the ear, as often as some false step on the part of their bearers caused their wounds to open afresh. Among the number of those thus conveyed to the rear, there was one with whom in the course of service I had become intimately acquainted. It so happened, that the party in charge of him passed the very spot on which, worn out with the exertions of the day, I had lain down to sleep; and the sound of his voice, even in the utterance of a complaint, being recognised, I immediately rose to ascertain whether his situation might not have decided one. It had not. The mutilated creature thus borne past me, was the same with whom I had spent many cheerful hours both by night and day; and compassion for his sufferings getting the better of personal languor, I determined to deprive myself of rest, in order that I might nurse and attend upon him.

It has been already stated, that when the present expedition was first determined upon, such were the notions entertained relative to its facility of accomplishment, that the wives of several officers, some of them incumbered by their children, resolved to follow our fortunes. For a time these ladies travelled in rear of the columns, being conveyed in covered calashes, and tolerably well attended to; and whenever the columns halted, they joined their husbands in camp, and became inmates of tents. But as the season advanced, and the difficulties of the army began to multiply, they kept behind the encampment altogether, and dwelt in huts constructed out of logs, somewhat after the fashion of block houses. By the passage of the Hudson they were compelled to abandon even their block-houses, and once more share the fate of those most dear to them; and now they had taken refuge in certain farm houses, scattered in the rear of our lines, from which they became spectators of the bloody contest of which I have just given an account.

It was towards one of these houses that I followed my wounded friend. On entering, I found every room crowded with mangled wretches, whose cries might be distinctly heard many paces from the door; and in the midst of these were several delicate females, whose humane attentions to the poor fellows no words could adequately describe. There sat the Baroness Reidesdal, administering from her slender stock of wine a few drops to a dying soldier, who could thank her only with a glance from his dim eye and a faint movement of his head; and there too was the lady of Major Ackland, whose heroic behaviour on an other occasion, has obtained for her an immortality of honourable fame. Even the children, and there were three of Lady Reidesdal's, the eldest of whom could not exceed six years, appeared to be aware that they were thrown into a situation of no ordinary interest; for they either sat in a corner perfectly quiet, or moved after their mother with noiseless tread, as if afraid to jar the nerves of the miserable wounded by the slightest noise. I need not say to you that an hospital, on the night after a battle, is at all times a terrible sight; but on no occasion have I visited one with feelings more harrowed, and yet more mixed, than I experienced then.

My friend, who had received several wounds, by one of which his leg was dreadfully broken, was laid upon a little straw in one corner of an inner apartment. Though extremely weak from loss of blood, he still retained his senses, sufficiently at least to recognise my features as I hung over him; and he showed by the glance of his eye, as well by an involuntary movement of his lip, that he was grateful for the compassionate feeling which brought me hither. Alas! I could render but slight service to him. I held the bandage, it is true, which the surgeon wrapped round his body; I laved his side with water, and strove by my voice and gestures to inspire him with hope; but I could do nothing effectual to relieve him, and it was very evident that he was aware of this. So conscious indeed was he that nothing could save him, that not all the remonstrances of the medical attendant and myself could prevail upon him to keep quiet. He struggled hard to speak,—there was something which he manifestly desired to communicate,—but what it was, or to whom it related, I knew not. Poor fellow! the only words to which he succeeded in giving utterance were—"My mother," pointing at the same time to his watch: from which I collected that he wished that memento to be conveyed to her; and he died in something less than half an hour from the moment when he was brought to the hospital. You all know, gentlemen, how perfectly a state of continued warfare blunts the feelings and dries up the sympathies. It would never do were men to mourn "like those without hope" over every comrade who falls in battle; and hence rarely is a tear seen to moisten the cheek of a soldier after he has served his first campaign. But I confess that I was this night weak enough to shed them in abundance. I wept over my poor friend till my very eyes ached; and I quitted his pallet with a weight upon my heart, such as I do not recollect often to have rested there.

Turning away from the discharge of this melancholy duty, I was met by a party of six men, who bore the body of some one in a blanket, and were seeking for a place on which to lay him. They directed their steps to the corner where my unfortunate comrade lay, and finding on examination that he was dead, they instantly, and without ceremony, removed him. I would have remonstrated against this precipitancy, had remonstrance been of any avail; or rather, had I not felt that the corpse could suffer nothing from exposure; but a moment's reflection served to convince me, that the humanity which would have dictated resistance to the measure, was a mistaken one, and I acquiesced in it. Not that I permitted even the lifeless body of one whom I had loved, to be thrown out to the night air. It was laid carefully under a tree till a hole could be dug for it; and then, by the light of torches, I committed it to the grave. These were rapid proceedings, doubtless; but in such a situation, where would have been the advantage of delay? So, satisfied that I had done right, I returned, as fast as weariness would permit, to my watch fire. Beside that, I cast myself down, and being sheltered by my cloak from the dew, and keeping my feet warm by turning them to the blaze, I soon fell fast asleep, in spite of the melancholy which continued to oppress me.

It was still profoundly dark on the morning of the 20th, when the word passed quickly from rank to rank, called the men to their stations. The fires having been neglected some time, had almost all burned low, and a pretty sharp frost having set in, we felt its influence acutely in every joint. For my own part, I rose cold and stiff, my cloak rustling on my shoulders like a garment of ice; and so benumbed were my feet and limbs, that for some minutes after I quitted my lair, it was not without a positive exertion that I hindered myself from sinking. By dint of chafing and beating them, however, I succeeded in gradually restoring the circulation which the intense cold of the night had interrupted; and then, after seeing that the men were in order, and the arms piled at hand, I ran to and fro till something of my natural temperature returned.

Day dawned in due time, and a spectacle was presented to us, of which no man, who has not looked upon the site of a lately fought battle, can form any conception. As far as the eye could reach, the open fields were strewn with broken arms, hats, caps, pouches, bayonets, balls, and pieces of clothing; whilst here lay a tumbril or ammunition wagon dismounted from its axle-tree, and there a gun, abandoned and upset, as if to hinder it from being removed. In every direction the grass was trodden down; long and deep tracks of wheels cut the meadow across and across; and at frequent intervals the very soil seemed scorched, as if quantities of gunpowder had been exploded upon it. Nor were there and no less striking manifestations of yesterday's drama wanting. The dead lay around us in heaps; Englishmen and Americans, men and horses, mingled indiscriminately together; and such had been the desperation of the contest, that in some places the foot of one foe-man touched the very head of another. But the most remarkable objects in this horrid panorama, were several American marksmen, who hung like heroes among the branches of trees.* These persons, who had mounted for the purpose of securing a good aim, and had done considerable execution, wounding among others an aide-de-camp of General Philips whilst in the act of conversing with Burgoyne, soon drew towards themselves a full share of our riflemen's attention. As they furnished admirable marks, and our men were not ignorant how to strike them, very few escaped; and there they still hung, having been caught by the boughs, among which they waved in and fro like the rocking cradles in use among the Indians.

It was General Burgoyne's first business to order out working parties, by whom the dead were collected together, and buried, without distinction of nations, in pits dug to receive them; after which the troops were directed to eat their morning meal preparatory to a fresh movement. The latter occupation being completed, our columns pushed forward, taking a direction rather more to the left; and again halted, a little before noon, within cannon shot of the enemy's lines. Now, then, for the first time since the opening of the campaign, can the hostile armies be said to have come in presence of one another; and as our positions were somewhat striking, it may not be amiss if I endeavour to give you a tolerably faithful description of them.

The Americans, who were now understood to be commanded by General Gates, under whom were Arnold as second, and Schright as third in command, had strongly intrenched themselves at a place called Stillwater, distant about twelve miles from the Mohawk, and double that space from Albany. Their right, which rested upon the main road, as that did upon the Hudson, was rendered perfectly secure by the presence of a strong redoubt, which would have required a series of regular approaches to reduce it; whilst their left, besides being covered by close woods, was protected by numerous abatis, several breastworks, and a battery for heavy cannon. Along the river ran a line of field intrenchments, fleches, and sentry boxes, all of them so placed as to be flanked by the fire from the redoubt, or exposed to a cross fire from each other; whilst over the front of the whole was scattered just so much of thicket as to screen the lines themselves from minute inspection, at the same time that it furnished no adequate shelter to an assailing force. Of the numbers of troops encamped within these lines, it was not easy to form any correct estimate. By some they were rated at twenty thousand, by others at little more than ten thousand men; whilst the truth, as is usual in most cases, probably lay between. But whatever their numbers might be, of one fact we had abundant evidence, that not an hour passed by without bringing in to them some reinforcement. The truth is, that nothing could exceed the spirit of determined resistance which seemed to animate the inhabitants of New England. So far from receiving us, as we had expected to be received, with open arms, they turned out to a man to oppose us; inasmuch that General Gates himself was in the end at a loss how to dispose of the multitudes of volunteers that flocked to his standard. It is very true that a countless proportion of these men knew nothing of parade movements; they were undrilled, unaccustomed to the duties of a soldier's life, and some of them destitute even of weapons; but they were, with few exceptions, men of robust frames and brave hearts, and of their skill in the use of fire-arms we had seen enough not to treat lightly. At the head of this bold though undisciplined band, the American general took post at a point which completely cut off all communication by the great road between Saratoga and Albany; and it became incumbent upon us, if we hoped to reach the former place, either to drive him by force from his advantageous ground, or by dexterity of manoeuvre to turn him there, and to render his position untenable.

* Ramsay, in his History of the American Revolution, says—

"Several of the Americans placed themselves in high trees, and as often as they could distinguish an officer's uniform, took him off by deliberately aiming at his person. Such a mode of action has been characterised by more obstinacy in attack or defence; the British repeatedly tried their bayonets, but without their usual success in the use of that weapon. At length night put an end to the confusion of blood. The 63d British regiment, which was 500 men strong when it left Canada, was reduced to sixty men, and four or five officers. This hard-fought battle decided nothing, and little else than honour was gained by either army; but no success was followed by important consequences; of these, one was the diminution of the zeal and alacrity of the Indians in the British army."—Ed.

To execute one or other of these designs, General Burgoyne had under his orders little more than four thousand men. What with losses in the field, the garrisons left behind at the different forts and landing-places, and the escorts required to guard such stores as were from time to time forwarded, our army had gradually diminished, till now it certainly did not exceed, if it came up to, the number just specified. But the worst of the matter was, that even this trifling force could not, in all its parts, be depended upon. I have said, that, from the hour when our rapid advance ceased and their hopes of plunder received a blight, the Indian warriors began gradually to quit us. There remained now scarcely one hundred Red men in the camp; and the Provincials and Canadians soon began to follow their example, deserting by whole sections every night. When we crossed the Hudson, we carried with us something more than four hundred of these auxiliaries;—on the morning of the 19th, barely two hundred were with their colours; and before sunset on the 21st, scarcely fifty men could be found in a fit state to do duty. All this was bad enough,—bad, as it caused a serious diminution to our actual strength, and doubly bad, as it affected our morale, by diminishing the confidence of true men. Yet was the army in general far from despairing of success. What alone it seemed to desire, was to be led at once against the enemy; and perhaps it is not going too far to affirm, that had that plan been adopted in proper time, it might have been productive of success.

By what principle General Burgoyne's proceedings were regulated, it is not for me to say. Unwilling to retreat, yet not daring to advance, he adopted that middle course which in perilous circumstances never fails to prove a bad one; and having pushed his columns within gun shot of his enemy, he unfortunately halted. This was done upon a piece of ground certainly very favourable, as far as any halting ground could be pronounced favourable in our circumstances; and the general lost no time in adding to the natural strength of his position, by throwing up such works as time and his means would allow. The main body cecamped in a line almost parallel to that of the Americans, upon a range of hills called Brennus's Heights, extending their left so far as to command the road and protect the batteries; whilst on certain low grounds or meadows which lay between the river and the hill, the 17th British, the regiment of Hesse Hanau, and the few Provincials who still adhered to us, took post. As our right was decidedly the weakest point in the line, upon it the greatest care was bestowed by the engineers. Here a redoubt, supported by breastworks and batteries, was erected, the care of guarding which was entrusted to a German brigade; whilst along the centre, and towards the left, we contented ourselves with throwing up a long mud wall, sufficiently thick to shelter the men against musketry, but hardly competent to resist the violence even of grape. Finally, a chain of outposts was pushed forward, about a quarter of a mile in front of the whole, which, winding round in a rearward direction, secured the right flank, and abundantly protected the lines from being turned. I am sure that I speak the sentiments of the whole army, when I affirm, that no man rejoiced in the appearance of security which these intrenchments created. We did not desire to act on the defensive; we were satisfied that to act thus was to throw away our only chance of success; and hence the erection of works gave us no satisfaction whatever, inasmuch as it portended any thing rather than a bold and immediate advance.

In the construction of these fortifications several days were spent, during which few adventures befell worthy of repetition. On the 21st, indeed, a rumour got abroad, that a messenger from Sir Henry Clinton had arrived, and that he brought intelligence of the preparations which that officer was making to march in force to our relief. On more minute enquiry, I found that the rumour was well founded. The man had succeeded, by dint of caution, in passing the American lines, taking care to conceal himself in the woods by day, and to travel only by night; and he brought with him a communication in cypher, indicating that Fort Montgomery, on the Hudson, would certainly be attacked on the 23d at latest. This was, indeed, a cheering piece of news, to which General Burgoyne failed not to reply, sending back the same person with a correct statement of his own plight, and strongly urging the necessity of an immediate diversion; and at the same time two officers were despatched with verbal communications to the same effect, and an assurance that he would certainly wait the issue, if he should find it practicable so to do, till the 12th of October. These, as well as many others, each of which took a separate route, tell, one after another, into the hands of the enemy; but of that fact we knew nothing at the time, and therefore I am only anticipating the events of my story.

CHAPTER X.

It is not necessary to give any minute detail of the manner in which our time was spent from the 20th of September, when first we assumed our present position, up to the 7th of October. Let it suffice to state, that whilst the ordinary routine of duty went on, whilst pickets were maintained, working parties sent forth, and parades duly attended to, every day brought stronger and stronger proof that our situation was far from being a desirable one. In the first place, the weather, which had been heretofore tolerably serene, broke; and heavy rains, succeeded by sharp and cutting frosts, were our daily and nightly portion. In the next place, desertions became every hour more and more numerous, even the British soldiers themselves being infected by the criminal inclination, and in too many instances yielding to it. Then, again, sickness was not wanting; agues, and intermittent fevers, began to make ravages in the ranks: whilst the scanty stock of provisions which we had brought across the Hudson melted daily away. To such a degree, indeed, were the stores diminished, that on the 3d, the general found it necessary to reduce the men's allowance; and we were thenceforth compelled to subsist upon two thirds, occasionally upon no more than one half, of the customary ration. Even with this, however, our misfortunes ended not. A thousand terrible rumors came in to distress us; and unfortunately, these proved, in very many instances, to be well founded.

The Americans, emboldened by our lengthened inactivity, suddenly began to turn the tables, and to assume the offensive in a manner to us the most alarming. They did not, indeed, sally from their lines to attack us in front, but they did what was infinitely more galling; they harassed our convoys, and threatened our communications. Not a morsel of food, nor a barrel of powder could now be brought from the rear, except by dint of hard fighting on the part of the escorts; and of these not a few were cut off entirely, being waylaid and attacked by a force against which they could offer no adequate resistance. In the mean while, our very depots, themselves become exposed to insult, and our strongest forts were threatened. Passing several large detachments across the Hudson, they attacked, almost at the same moment, the landing-place at Lake George, Mount Independence, Fort Edward, and Fort Anne; and so little had these attacks been anticipated, that several of them proved successful. By this means, our depots, a large quantity of boats, many horses, oxen, and carriages, with some hundred men, fell into the enemy's hands; and we saw ourselves completely surrounded in a desert country, through which a way could be made, either to the front or rear, only by the sword.

Notwithstanding these numerous reverses, and the privations to which they gave birth, both the general and his troops continued to wait the issue of events with a degree of patience altogether exemplary. The men performed their ordinary duties, if not with alacrity, at all events without complaining; and not a murmur was heard except when the conversation happened to turn on the probable consequences of these indecisive measures. Among the officers of rank, however, a great deal of anxiety began to show itself. They met together frequently for the purposes of deliberation, some of them making no secret of their dissatisfaction; but the same unsteady course was pursued nevertheless, and the same policy persevered in. At last it became apparent to every one, that something decisive must be attempted before long. Our stock of provisions, which had never been very abundant, was now almost exhausted, and whence to receive a supply, no one could tell; whilst the latest hour at which we promised to abide Sir Henry Clinton's movements, was at hand. It was accordingly surmised, that a retreat, or an advance, would be attempted immediately, and every hour gave to the supposition an increased degree of plausibility.

It might be about noon on the 7th of October, when the light troops, together with General Ridesdel's brigade, and a part of that of General Philips, received orders to form, and march to the right of the camp. The force thus put in motion amounted to barely fifteen hundred men, so cruelly were our numbers diminished by deaths and desertion; but upon what service it was about to be employed, none except the generals in chief seemed to be aware. That Burgoyne would risk an assault with a corps so inadequate, could not for a moment be imagined; yet the rest of the army was left within the lines, strict injunctions having been given that they should not quit their ground, unless expressly commanded to do so. I am aware that General Burgoyne in his public despatches has represented this manoeuvre as one of reconnaissance merely. He was desirous, as he himself states, to ascertain whether the enemy's left could be turned, at the same time that he sufficiently guarded against any attack upon his own position; and it is but fair to believe that the account of the matter which he has given, is correct. But whether it be so or not, of one thing I am quite certain, that we had scarcely cleared our intrenchments, when we assumed a regular order of battle. Whilst Philips and Ridesdel, each at the head of a separate column, threatened the centre and left of the American lines, our brigade pushed off for the wood, with the design of penetrating, should it be found practicable, into their rear, and alarming them for their communications.

We had proceeded some way, without meeting an enemy, or suffering further inconvenience than the natural inequalities of the ground presented, when our attention was forcibly drawn to the fate of our comrades by a heavy firing of muskets on the left. At first it was loose and irregular, as if the advanced parties had fallen in with the enemy's pickets, and were engaging them; but it became every moment more and more serious, till at last it increased into a roar. By and by the same sounds were distinctly heard issuing from other quarters of the field, accompanied by repeated and quick discharge of artillery, till at last not a doubt could be harboured that the whole army was sharply engaged, not as assailants, but as defenders. Our commanding officer instantly called a halt. To have continued his progress at a moment when the lines were threatened, would have been to expose himself to destruction, without causing any advantage to other divisions; so he determined to take ground to the left,—that he might at least ascertain how affairs were going, before he completely and irretrievably committed himself and his party.

A rapid march of half an hour's continuance brought us to a point, from which we could obtain a correct view of the condition in which affairs stood. At the extreme left of our works was a battalion of grenadiers, at the head of which was Major Ackland, upon which a fierce attack was made by a strong body of Continentals. By and by, a second corps of Americans threw itself against the Germans, who communicated between the grenadiers and the left of the line; whilst almost at the same time the line itself was not only assailed in front, but threatened by a moving column on its flank. To check the progress of that column, the marksmen, with the light infantry that accompanied them, moved forward, and the 24th regiment coming up soon after, a fierce contest began. Of the changes of ground which now took place, we were vain to attempt any accurate or minute account. All that I recollect of the matter is, that after sustaining a tremendous struggle, the left of our regular line gave way, and the light infantry were in consequence commanded to retreat, and to form again in a certain half cleared field en potence. Here we were furiously assailed by Morgan's riflemen, one of the most distinguished regiments in the American service: but we held our ground stoutly, till General Fraser himself rode up, and again directed us to retire.

The truth is, that the enemy had by this time succeeded in overpowering both the right and centre of our columns; which falling back in disorder, left an open space to the Americans by which to enter the intrenched camp. General Fraser no sooner beheld how matters were going, than quitting his own charge, he galloped off towards us, and joining us to the 24th regiment, which still retained its ranks, he led us briskly towards the point which was already all but won by the Americans.

We succeeded in getting there before them, and drove them back from the very base of the parapet at the bayonet-point; but it was at the expense of one of the most valuable lives in this army, if not in the service at large. General Fraser had just enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing his skillful movement crowned with success, when a musket ball pierced his side, and he fell mortally wounded into the arms of one of the men. He was instantly carried to the rear, leaving it as his last request, that we would on no account abandon the works, but defend them whilst a man remained alive, or a single cartridge continued in our pouches.

Nothing dismayed though universally grieved at the fall of this gallant officer, our people continued to maintain themselves with so much obstinacy, that the enemy were at last fain to desist, and withdrew to the distance of about half a mile from our front. Unhappily, however, the same obstinate determination not to be forced, was not shown at every point in the line. A corps of Brunswickers, at the head of which was Colonel Breyman, being attacked in their intrenchments, gave way almost at the first fire; and though covered not only by a breastwork, but by a row of stout palisades, they abandoned both, and fled in extreme confusion. The Americans were not slow in taking advantage of the panic. Desisting from efforts against the grenadiers, as well as against ourselves, they poured in great force through the opening thus made; and the wings of our army were in consequence cut off from all communication one with another. Several attempts were indeed made to recover the lost ground, Colonel Breyman, rallying his Brunswickers, did his best to cheer them forward, and led them so far as to receive a well directed volley from the Americans; but that volley taking effect upon himself, as well as upon almost all the bravest of his officers, the regiment again broke, and no efforts of other leaders succeeded in restoring order.

It was, perhaps, a fortunate matter for us, at a juncture so critical as the present, that the increasing darkness compelled the enemy to refrain from following up their advantages. So complete was the confusion into which most of our regiments were thrown, that the consequences of another attack might have been fatal; for besides that we had lost many of our best men and officers, the survivors were universally ignorant not only of the fate of their comrades, but, I had almost said, of their own. That the Americans had carried our works, soon became generally understood; and as no one could tell where they had penetrated, or how far they had proceeded, no one rightly knew whether to regard himself in the light of a prisoner, or the reverse. Besides, the regiments were all broken and dispersed. Men were separated from their own officers, officers were separated from their own men; and whether those whom he could not discover in what he believed to be his proper place, were dead or alive, it was impossible for any individual to tell. When the firing ceased, we accordingly lay down, each man where he stood, without respect to persons; and of the fate which might await them when the morrow's sun arose, all were as ignorant, as many were perfectly indifferent.

Such was our condition (I speak at present of the little corps to which I was personally attached), when a messenger arrived from General Burgoyne, directing that we should change our position, by a route which he was commissioned to point out. Our people stood instantly to their arms, and preserving a silence the most profound, passed rapidly, but in tolerable order, to the rear. By and by, we reached the stream, on the banks of which I had a few weeks ago sustained a skirmish; and crossing it by the bridge, we soon found that the army was in full retreat. But the retreat was not of long continuance. Having attained the height on which our camp formerly stood, we ascertained that there all the rest of the brigade had assembled; and piling our arms, we made ready to pass the night, in a frame of mind by no means such as need be envied.

Having nothing eatable in my haversack, nor any thing except water with which to quench my thirst, I had thrown myself down by the side of a fire, with the design of forgetting at once present troubles and future cares in sleep when my kinsman young Fraser, whom, since the Americans last withdrew, I had not seen, suddenly stood beside me. "You must rise," said he; "this is no time for repose, and the general has need of you." I rose instantly, and prepared to accompany him. We walked on without exchanging a syllable, till we arrived at the identical house, where, after the action of the 19th, my poor friend expired; and on entering, I found that the scene which it presented on the present occasion, was not very different from that which it had presented then.

Multitudes of wounded and dying men crowded every apartment, through the midst of whom we made our way, till we gained a low door at the extremity of a long passage, where we halted. The door was ajar, and Fraser pulling me softly by the sleeve, made a motion that I should look in. I did so, and beheld standing in the centre of a small room a group of persons whom I instantly recognised as Generals Burgoyne, Reidesdal, Phillips, and Hamilton. A map was lying beside them on a table, which they appeared to examine with great anxiety; though no one spoke a word for several minutes. Fraser again made a signal to keep quiet; it was obeyed, and hy and by the following deeply interesting conversation began.

"Then you persist in believing that he may yet arrive in time?" observed General Phillips, resuming, as it seemed, some topic which had been already discussed. "Unquestionably," replied Burgoyne; "I cannot and will not believe, that Clinton is capable of violating his promise. He knows that our very existence depends upon the vigour of his movements; and rely upon it, that he will not be slow to succour us. We have nothing left for it but to maintain ourselves where we are a few days longer, and trust to his exertions for the rest."

General Phillips, though evidently chagrined, only shrugged up his shoulders, and was silent; but the Baron Reidesdal, taking up the discourse, exclaimed in broken English: "By Gar, General Burgoyne, if you go on thus, waiting and waiting, and doing nothing, we shall all be cut to pieces, and den no man will be able to save us. What for not go on, or go off at once?"

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," answered Burgoyne, in manifest agitation, "it is all very well for you, on whose heads no responsibility rests, to talk of acting with decision, and doing this or that on the spur of the moment. In God's name, how are we to retreat? In God's name, how can we advance? Is not Gates before us with twelve thousand men, flushed with this day's success, and receiving hourly reinforcements? Are not the forts in our rear taken, the opposite bank of the river guarded, our bridge no longer secure, and our provisions expended? Will any of you tell me that this army, worn out with past exertions, and dispirited from defeat, is capable of acting on the offensive? Is it conceivable that, were we to commence a retrogression this moment, we should ever reach Canada? It is absolute madness to think of moving at all. Upon this ground must we conquer or die; at least we must maintain ourselves here, till Clinton come to deliver us."

The above was spoken with so much vehemence, that the rest of the generals saw the utility of attempting a reply. They only looked at one another in silence; till at last, Hamilton renewed the conversation by asking, how it was proposed to make Sir Henry acquainted with the extreme peril of our situation. "You have despatched messenger after messenger," continued he, "not one of whom, as far as we know, has ever reached his destination. Is it wise, or proper, to follow up a system, which, without bringing benefit on the army at large, causes the destruction of so many individuals?" "There is one resource left," replied Burgoyne, "to which, though I use it with reluctance, it has become necessary to have recourse. I do not think it will fail me; and if my expectations prove well grounded, then we are safe."

"Name it!" exclaimed the generals in a breath.

"There, gentlemen, you must excuse me," replied Burgoyne. "In this instance, so much must depend upon the prudence of the agent, that it were unfair towards him to create additional difficulties, by extending my confidence to any besides himself."

"Then why are we here?" asked Phillips, angrily. "It is a mere mockery of a council of war, first of all to consult us, and then neither to adopt our sentiments, nor other reasons for their rejection. For my own part, I wash my hands of all consequences, be they what they may."

"I called you together, sir," observed Burgoyne, "with no view whatever of seeking to share with you the responsibility which I alone must bear. Neither have I solicited your advice in any thing. I simply wished to make you acquainted with my own resolutions, and the causes which led to them. I consider it better, on every account, to abide the chances a few days longer, than to rush headlong upon certain destruction; for let me remind you, that a great deal more depends upon us than a mere regard to our own preservation. From the first, ours has been a force hazarded; circumstances may occur to render its sacrifice essential. Are we not a subsidiary corps, and nothing else,—an army of diversion merely? Suppose, then, we did retire at once, and, though the matter is by no means probable, succeeded in reaching Canada, might not the safety of New York be compromised? No, no. Whilst the faintest hope of successful resistance continues, we must not permit Gates to detach a single man to reinforce Washington;—therefore I say again, that nothing remains for us except to abide where we are, till the effects of a plan, of the miscarriage of which I entertain little dread, be ascertained."

Whether the tone in which this was uttered, satisfied them that remonstrance was useless, or whether they were disgusted by the manner in which their advice had been received, I do not know; but Burgoyne no sooner ceased to speak, than his council withdrew. They retired through a door opposite to that behind which we were standing; and they had no sooner done so, than we entered. The general started, but recognising us instantly, held out his hand to my conductor, and exclaimed, "Ah, Fraser, how I rejoice to see you! You at least can feel for my situation; and what a situation it is! Without a hope of victory, with hardly a chance of escape, how am I to act, or where am I to turn? If I request advice or assistance from them, they cast in my teeth that my own indecision has brought about all these misfortunes; yet not one among them had the candour to speak out, when my proceedings were, what they are now pleased to term, dilatory, and my councils wavering. And even now, God alone can tell whether I act rightly. Perhaps I ought to regard the matter as hopeless, and retreat at once, whilst yet there is a chance of finding the bridge entire, and the opposite bank unoccupied."

"I am afraid, sir," replied Fraser, "that you have already gone too far to recede. To-night, no movement either to the front or rear could be made, without sacrificing your wounded, and abandoning all your stores; and to-morrow, if the enemy be the men that I take them for, we shall have other work upon our hands. Permit me to add likewise, that this is no time for indecision. You have just declared to the generals your determination of abiding the result where you are; you must not supply them with an additional handle against you, by revoking that determination, at least immediately."

"Then you overheard our deliberations?" asked the general.

"In part I did," replied Fraser, "though only in part."

"I am glad of it," exclaimed Burgoyne; "for you, at least, will do me justice, let the result be what it may. You can testify how cruelly I have been thwarted, how barbarously browbeaten, at a moment when above all others, unity of councils was required. Oh, Fraser, if you value your own peace of mind, never listen to the whispers of ambition. No man can tell the miseries of command, till he has experienced them,—no man."

"But your plan, sir," said Fraser, interrupting him, and anxious, as far as might be, to conceal his agitation from me: "it is high time to think of that; and here is your messenger, ready and willing to execute your orders, or perish in the attempt."

"True, true," said the general, "I had forgotten that. If it succeed, we may yet escape the toils;—but that if, Fraser!"

"It must succeed," exclaimed Fraser, "it cannot fail of success, provided only it be acted upon immediately. But there ought to be no farther wavering,—let the young man receive his instructions, and set forth on the instant."

The general paused, as if to consider this proposal, the varying expression of his countenance bearing testimony to the wavering nature of his thoughts. "The plan must be followed up," said he at length, "but not with unnecessary precipitation. Mr. Mordick must pass over under the eyes of both armies, and that can be done only in the day. It were madness, moreover, to set out upon so critical an adventure till the position of the enemy's posts has been ascertained; and the delay of one day more can do no great harm. Besides, the Americans may think fit to offer us battle again to-morrow, and success on our parts would render the step altogether unnecessary. Not a word, Fraser," continued he, observing that my relative was preparing to remonstrate; "my mind is fully made up; he shall not set out to-night. And now, gentlemen, to supper. Whatever my stock affords shall be laid before you; for myself, I must go forth and see how matters proceed in the camp."

The general waited not for a reply, but immediately withdrew.

"There goes as good as as brave, and withal as ambitious a man," exclaimed Fraser, "as any in the British army; yet no more fit to hold a separate command than the bravest sentinel who serves under him. That he possesses talent of a high order, all the world knows; he is eloquent, humane, and as a second unrivalled; but responsibility is a load under which he cannot bear up, and hence all his natural abilities go for nothing. What a career of glory was before him, had he possessed nerve enough to follow it up; and now God grant that both he and his army become not in the end, objects of compassion to their friends, and of triumph to their enemies! But let us adjourn to my tent. I know that the poor man fares as hardly as any soldier in the line; there is something left behind, I believe, in my canteen—let us consume that, and spare his scanty stock." He turned, as he spoke, towards the door, and I followed him with the intention of being his guest for the night, both at bed and board.

CHAPTER XL.

We had arrived at the entrance hall, and were preparing to quit the house, when the sound of female voices, one in evident distress, arrested our attention. We paused, irresolute whether to enter the chamber from which the weeping proceeded, or to pass on at once to Fraser's quarters, when the door was suddenly opened, and the Baroness Reidesdel presented herself. She instantly recognised Fraser, and begged him, "for God's sake, to come in;—for I am in a sad plight," continued she. "Here is poor General Fraser dying in one corner of my room, and Lady Harriet Ackland frantic for the loss of her husband in another; besides a number of unfortunate gentlemen, all more or less severely wounded, thrown in a great measure upon my attentions." There was no resisting this appeal; so we followed our conductress, to become witnesses of a scene, the recollection of which is not likely ever to pass from my memory.

In a small chamber, the earthen floor of which was but scantily covered with straw, lay seven officers, two of whom, the German Colonel Breymann and our own gallant brigadier, were already in the agonies of death. The colonel, whose wound was in the head, appeared to suffer no pain; a heavy breathing alone, with an occasional quiver of the lip, giving testimony that life had not departed; the general groaned audibly, like one in acute torture; and spoke from time to time with the strong voice of a man whose sufferings promised to endure many hours, though death must in the end remove them. He had received a musket ball in the side, which passed completely through the body, rupturing the stomach in its progress; and he now lingered on, a martyr to pangs as violent as such a wound was calculated to produce.⁶ Nearly opposite to him sat, or rather reclined, Lady Harriet Ackland, on one end of a couch, her face buried in her handkerchief, and sobbing audibly; whilst the Baroness Reidesdal's children were lying, like seraphs in music, in the arms of the assiduous nurse. When the Major, Ackland, it appeared, had been wounded in the late action, as common rumour reported, mortally; at all events he had fallen into the hands of the Americans, and was now a prisoner. It would be hard to determine which of these persons appeared to me most deserving of compassion. The wounded men were, doubtless, suffering, many of them, all that the body can endure of torture; but Lady Harriet's was an agony of mind, in comparison of which the most acute bodily pain were trifling.

"I must go to him," cried she; "wherever he is, and whatever his fate may be, I must share it. The Americans cannot be so inhuman as to refuse permission to a miserable wife, to attend the bed of her dying husband. Oh, God, that I could but see him!—one word, one look of his, would be to me a consolation the most unspeakable."

" ' About three o'clock in the afternoon, instead of the poets whom I had expected to dine with me, I saw one of them, poor General Frasier, brought upon a hand-barrow, mortally wounded. He had been severely wounded, was prepared for death, was immediately removed, and a bed placed in the room, and the surgeons, terrified and trembling in a corner. The noise grew more alarming, and I was in a continual agony and terror, while thinking that my husband would be the next victim. I was then told that the general was dead. That poor general said to the surgeon, ' tell me the truth: is there no hope ? ' His wound was exactly like that of Major Hargrave; the ball had passed through his body, but unhappily for the general, the ball had not passed through his lungs, as it had done in Hargrave's case. He was distended, and the ball, as the surgeon remarked, passed directly through it. I heard often amidst his groans, such words as these, ' O God! ambition! poor General Burgoyne! poor Mistress Frasier! ' I was then told that the general was dead, and that Burgoyne should be requested to have him buried on the next day, at six o'clock in the evening, on a hill where a breast-work had been constructed. I knew not what to do; the entrance and all the preparations for the funeral were in haste, and the general prevailed in the camp. " — Mémoires de Madame de Rével, i, p. 169.

It was in vain that the baroness used every soothing and consolatory expression which a compassionate heart could dictate, appealing to us, as to persons well acquainted with the truth, to confirm her assurances of the major's safety. Like Rachel weeping for her children, Lady Harriet refused to be comforted; and though we were not scrupulous in passing the rigid line of truth in case so holy, even our asseverations were thrown away upon her. Every moment during which she was absent from her wounded husband seemed an age; and at last it was agreed upon amongst us, that to offer farther opposition would be useless. Though extremely delicate at the best, and at present far advanced in a state of pregnancy, she determined to brave all the hazards of the night, and the enemy; and, throwing a loose cloak about her shoulders, to make her way, as she best could, through the American lines. One consideration, and one only, induced her to pause for a few moments. It was suggested that a letter of recommendation from General Burgoyne to General Gates would at least secure for her civil treatment at the outpost; and as Fraser volunteered to procure that letter, she consented to remain where she was till he should return.

Whilst the unhappy lady sat in a state of comparative calmness, the attention of all present was painfully turned to General Fraser, who retained even to the last moment the feeling of the soldier and the gentleman. Though racked with bodily pain, he looked up from time to time only to express his sorrow that he should thus intrude upon the Baroness, and his sense of her extreme kindness: and then his thoughts seemed to wander to other scenes, and the name of his wife rose, as it were, involuntarily to his lips. "Oh, fatal ambition!" cried he, "how much happiness hast thou robbed me! Alas! my poor wife,—who will comfort her when she hears of this?—and my children,—God, be thou their guardian! To thee, and to my country I commend them." Then suddenly changing his theme, he exclaimed: "Poor Borgynie! tell him that I felt for him even in my dying moments; and say, that I made it my last request to be buried at six o'clock in the evening, in the redoubt which overlooks the town right. It is a foolish wish; but I fancy that I shall sleep soundly there, because my brave fellows built it, and well, I am sure, maintain it." All this was spoken calmly, resolutely, and in the tone of one aware of his situation, and if there occasionally broke from him some hasty expression, no one could doubt that reason enfeebled by bodily pain gave birth to it. Poor fellow! he lingered on till eight o'clock in the morning, and then fell asleep.

In the mean while, Fraser had not been neglectful of the charge assigned to him, nor Burgoyne backward in furnishing the letter of recommendation to the American general. The former returned in as short a space as could have been expected, with the document in question; but the lady's grief again assumed the most distressing appearance, when he assured her that to pass the line of advanced sentries this night was impracticable. The safety of the whole army required, that for the present no intelligence of its' change of ground should reach the Americans; and hence the most positive orders had been issued, that no one, on any pretence whatever, should quit the camp. As there was manifest reason in this, even Lady Harriet, as soon as the first burst of disappointment passed by, could not refuse to see it; and she strove from that moment not only to moderate her own grief, but to assist in alleviating the sorrows of her mutilated acquaintances.*

* "Lady Harriet Ackland," says General Burgoyne, "had accompanied her husband to Canada, in the beginning of the year 1776. In the course of that campaign she had traversed a vast space of country, in different extremities of season, and with difficulties that an European traveller will not easily conceive, to attend, in a poor hut at Chamblee, upon his sick bed." After describing an accident by fire, by which Lady Ackland's tent was destroyed, and every thing they had with them consumed, the General pro-

This accident happened a little time before the arrival of the Hudson River. It neither altered the resolution nor the character of Lady Harriet; and she continued her progress, a partaker of the fate of the advanced corps, and more distressed, as of longer suspense. On the march of the 14th, the grenadiers being liable to action at every step, she had been directed by the major to follow the rear of the column, and to be ready to follow the first company. At the time the action began she found herself near a small unhabited hut, where she alighted. When it was found the action was becoming general and bloody, she moved to the place, the most convenient for the first care of the wounded. This was this lady in hearing of one continued fire of cannon and musketry, for four hours together, and in the midst of the carnage, and the blood of the slain. The grenadiers, that to was in the most exposed part of the action. She had three female companions, the Baroness of Roldesford and the wives of two British officers, who, in the presence of the British, and in the presence of their presence, served but little for com-

Of the issue of this lady's interesting story, a few words will suffice to remind you. Having waited with exemplary patience till a late hour on the following day, she was forwarded with a flag on her sculler, and, embarking in an open boat rowed by two common sailors, proceeded down the river. Torrents of rain descended, from which, alone, under other circumstances, she would have shrunk; but at present her whole soul was engrossed by one idea only, and she pushed on, reaching the point of her destination at ten o'clock at night. Fortunately for her, the American outpost in front of which she proceeded herself, was commanded by a brave and generous officer, Major Dearborn, who received her with all the deference due to her rank, and furnished her with such accommodations as his hut afforded. She remained there till the morrow, her anxiety being in some degree relieved by his assurances that her husband's wounds were not serious; and she finally reached the American head quarters in safety, where the utmost kindness was shown to her. I need scarcely add, that the flattering accounts which she received of Major Ackland's condition, proved to be well founded. He had been shot through both legs, but was doing well; and he returned with his amiable and heroic will to England, as soon as the army of which he formed a part, obtained its liberty. But to return to my own narrative, Having spent some hours with the Baroness Reidesdel, and done our best to comfort both her and those about her, Fraser and myself adjourned to our original place of destination, the tent of the former. It was but a cheerless habitation, destitute of every thing which the common world calls comforts; yet we entered it with a feeling not greatly removed from satisfaction, inasmuch as we found in it at least a place of temporary refuge from scenes harrowing to the best feelings of our nature. "This is a cold welcome, Macdruir," said Fraser; "yet it is the best that I can give. I believe there still remains a morsel or two of salt junk, with a pint of rum, or thereabouts; and since we cannot command better, why we must be content with what we have." So saying, he ordered his servant to produce the viands; and though they were coarse enough, heaven knows, and far from being superabundant, we were too thankful for any means of allaying the cravings of hunger, to experience or express the slightest dissatisfaction with our fare.

Our scanty meal being finished, we naturally entered into conversation touching the state of the army, and the prospects both of it in general, and of ourselves in particular. "Perilous as your undertaking is," observed my companion, "I am by no means sure, that it is not, after all, an enviable one. It is true, that you run some risks. A single imprudent act or hasty expression will betray you, and in that case your death is unavoidable. But your imprudence must be extreme indeed, if it lead to this; and then, should you succeed, how great will be your reward! On our side, again, what is there to cheer or enliven? Twice foiled in action, destitute of provisions, stores, and resources, harassed on all sides by the king's army, and commanded by men who know not their own minds for their own, to what can we look forward, except to fresh disasters, and in the end perhaps to a shameful capitulation? Even your mission, on which I have hitherto counted so much, will, I am satisfied, lead to nothing. No, no, the happy moment has escaped us, and no exertions, however spirited, can now bring it back."

"Then why not say so to the general at once?" asked I.

"Because such an opinion coming from me, would deprive him of all self-command. Besides, things may fall out in our favour, of which we dream not at present ;

fort. Major Harnage was soon brought to the surgeons, very badly wounded; and a little time after came intelligence that Lieutenant Keynell was shot dead. Imagination will want no helps to figure the state of the whole group.

“ From the date of that action to the 7th of October, Lady Harriet, with her usual serenity, stood prepared for new trials; and it was her lot that their severity increased with their numbers. She was again exposed to the hearing of the whole action, and at last received the shock of her individual misfortune, mixed with the intelligence of the general calamity, the troops were defeated, and Major Ackland, desperately wounded, was a prisoner.

The day of the 8th was passed by Lady Harriet and her companions in uncommon anxiety, not a tent, nor a shed being standing, except what belonged to the hospital, their refuge was among the wounded and the dying.

"When the army was upon the point of moving after the halt, I received a message from Lady Harriet, submitting to my decision a proposal of passing to the camp of the enemy, and requesting General Gates's permission to attend her husband. * * * All I could furnish to her was an open boat and a few lines, written upon dry wet paper, to General Gates, recommending her to his protection."

The foregoing must be familiar to many of our readers, but as it is appropriate to the subject, we trust it may not be deemed out of place.—Ed.

and whilst the shadow of a chance remains, Burgoyne must be supported."

"And supported at the expense of my honour, certainly," said I,—"perhaps of my life."

"Your honour runs no risk," replied he, "whilst you act in obedience to your chief's orders—your life, as I have already observed, is in your own keeping."

"But why pursue this wild scheme, if things really be, as you represent them, hopeless? Why not try what an Indian can do? my more, why not allow me an Indian for my guide? and I will set off cheerfully on the instant. It is to the pretended desertion, and to it alone, that I object."

"Will your objections cease to operate, if I lay before you convincing proofs that there is not an Indian attached to the army, who is not a traitor?"

I replied, that such a conviction would certainly go far towards allaying my scruples, and reconciling me to any thing.

"Then your scruples will not long torment you," said he. "You have observed a remarkable warrior in the general's suite,—one Eagle'swing, as he calls himself, a chief of the Six Nations."

I recollected him perfectly; indeed, it was impossible, having seen that man once, ever after to forget him. Among a people celebrated for the exact symmetry of their persons, Eagle'swing deserved to be pronounced positively handsome. Tall, graceful, formed for feats both of agility and strength, he possessed a countenance endowed with an expression of singular acuteness, and an eye which, whilst it shunned the gaze of the individual on whom it was turned, seemed to read his very thoughts, and penetrate his most secret wishes. From the opening of the campaign, he had attached himself, in a remarkable manner, to the person of the general, to whose interests he professed, and indeed appeared to be devoted; and his influence among his countrymen being allowed to be very great, the general scrupled not to bestow upon him a large portion of his confidence. Of this no secret was made; indeed, the general himself spoke openly of the Indian as one of the most useful functionaries in the army. But there were not wanting persons who viewed the red warrior with an eye of strong suspicion; and now for the first time I learned, that my relative was of the number.

"Are you aware," continued he, "that all our messengers, not one of whom has succeeded, went under the guidance of an Indian, recommended by that person? This may amount to no charge against him, I allow; yet, is it not singular, that our plans should have been so aptly frustrated this morning? I know that Eagle'swing was made acquainted with them."

"What you say," replied I, "affords strong ground of suspicion, doubtless, but suspicion is not proof. You promised me proof of the Indian's treachery—let me have it."

"On more accounts than one, I will at least make the attempt," replied he. "Take this rifle," handing me at the same time a short fuscus, and aiming himself with another. "Your dirk is, I see, in your belt; now follow, and do as I do, without asking a question."

He rose as he spoke, and we sallied from the tent.

I was at no loss to conjecture that our expedition was both a secret and a hazardous one; nor did any great space of time elapse ere I discovered its object. Instead of passing openly through the camp, or along the line of advanced sentries, we struck off directly towards the rear, till we had passed head quarter house, when we turned suddenly to the right, and made for the point where the Indian huts were established. As we approached these, a double share of caution became necessary. Though it is not customary among the savages to preserve a regular watch in their encampments, I need scarcely say, that he who seeks to traverse them unobserved, must adopt every imaginable expedient to shun observation; for their acuteness of sense surpasses every thing of which a European can form a conception, and the slightest noise is almost sure to be overheard. With the habits of Indians, however, Fraser was familiarly acquainted. He squatted down as soon as he had arrived within a certain distance of their tents, making a motion to me to follow his example; and our approaches were thenceforth made slowly, silently, and painfully, not upon our hands and knees, but upon our bellies. In this manner we dragged ourselves over the surface of the ground at a rate so tardy, as to be ourselves scarcely aware that we made any progress, till we reached the exterior of a tent, detached from the rest, within which it was easy to perceive that several persons were assembled. Fraser touched my arm, as a signal to keep perfectly still, but to be ready for all chances; and then gently raising one corner of the canvass, all that was within became, in a moment, perceptible.

We saw before us a group of five or six savages, conspicuous among whom was Burgoyne's confidant. They were seated round a dull fire, smoking with all the composure for which the red men are remarkable; and for many minutes after we had attained our stations, a profound silence reigned among them. At last Eagle'swing spoke. As he addressed his companions in the language of his tribe, his speech was to me without meaning; but I could perceive from the involuntary pressure of my companion's elbow against my side, that he perfectly understood it. Well pleased with this, I lay quite still, looking with intense interest at the scene before me; and truly it were not easy to conceive one more remarkable, or more worthy of a master's pencil to represent it. The persons before us were all bedizened with the war paint, which gave to their naturally savage countenances an expression absolutely fiendish. A loose cotton scarf, thrown carelessly over one shoulder, and twisted round the loins, so as to cover half the upper limb, formed the only garment which sheltered them from the influence of the weather; for the moccasins, in which their feet and ankles were wrapped, were intended rather to shield them in the rough passes of the forests, than to protect them from cold or wet. Their heads, again, bald except at the crown, were left wholly exposed, except that a bunch of feathers barbarously surmounted the knot of long black hair in which they prided themselves. They sat upon the ground, each man's tomahawk and rifle laid carefully beside him, and their attitude was illustrative at once of extreme indolence, and the capability of assuming in a moment its very opposite. A profound silence reigned whilst Eagle'swing spoke, the pipes being laid aside that nothing might call off attention; and when he concluded, an obscure sound, resembling rather the snort of a horse than any thing else in nature, gave assurance that his address had been well received. This was hint enough to Fraser. Once more he pressed against my side with his elbow; and letting the curtain fall gently, began to steal silently to the rear. I followed his example in the same manner in which he set it, and in a few moments we were sufficiently removed from the hut to permit his speaking.

"Thank God! Maedrick," said he in a low whisper, "that we took this precaution. There is no room for explanation now; but follow me, and whatever you see or catch, be sure to aid me in destroying it. The second shall be taken in his own snare, or I am not the man I used to be."

Without waiting for a reply, Fraser set off at a rapid pace; and I kept up with him, surprise itself being scarcely allowed to operate, so abrupt and unaccountable seemed to me the whole series of operations.

A few minutes' walk brought us to an open thicket, considerably in advance of the camp, and as the light of the stars enabled me to distinguish, above half musket shot from the right flank of the redoubt. At the edge of the thicket stood a sentry, who challenged as we approached; but Fraser instantly squatting, caused me to do the same, and we lay motionless, and almost breathless for several seconds. By and by the man, whose attention had evidently been attracted, began to relax from his attitude of watchfulness. Casting a careful glance around, and seeing nothing, he once more shouldered his arms, and turning to his left, began to walk backwards and forwards, as he had previously done, on his post. We took care not to neglect the opportunity thus furnished. Advancing in the same quiet way in which we had approached the Indians' tent, we succeeded, after sundry pauses, in gaining the wood; and diverging as near to the soldier as prudence would allow, we lay down,—why, or for what purpose, I knew not.

We had maintained this attitude rather more than half an hour,—on my part in a state of mute astonishment, on the part of Fraser in breathless anxiety,—when the attention of both was suddenly drawn to the rear, by a low, confused, and most unearthly noise. That which roused us was not lost upon the sentry, who did as he had done when we were approaching. He halted, and challenged; but in the present instance he appeared even more speedily satisfied than formerly, for almost immediately after he resumed his walk. It was now our turn to be on the alert, and we were so. We looked abroad, and beheld a huge bear, moving slowly along the skirt of the thicket, and edging, as it were, by degrees and in short circles towards the soldier. At this instant Fraser pulled me by the coat, as if desirous that I should be prepared to act. Now the bear stood still, and now the sentinel in the ordinary course of his beat approached it, when my companion slowly unsheathed his hunting knife, and gathered himself up for a spring. I had no time to form so much as a guess respecting his design, when all at once he rushed from his ambuscade, and the next instant was engaged in a close and desperate struggle with the animal whose extraordinary movements we had been watching. It was speedily ended. Before I could arrive to his assistance, he pierced the monster with many stabs, which, uttering a shrill cry, fell dead at his feet, and displayed the figure, not of a real bear, but of an Indian artfully disguised in the skin of a less savage animal. You will readily believe that my astonishment at this discovery was great, whilst the amazement of the sentry, who immediately recognised his officer, was not less so; but the secret was soon discovered, and it proved to be one of the first importance.

For some time back, such our sentinels as occupied detached and lonely stations, had been observed to disappear in a very unaccountable manner. That the men had not deserted, we had the evidence, in many cases, of their own excellent characters, in all of the positions of their posts, for believing. It was not in our advanced chain that this occurred, from which, if desertion were the object, it might most easily be attained; but invariably in solitary spots; usually in the rear, or on the flank of the camp, and always within the compass of our own ground. Numerous were the efforts made to account for the circumstance, all of which had hitherto proved unavailing. If two men mounted together, nothing of the kind occurred; if a patrol lay up in ambush, they discovered nothing, except occasionally a bear prowling near them; but as sure as one man took upon himself the duty, so sure was he never to return. This happened so frequently, that at last men became timid of mounting; nor could any but the bravest and best soldiers be persuaded to face a danger which they believed to be supernatural.

Our adventure this night unravelled the whole mystery. This bear, which had been seen so frequently, proved to be one of Eagle'swing's followers, by whose tomahawk man after man had fallen; and who, but for our opportune visit to the tent of his chief, might have pursued his bloody career to the close of the campaign.

"I told you," said Fraser to me, "that there was not an Indian in the camp who would be found, on examination, honest in any particular; and here is proof enough that I was not mistaken; but this is not all. Let us first cast this carrion where its companions may not be likely to find it, and then, as we return home, I will convince you, that if the army is to be saved at all, it must be saved by you."

As he spoke, we seized the Indian by the legs, and the sentinel lending his assistance, we soon dragged him into a close part of the thicket. "That done, we left the man to his meditations, and following a course as tortuous as that which we had pursued in setting out, we arrived in due time, and in perfect safety, at the tent."

Of the conversation which followed, a few words will suffice to make you acquainted with the substance. The speech which we had overheard, and which was the cause of our extraordinary movements, contained, it appeared, nothing more than hints of some deep-laid scheme of treachery, the full object of which Fraser had been unable to discover, but to which the murder of the sentry, and the passage of the scout to the enemy's camp, were to be the prelude.

"And now," continued he, "as you professed your readiness to desert in the event of these men being found unfaithful, it remains for me only to hold you to your promise. For once, I believe that Burgoyne has acted prudently. I could not gather that the red skins knew any thing of this device, and therefore we may rest tolerably secure, that it will not be thwarted; though every thing will depend upon yourself. But it is high time to me of seeking repose. To you, and probably to me, to-morrow will be a day of no common exertion; it were a pity to enter upon it with minds and bodies caked by too much watchfulness."

He drew his cloak around him as he spoke, and with as much coolness as if nothing out of the ordinary routine of events had occurred, threw himself at length upon the ground. Though in no degree affected by the drowsiness of which he complained, I instinctively followed his example; and in a few minutes a heavy breathing convinced me that he was in a state of absolute forgetfulness.

CHAPTER XII.

Being now left entirely to my own reflections, you will not be surprised to learn, that these gradually assumed a character, which, in spite of a strong sense of bodily fatigue, effectually hindered sleep from visiting my eyelids. It appeared to me as if the events of the past day, more particularly the occurrences of the last hour, were the mere creatures of a disordered fancy—dreams worked out in the fever of a morning's sleep, not realities involving the most important future consequences. The scene in the hospital, the countenance of Eagleswing, the assembly of savages, with the subsequent deed of blood, all forced themselves in the most grotesque and hideous manner back upon my recollection, till I almost doubted whether I were not even now in a trance, from which it would be a relief of no ordinary kind to awake. Then, again, the thought of what to-morrow might bring forth, was not without its influence. I felt myself pledged to an undertaking, than which I well knew that none could be devised more hazardous; and there were moments when my resolution wavered, almost to sinking, under the prospect. More than once I was tempted to repair to the general's quarters for the purpose of retracting the consent which I had given. But the recollection that my honour was engaged, that my future prospects depended on myself, and that a shrinking back now would effectually ruin them for ever—these considerations served again to steel me. Worn out at length by so many distracting considerations, I determined to think no more; and I closed my eyes firmly together, as if the shutting out of all external objects would assist in dispersing a host of painful ideas. But my efforts proving useless, I ceased to make them, and rising in a sort of desperation walked forth.

The author has here introduced a circumstance which we fear has lost its novelty to American readers.—Ed.

The night, which had hitherto been calm and clear, began now to assume a lowering and threatening appearance. Dark clouds were gathering in the sky, and a low moaning of wind, the prelude to a storm, came up sullenly and hoarsely from the south. I cannot tell why these circumstances should have produced the smallest effect upon me; but certain it is, that I experienced a positive relief from them. It appeared as if the tumult in my own mind had unfitted me from looking upon outward nature, except in a state of uproar; and as the wind became every moment more and more boisterous, my agitation gradually subsided. I walked about for a full hour watching the progress of the storm; and I retired at last to enjoy a sound and refreshing slumber, which the rushing of a heavy rain, and the boisterous roar of a tempest, contributed largely to produce.

Though the storm continued to rage with unabated fury, the troops, as is customary in such situations, got under arms an hour before dawn; but instead of returning to the line as soon as the day broke, they merely piled their arms, and continued on the watch. The truth is, that the enemy no sooner ascertained the evacuation of our more advanced camp, than they possessed themselves of it; pushing forward parties within musket-shot of our new alignment, between which and our pickets, as well as between several batteries on each side, an irregular fire of musketry and cannon ensued. For what purpose this desultory tirillade was kept up, it would be hard to say. On our parts, indeed, it was merely a measure of defence; for our men never fired till compelled to do so by the audacity of their assailants, and ceased again as soon as the latter withdrew; but the Americans persisted all day in drawing on useless skirmishes, which cost a few valuable lives both to themselves and us, without producing any important result. Towards evening, however, both parties appeared to grow weary of so unprofitable a waste of ammunition. The enemy, having vainly striven to drive in a post which General Burgoyne exhibited a firm determination to maintain, all at once ceased their hostilities; and from that hour till after night-fall no firing beyond a distant and random cannonade took place.

Things were in this state when Burgoyne, to whom the last wish of General Fraser had been communicated, issued orders for the assembling of a party to carry that wish into execution. As it was a matter of some moment not to attract greater notice from the Americans than might be, the troops provided for the melancholy ceremony were few in number; Fraser's Marksman only, with a few companies of light infantry, being employed on that service. We began to muster about half past five, at the door of the house where the gallant brigadier lay, and in a quarter of an hour after, his body, wrapped up in a sheet, and covered with a horseman's cloak, was brought out upon a rude bier constructed for the purpose. Four sergeant-majors belonging to his own division, were the bearers, whose moistened eyes and dejected countenances gave testimony to the sorrow that reigned within; and the mourners were Generals Burgoyne, Philips, Reidesdel, and Hamilton, with many others of the highest rank attached to the army. As soon as the body appeared, the word was given to move; and a slow and mournful procession began, a few muffled drums beating the dead march, and an occasional low flourish of trumpets sounding, till having gained the base of the hill, on the summit of which the redoubt stood, the troops opened by sign to the right and left, and the bier with its attendants went forward. At the head of this party walked Mr. Brudenel, the respectable chaplain-general of the army, who faltered forth, in a broken voice, the words "I am the resurrection and the life," till having reached the point where the grave had been dug, a general halt took place. Nothing could exceed at this moment the mournful solemnity of the scene. In the midst of a furious tempest of wind and rain, and surrounded by men whom he had often led to victory, was the gallant Fraser committed to the dust; and as if these accompaniments alone had not been sufficiently impressive for the occasion, another was speedily granted. The enemy, who had planted a battery upon a height immediately opposite to the redoubt, ignorant, no doubt, of the cause of the assembly, no sooner beheld a crowd of persons together, than they opened a heavy fire upon us. The balls struck repeatedly into the mound of soil at the edge of the grave, casting dirt into the faces both of the clergyman and his auditors, whilst the wild whistling of the gale replied in melancholy cadence to the roar of the cannon which played upon us. Strange to say, however, not a man received an injury. The service was concluded, the earth piled upon the deceased, and the customary volley having been fired, the procession returned to its place of mustering in the same order which it preserved when advancing.*

By the time we regained the little area in front of the hospital, the sun had set, and the last rays of twilight were rapidly departing. The storm, however, continued to rage with unabated fury; and an occasional peal of thunder, so distant as to be with difficulty distinguished from a gust of wind, seemed to threaten that as yet it had by no means reached its height. In the midst of this terrible strife of the elements, a variety of circumstances took place, indicative of some projected change in the situation of the army. Multitudes of cars and horses, all of them loaded with baggage, began to assemble in the rear of the camp; the heaviest of the guns were quietly withdrawn from position, and several boxes of ammunition being broken open, a distribution was made to the quarter masters of the various corps. By and by such of the sick and wounded as were in a condition to travel, were placed, with little regard to comfort, upon wagons, whilst the women and children were collected together, and directed to accompany the hospital. These things were yet in progress when a brigade of heavy infantry wound slowly past, taking the road which leads to Fishkill and Saratoga, immediately in rear of which baggage, heavy artillery, sick, wounded, and women, began their confused but silent march.

I was contemplating these movements with an eye of no common interest, when a sergeant called away my attention to other matters, by reminding me that the marksmen were ordered to relieve one of the outposts on the left of the line, and close to the river. The latter corps had already assembled for the purpose, and I joined it just as it was preparing to move from its ground. There was nothing beyond the ordinary routine of duty in the events which immediately followed. We traversed the camp, every corner of which seemed in a state of active bustle, and reached our station in safety, of which we took possession with all the form, or rather with the absence of all form, which characterises such proceed-

* "We were informed," says Madame de Reidesdel, "that General Burgoyne intended to comply with General Fraser's last request, and to have his body buried at night, in the place which he had designated. This occasioned an useless delay, and contributed to our military misfortunes. At six o'clock the corpse was removed, and we saw all the generals, with their retinues, on the hill assisting at the funeral. The English chaplain, Mr. Brudenel, officiated. Cannon balls flew around and above the assembled mourners. General Gates afterwards protested that if he had known what was going on, he would have stopped the fire immediately."

General Burgoyne has described this scene with his usual facility of expression and eloquence, thus:—"The incessant cannonade during the solemnity; the steady attitude and unaltered voice with which the brave and gallant Fraser, in the midst of a tempest of wind and rain, and surrounded by men whom he had often led to victory, was committed to the dust; and as if these accompaniments alone had not been sufficiently impressive for the occasion, another was speedily granted. The enemy, who had planted a battery upon a height immediately opposite to the redoubt, ignorant, no doubt, of the cause of the assembly, no sooner beheld a crowd of persons together, than they opened a heavy fire upon us. The balls struck repeatedly into the mound of soil at the edge of the grave, casting dirt into the faces both of the clergyman and his auditors, whilst the wild whistling of the gale replied in melancholy cadence to the roar of the cannon which played upon us. Strange to say, however, not a man received an injury. The service was concluded, the earth piled upon the deceased, and the customary volley having been fired, the procession returned to its place of mustering in the same order which it preserved when advancing."

ings; and our sentries being planted, Fraser and myself sat down beside a little watch-fire, apart from the men.

It was now, after having carefully ascertained that no curious ears were by, that my kinsman began to concert with me the more minute details of our project. He assured me that the moment for carrying it into execution had at length arrived; that farther delay would render it, even if successful, of no avail; and that the facilities afforded by our present situation of accomplishing one great point in it might not occur again. Finally, he put into my hand a piece of dirty paper, covered with such scrawls as children usually produce, as my letter of commendation to General Clinton, and urged me with great vehemence to desert on the instant. I could not hold out against his persuasions: I consented, and having done this, it was no hard matter to prevail upon me to make the act of desertion as palpable as possible. The following is the method which was adopted for that purpose.

About midnight, or perhaps half an hour before, it fell to my turn to visit the sentries. I had risen from beside the fire, and was already advanced some paces on my progress, when Fraser called me back, and speaking loudly, so as to be overheard by the men, desired that a patrol should accompany me. To this I objected as useless; but on his urging the matter warmly, and recommending that a reconnaissance be made to the front, I consented, though with much apparent reluctance. The consequence was, that a corporal with four privates became my companions, as they were afterwards zealous witnesses to my treachery. It was not a very hard matter to deceive these honest fellows. Perfectly unsuspecting of any sinister design, and accustomed to pay implicit obedience to their superiors, they were easily directed to act so as to serve the great object in view, without greatly endangering my personal safety. I led them just beyond the line of videttes; when, pretending that it would be more prudent to feel our way singly, I caused them to separate. This done, we all advanced, when, gradually drawing near the corporal, I began to tamper with him, as if desirous of making him a companion in my flight. For a while, the man either did not or would not understand me; he answered vaguely and confusedly, sometimes not appearing to see through my design at all, at others treating my proposals as a joke. At last I told him plainly, that I intended to abide by a mutual army no longer; our cause was falling, and there was nothing to be gained by farther adherence to it, every thing by adopting an opposite policy. The poor fellow stopped on hearing this declaration, and asked whether I were really serious; "Never more so in my life," answered I. "I am so far on my way towards the American lines, and I invite you to accompany me."

"Not if a captain's commission were my reward," answered the brave man; "nor shall you pass, if I have the power to prevent it!"

I had anticipated this, and, before he could bring his rifle to the present, I seized and endeavoured to wrest it from him. A brief struggle ensued, during which the piece exploded; and as I knew that the report would bring the patrol instantly upon me, I relinquished my hold and fled. The corporal pursued, shouting loudly to his comrades; but as I was more lightly equipped, as well as fleet of foot, I speedily left him behind; and the excessive darkness favouring me, I was soon beyond the reach of capture. Several shots were indeed fired, the balls from which flew very wide of their mark; and in ten minutes after the final arrangement of my plan, I was to all intents and purposes a deserter.

Animated by the good fortune which had so far attended me, I pressed forward in better spirits, and with higher hopes of ultimate success than I had yet ventured to encourage. Not that I was yet free from hazard; there was at least as much danger of falling by the hands of the enemy's patrols, as there had been from our own; nevertheless I felt confident that no calamity would befall me; and I was not deceived. A short walk of little more than a mile, brought me in front of an American outpost. I was challenged as a matter of course. I answered as the predicament in which I stood directed; and it having been ascertained that I was alone, permission was given me to advance. I did so, and for the first time in my life, found myself amidst a group of persons, every one of whom naturally looked upon me with an eye of suspicion.

The treatment of deserters is, in all armies, and under all circumstances, pretty much the same. The officer in command of the outpost having deprived me of my arms, and satisfied his own curiosity as to the corps to which I had belonged, the state of the British army, and the motives which led to my abandoning it, despatched me under an escort to the field officer of the night; who, after compelling me to go again through the same ordeal, gave orders that I should be conducted without delay into the presence of General Gates. I was accordingly I do not ground with every foot of which I was but too well acquainted, though the arrangements introduced upon it were, indeed, very different from those which I had previously witnessed. The enemy now occupied the site of the encampment from which we had been compelled to retire on the 7th. Instead, however, of a scanty line of tents, barely sufficing to maintain a loose communication from flank to flank, I beheld the whole surface of the country swarming with troops; whilst wigwags, blanket huts, marquees, and other temporary domiciles, were every where huddled together in close array. Hundreds of fires, likewise, were blazing, round which many companies, apparently destitute of shelter, were reposing.

Guns, tumbrils, ammunition carts, and other carriages, blocked up every avenue; and the neighing of horses sounded from all quarters, as if these animals had been extremely abundant. It would have been a striking spectacle at any time, no matter how the individual might be circumstanced that looked upon it; but to me it possessed a more than ordinary interest. I could not but painfully contrast the strength of the enemy with our weakness, as I passed, not without difficulty, from lane to lane; and I arrived at last in front of a spreading marquee, perfectly satisfied that even Sir Henry Clinton's diversion, if made at all, would hardly serve to deliver Burgoyne from the ruin that hung over him.

Two tent towards which our steps were turned, stood considerably apart from all others, and occupied the orchard from which the light troops had retired previous to the assault upon our lines late in the evening of the 7th. At no great distance from it, though far enough removed to hinder a conversation from being overheard, sat a band of some ten or twelve dismounted troopers, smoking and chatting beside a large fire, the horses being picketed close beside them; whilst three sentinels patrolled backwards and forwards on all sides of it, so as to hinder any persons from approaching till they should have been previously examined. By these we were, of course, stopped; but my guide having explained his business, the sergeant was called, and we were conducted to the guards' station, where we sat down. Nor, to say the truth, was the pause thus granted by any means unacceptable. I was well aware that, in order to effect my proper object, it would be necessary to impose upon General Gates a story somewhat different from that which had amused his subordinates; and though I had pretty well arranged beforehand all that I intended to say, still the prospect of a few moments to collect my thoughts appeared far from being unpleasant. But it is no easy matter, under any circumstances, to obtain leisure for thinking in the company of North Americans; nor was I more favored in this respect than others. Endless questions were put to me, all of which I found it necessary to answer, till at last the return of the messenger, who had gone to make the general acquainted with my arrival, was looked forward to as a positive relief from immediate vexations.

No great space of time elapsed ere he arrived, bringing with him an order for my introduction into the presence. This was speedily obeyed; and I found myself the next minute standing in the heart of our enemy's camp, face to face with the officer commanding his legions. The marquee, though large, was a plain one. It was lined with a sort of blue striped cloth, and contained no other furniture besides a truckle bed, a table, with two stools; and a solitary lamp, suspended from the cross pole, shed a not very brilliant light through it. The light was, however, strong enough to permit me to observe, that the individual before me possessed a handsome countenance and a commanding person. His age appeared to be about fifty, perhaps a year or two under; and his manners were at once courteous, gentlemanlike, and easy. There was no haunter, nor the slightest affectation of hauteur about him; indeed, the readiness with which he invited me to sit down, and the familiarity with which he opened our conversation, struck me as passing, rather than keeping too much within, the line of dignity. It was easy to perceive from his style of dress, that if he had lain down at all, it must have been in his clothes. But for the absence of his coat, for which a loose night-gown was substituted, he appeared ready to mount his horse at a moment's notice; and a multitude of papers scattered upon his table, implied that his moments of solitude were not his idle.

It is not worth while to lengthen out my story by detailing in full the particulars of the conversation which ensued. Enough is done when I inform you, that General Gates, though affecting all the while the most perfect indifference, did his best to draw from me a true account of the situation of the British army; and that I took good care to mix up just so much truth with falsehood, as at once to screen myself should the latter be detected, whilst by the former, I conveyed no information calculated to injure my friends. With respect to the causes which led to my desertion, I stated that they were chiefly of a private nature, wrongs having been put upon me by my superiors, such as I did not choose to brook; and I was particularly cautious not to drop a hint which might lead my interrogator to suppose that there existed in General Burgoyne's camp a spirit either of alarm or dissatisfaction. Nay, I went farther. I assured him with as great an air of candour as I found it possible to assume, that even now I was but a half convert from loyalty; and that though I had abandoned the king's standard, nothing should ever induce me to carry arms against my countrymen. In conclusion, I entreated his permission to retire to Philadelphia, where certain relatives by my mother's side were settled; and where I might follow the peaceable course of life which I had determined to adopt.

The general heard me out with great patience, and without the faintest apparent reduction of his good humour. He expressed his surprise, indeed, that I should be ignorant of matters which he very soon convinced me were well known to himself; but he threw out no insinuation as if he distrusted, far less that he had penetrated my real designs. This was particularly the case on my denying all knowledge of an intended retreat during the night. "All my spies have assured me," said he, "that the British columns are in full march; and my very patrols assert, that they have heard the rolling of gun carriages over the noise of the storm."

"It may be so," replied I, "but I deserted, as your excellency already knows, from a distant outpost; and I assure you, that, when I quitted it at least, nothing of the kind was spoken of there."

"Nay, and their boats and batteaux," continued he, without noticing my reply, "are all in motion. There has been a splashing of oars in the water since sunset: did you not say that your post lay upon the bank of the river?"

General Gates was perfectly right. Our boats had begun to move much earlier, and much more incautiously than they ought to have done, inasmuch that the tumult occasioned by them, had been distinctly audible to our advanced sentries. I could not therefore deny the fact; but I endeavored to convince him, that such was the discipline maintained in the British army, that neither inferior officers nor privates—That no persons indeed, except those directly attached to head quarters, knew either of the designs of its chief, or of the objects of any particular movements.

"Perhaps so," replied he; "yet other deserters have asserted, that the retrogression was openly spoken of in the lines, so early as noon."

"That," answered I confidently, "is altogether a mistake. A myself was accidentally an ear witness to the proceedings of a council of war, which, no later than the night of the 7th, came to the determination that the army should hold its ground till supported."

"And from whence?" asked General Gates. I felt that I had committed myself; but I at once said, "From the highlands, which, we are given to understand, are even now in the possession of a strong force from New York."

The general looked at me more keenly than he had yet done. "You overheard this decision?"

"I did."

"Then what might be the meaning of that abortive concentration in the redoubt on the right of your line, towards dusk?"

I explained that also to him—"A general party!" exclaimed he: "Why did you funeral conceals the fact from me? Had I been aware of it, he would have met with no interruption from our artillery." I assured him that the fire had occasioned no loss; and he expressed himself pleased at the intelligence.

"Well, sir," continued he, "as you are the bearer of no very important or authentic news, I cannot profess the same satisfaction at your arrival amongst us, which I should have done had the case been otherwise; but every convert from the principles of slavery to those of freedom, is welcome in the American camp. With respect to your intended removal to Philadelphia, that will be a matter for future consideration. You shall not be compelled to bear arms any where, least of all against those whom you designate your countrymen; it is not the custom in a free country to compel any man to serve against his inclination; but for the present, you must be content to remain quietly in camp. What you have heard respecting the advance of a force from New York is not without foundation. Such a force is at this moment in progress up the Hudson; and should you fall into the hands of any stragglers belonging to it, your fate would be certain. But it comes too late to bring any benefit to General Burgoyne. Though you have not told me, I can tell you, that his case is hopeless. His troops are disappointed, his stores are exhausted, his sick and wounded will be abandoned before to-morrow. Next day I shall overtake him endeavouring to force his way across the river; and on the day following, he will be my prisoner. —And now you may retire."

General Gates made a signal to the sentry, who immediately led me back to the body guard, by the commander of whom I was conducted to a tent already more than adequately filled by American dragoons. Here a blanket was spread for me upon the ground; and here I spent the remainder of the night, in a frame of mind such as you may imagine more easily than I could describe.

CHAPTER XIII.

I had slept but little, and as a necessary consequence felt but little refreshed, when a loud rolling of drums and braying of trumpets roused me. The Americans, it appeared, whatever their merits in other respects might be, were hearty admirers of such of the king of Prussia's standing rules as it lay within the compass of their imperfect discipline to obey, and beat their reveilles and tattoos just as regularly in camp before the enemy, as in garrison, when no enemy was within a hundred miles of them. The tumult of warlike instruments to which I now listened, gave, it appeared, the signal for their troops to stand to their arms; and it was obeyed, if neither silently nor very orderly, still with promptitude, and much apparent willingness.

Like the rest of the army, the troopers among whom I had been lodged, sprang to their feet at the first summons. The horses, which had been picketed during the night under the slope of some broken ground, and had suffered considerably from exposure to the weather, were speedily rubbed down, saddled, and in order; whilst the men themselves, buckling on their accoutrements, took post beside them in readiness for service. Nothing, however, occurred for some time. It was still pitchy dark, and though the wind had fallen, the rain still came down in torrents, rendering every species of fire-arms in a great measure unserviceable. These causes necessarily operated against an advance; but I learned, that patrols were sent forward with a view of discovering whether or not Burgoyne had really quitted his position; and the boisterous exultation of these about me soon gave proof that the retreat of the British army had been ascertained.

In the mean while day gradually dawned, bringing before me, as the light increased, one of the most remarkable spectacles which it has ever been my fortune to behold. The tents, marquees, and blanket huts, which had abounded on my arrival, were all gone; they had been struck at the first beat of drum, and were now packed upon bat-horses and cars in rear of the lines. On the ground which they formerly covered stood numerous columns of infantry, supported here and there by a few squadrons of horse; guns and tumbrils, limbered up and in order, occupied the intervals, whilst groups of general and staff officers were riding backwards and forwards, for the purpose, as it seemed, of ascertaining that matters were in a proper train, or of rectifying such errors as might be detected. Of course, the appearance and bearing of the troops now around me presented a very remarkable contrast to those of the army which I had just quitted. Very few American corps seemed to be complete in any species of equipment; fewer still were clothed in a garb at all resembling a uniform. The Continentals, as their regular regiments were denominated, wore indeed blue coats, and their belts, pouches, and firelocks, seemed to be made after the same fashion; but the under portions of their dress varied in the most grotesque manner, whilst their hats seemed to have been gathered from a hundred different fields where a hundred different nations had fought. With respect to the militia, again, nothing could exceed the clownish air that distinguished them. They were arrayed, some in the costume of their every day occupations, some in hunting dresses, some in a sort of patchwork uniform, partly English, partly French, whilst not a few would have been almost naked, but for blankets which they fastened about them, by thrusting their heads through a hole in the middle. In like manner, their arms and accoutrements bore little resemblance to those usually carried by soldiers. Long fowling pieces and short rifles appeared in the same platoon, and even side by side. One man carried his ammunition in a leather bag slung at his back, another preferred a shot-belt, whilst a third was contented to make use of his pocket; and as to bayonets, not one in a hundred possessed such a weapon, or bore a musket capable of receiving it. A very great number were, however, armed with long knives, which hung in tight waist belts; and several carried tomahawks, in the use of which I was given to understand that they were not less skilful than the Indians.

In spite, however, of the total absence of all pretensions to regularity, the American army was not to be despised; or treated, even in idea, as a mere mob. It is true that in the niceties of parade movements, very few, even of the Continental regiments, could boast of much proficiency; but they all, militia as well as regulars, seemed capable of preserving a good line, and of marching in column with strict attention to distances. Moreover, it was easy to perceive, that they entertained the fullest confidence both in themselves and their leader. They conversed freely, it is true, in the ranks; the militia, in particular, appeared to set all attempts to preserve quiet at defiance; but their conversation was bold, manly, and proud, implying not only a readiness, but an ardent desire to be led into action. Then as to numbers, I should conceive that this single parade ground contained a force of not less than ten or twelve thousand men; and I knew, from a variety of sources, that large detachments had been made, for the purpose of harassing and impeding the retreating army. Now the British general could not at this moment bring into the field more than three thousand five hundred men fit for duty;—what probability was there, in case General Gates should act with promptitude, that the former could escape destruction?

With this strong impression upon my mind; with the firm assurance that General Gates needed but to push forward in order to fulfil the threat which he had lately uttered, I experienced no slight relief when I was told that the American army could not for one day at all events, probably for a greater space of time, quit its ground. By some oversight or other, the proper authorities had forgotten to furnish the men with provisions; and their last morsel having been consumed before noon on the 8th, no movement could be made till a fresh supply should be issued out. The consequence was, that though of the position which Burgoyne had abandoned, as well as of about three hundred sick and wounded men whom his necessities had compelled him to leave behind, General Gates took possession, and though he pushed light parties along the Dovecote road, by whom several guns, which had upset on the march, and a good deal of baggage, were captured, the mass of his army was paralysed; and he saw himself in the unpleasant situation of a huntsman whose hounds drag the trail at the very moment when he considered himself secure of his prey.

To me, on the other hand, no contingency could have happened more cheering or consolatory. The intelligence communicated last night relative to the advance of a force from New York, was not forgotten;—could I but reach that force in time, Burgoyne might yet be saved. I knew that the attempt would be attended with imminent risks; that it failed, and I be recaptured, my fate was inevitable; yet the object in view was an important one, and I resolved to devote myself to its attainment. From that moment all my thoughts were turned to the devising of some plan by which the vigilance of my guards might be eluded; and the following was the result of my cogitations.

Though exceedingly attentive in every other respect, the Americans, probably from the absence of power to act otherwise, had not furnished me with any change of habiliments since I arrived among them. My own, as I need scarcely say, were saturated with the rain; I had slept in them thus, and thus they continued to hang about me: it was not, therefore, a very gross demand upon their credulity to pretend that a severe illness was the consequence. I began to shiver, drew close to the fire, spoke abruptly, and exhibited other symptoms of indisposition, till at last the men, to whose charge I had been entrusted, became impressed with the idea which I wished them to receive. My case was immediately reported in the proper quarter, and an order arrived for my removal to the hospital. All this was exactly as I desired it to be. About ten o'clock in the day, I was placed with a detachment of sick in a covered wagon; and before nightfall, found myself an inmate of a large mansion on the outskirts of the neat and flourishing town of Albany.

So far my project had been crowned with success. I was freed from the vigilance of men whom it was not easy to deceive, and advanced twenty miles upon the journey which it behoved me to accomplish; but the difficulties which still stood in my way, were of a nature not to be contemplated without the most serious apprehension. In the first place, I was a patient in a public hospital, every room and ward in which was crowded with sick and wounded, nurses, and medical attendants; whilst a military guard regularly kept watch over it, and sentinels patrolled backwards and forwards in front of either entrance. In the next place, I was at once ignorant of the route which it would be necessary to follow, and destitute of means of subsistence by the way; for the high road would, I apprehended, prove impassable, in consequence of the great traffic which at present prevailed; and to purchase provisions any where, would unavoidably expose me to interruption. Nevertheless, the die was cast. I shut my eyes, as far as it was possible so to do, against the contemplation of danger; and turned my undivided attention to the discovery of some method of escape from Albany.

For the first day or two, every attempt to quit my ward was strictly prohibited. I was pronounced by the illiterate blockhead who attended me, to be labouring under a raging fever, and the slightest exposure to cold would, he declared, inevitably cause death. It was to no purpose that I professed myself convalescent; he knew the state of my body a great deal better than I, and he purged, bled, and otherwise tormented me, till I almost caught the disease which it had hitherto been my business to counterfeit. I need not pretend to describe what my feelings were under such circumstances. A thousand times I cursed my own short-sightedness, in having fallen upon a device, which, instead of advancing, threatened entirely to disconcert my project; and many and varied were the schemes which I pondered with a view of extricating myself from my present embarrassments. Of these, the first and most obvious was, to leap the window by night, and to trust to chance, and the lightness of my own heels, for escape; but the window, on examination, proved to be closely fastened down, besides being screened on the outside by strong iron bars. Next, I thought of seizing the miscrant, and compelling him, by a threat of instant death, to guide me beyond the town; but that, too, would have been impossible, inasmuch as the room was occupied by at least a dozen persons in addition to myself. Finally, though quite alive to the disastrous consequences of delay, I learned to yield to circumstances over which I possessed no control; and during the whole of the 10th, 11th, and part of the 12th, I continued a close prisoner.

CHAPTER XIV.

In the mean while, rumour after rumour, touching the state of affairs both in front and rear, poured in upon us, as rivers whose banks are cut asunder inundate a level district. One day we learned that the American army was in close pursuit of Burgoyne, whom it was manoeuvring to surround in a position which he had assumed on the heights above Saratoga. By and by, we were informed that General Fellows, with a brigade of one thousand five hundred men, had passed the Hudson, and taking post at the ford by which the British must necessarily cross, cut them off from all chance of retreat by the route which they had followed in advancing. Next it was asserted, not only that Fort Edward, but that Fort George, the Carrying-places and Ticonderoga itself had fallen, and that every avenue of escape was effectually blocked up against the ill-fated invaders. All these rumours occasioned, as you may well believe, extravagant rejoicings among the men by whom I was surrounded; but there came in one at last which affected them very differently, and rendered me more than ever desirous of escaping, if I could, from my detestable prison.

It might be about three or four o'clock in the afternoon of the 12th, when a crowd of country people entered the town, with intelligence that a formidable expedition, both of land and naval forces, was advancing from New York. Forts Montgomery and Clinton had both been carried by assault; Fort Constitution, abandoned by its garrison, was taken possession of; and Governor Clinton, the republican commandant on the station, being unable to hold his ground, there was nothing in the way to prevent the British leader from pushing direct upon Albany. Great, indeed, was the consternation which this report occasioned, of the correctness of which no one appeared to entertain a doubt; in order to such a height was the alarm carried, that preparations began immediately to be made for the evacuation of the place.

The confusion attendant upon these proceedings presented to me at length the opening for which I had so long panted. Our guards, more anxious to hear the news, than careful of the trust reposed upon them, not only abandoned their posts, but left every door open. Medical men, nurses, and attendants were all agape; and the very sick themselves, such of them, at least, as were at all able to move, went abroad in search of particulars which they had no means of learning within. I saw my opportunity at once, and I hesitated not to avail myself of it. Hastily throwing on my clothes, and arming myself with a carving knife, I made a desperate rush from the ward, and hurrying down stairs, I gained the open air before my design could be guessed at. Once there, however, and for a time all difficulties were at an end. It is true that crowds of persons blocked up the street, hurrying to and fro in every direction; but all appeared too much occupied with business of their own to pay any attention to me. I walked through the heart of them with a steady and deliberate step, unheeded and unchallenged, and gained the high road, which leads from Albany to Kingston, without a single accident befalling to agitate or alarm me.

Now then I began, as it were, to breathe with freedom. Casting an anxious look behind, and seeing no one in pursuit, I quickened my walk into a sort of jog trot, which gradually became a run,—till at last I found myself scampering along at a rate which, had it been practicable to maintain it, must have soon carried me beyond the danger of recapture. Unfortunately, however, the severe discipline which I had undergone for no purpose, produced the very same effect which would have attended it had it been really required. I was enfeebled to a degree of which, till my strength was tried, I could have had no conception; and at the end of a couple of miles found, to my extreme sorrow, that my usual ability to endure fatigue had departed. I was compelled through absolute exhaustion, not only to slacken my pace, but to sit down; and I need scarcely say, that I did so in a state of violent mental excitation, which took away, in no trifling degree, from the benefits which might have otherwise attended the measure.

It seemed, however, that after so many trials, fortune was resolved at last to favour me. Not a human being made his appearance as far as my eye could reach, and I rose again soon after the sun had set, to continue my journey. As I felt myself in some measure safe, that is to say, as I could discover no danger immediately at hand, I indulged on at once more leisurely and in better spirits, determined to halt no where, as long as my limbs would perform their duty. It was a lovely night. The moon shone with uncommon brilliancy in a sky clear and cloudless, and the air, quiet as the breathing of an infant asleep, scarcely moved the foliage, which in great abundance shaded the road. My route, too, lay through a district, the singularly beautiful and romantic appearance of which could not be contemplated, even in my present perilous situation, with indifference. I need scarcely remind you, that the road from Albany to West-point, in what are called the Jersey highlands, conducts the traveller in a direction exactly parallel with the course of the Hudson,—stretching sometimes along the very margin of the river, and never diverging above half a mile from its bank.

Along this romantic road, and through this romantic country, I held my course. There was a perfect silence around me, which neither the whispering of leaves, nor the monotonous rush of water, could be said with strict propriety to disturb. Few and far between were the human habitations which I passed, in none of which the faintest symptom of living inhabitants could be discerned; nay, I traversed several villages, without meeting with a solitary traveller, or beholding the glimmer of a solitary taper in a single dwelling.

As I pursued my journey at a tolerably brisk pace, halting but rarely, and then only for a few minutes at a time, I calculated that full thirty miles had been accomplished when the first streaks of dawn showed themselves. I was then approaching a village, the name of which I afterwards ascertained to be Loonenburgh; and feeling both exhausted and hungry, I determined, after a few minutes spent in deliberation, to ask for shelter and food from some of its inhabitants.

I accordingly pushed forward, so as to enter the place just as the sun rose; and seldom have I beheld a more attractive scene than his early rays rendered visible. The hamlet itself consisted of about ten or twelve dwellings, constructed, after the manner of the country, entirely of wood. It was impossible to look upon the surrounding scene without contrasting painfully the condition of the district as it now stood, with what it probably would become, in case my mission produced its desired effect. However well-disposed the leader of an invading force may be, and I did not doubt that our commander was disposed to protect the country to the utmost, it is not, as I well knew, practicable to hinder the followers of an army, if not the army itself, from committing acts of outrage and rapine; and I sickened as I thought of the ruin which, in all probability, hung over a spot at present so flourishing. Nevertheless, this was no time for the indulgence of feelings, very amiable, no doubt, though not very profitable. I suppressed mine almost as soon as they arose, and walking forward to the cottage which stood farthest in the direction of my route, I knocked loudly for admission.

It had struck me as somewhat remarkable, that though every other living thing was alert and on the move, not a human being seemed awake when I entered the village. Persons whose habits correspond with those of the inhabitants of Loonenburgh, seldom lie in bed after the sun has risen; and hence it was not without surprise that I found myself unsaluted as I traversed the common. My astonishment was, however, greatly increased, when, after knocking repeatedly, no notice was taken of the signal; and I came at last to the conclusion that the place was abandoned. With this impression on my mind, I was about to resume my progress, when accidentally looking up, I beheld a human countenance peeping at me, with evident caution, from behind a window curtain. I waved my hand to make the individual aware that his proceeding had been detected; and shouting loudly that I was a traveller sorely in want of rest and refreshment, I stood still to await the event. My appeal was not lost upon the person to whom it was made. In a few seconds I heard a step in the passage, which was followed by the creaking of a bolt in its socket; and the door being opened, an old man presented himself with a ready invitation for me to enter. I was not slow in accepting it, but followed my conductor at once into a snug parlour, where the means of satisfying hunger were speedily set before me.

As soon as the cravings of appetite were removed, I began to question my host as to the cause of his own apprehensions in particular, and the deserted appearance of the village in general. He answered cautiously and with apparent reluctance, throwing out hints of danger from all sides, and employing the expression "the enemy" in so many contradictory fashions, that it was impossible to guess to which party he intended it to apply; but I gathered pretty well, that the people of Loonenburgh dreaded the republican, not less than they feared the royal troops, and more than half suspected, that in their hearts they were loyalists. The most acceptable intelligence, however, which I obtained from him was, that a fleet and army, under General Vaughan and Commodore Wallace, were in successful and rapid progress up the Hudson, and that their arrival at Loonenburgh itself might be expected by the morrow at the latest. No time was granted to question the evidence upon which the above rumour rested, ere it received a direct and most unexpected confirmation. The old man was yet speaking, when the roar of a distant cannonade became audible, which he pronounced at once to arise from an attack by the British squadron upon the American works at Asopus.

I cannot pretend to describe the effect which that most sublime of all earthly sounds produced upon me. I sprang to my feet with energies supernaturally renewed, and thrusting a piece of money into my host's hand, made ready on the instant to pursue my journey. What had I now to fear? Ten miles of level road alone divided me from the great goal of my wishes; and if fortune only favoured me as she had hitherto done, these would be compassed within the space of three hours at the farthest. The old man watched my proceedings with a subdued but sagacious look, and penetrated, beyond a question, into my character and designs in a moment—though he said nothing to imply this, but wishing me a pleasant journey, led me to the door, and deliberately bolted it after me.

With a step light and buoyant, in spite of the fatigues of the previous night, I pressed forward. Five minutes' walk carried me clear of the village; and I was already half way across the cultivated land, when accidentally looking back, I beheld, to my horror and dismay, a party of mounted soldiers advancing along the road behind me. That I became visible to them at the same moment, there was no cause to doubt; for though when I first caught sight of them they moved leisurely and at a walk, they immediately put their horses to a trot, and rode towards me. What was to be done? Had this accident occurred at almost any other point, I might have found shelter in the woods, and there baffled pursuit; but now I was in the middle of an open plain, to traverse which, before I should be overtaken, appeared impossible. Despair, however, gave me courage. I knew that should I fall into their hands nothing could save me. I determined to make one effort for my own preservation, and I ran with all the speed of which I was master towards the nearest thicket.

I had no sooner quickened my pace than a shout arose, which, beyond all question, marked me as the object of hot and desperate pursuit. This, for the first moment or two, acted as a stimulus to fresh exertions; but the race was a very unequal one, for I was worn down with past exertions, enfeebled by my sufferings in the hospital, and quite incapable of keeping long at the top of my speed. Already I heard the clattering of horses' hoofs in my rear, which approached every instant nearer and nearer, whilst the friendly thicket towards which my steps were turned seemed to increase rather than diminish its distance from me. I became desperate. I looked behind—the nearest dragon was within two hundred yards of me, whilst the wood was fully five hundred ahead; and as my strength and breath were both rapidly failing, I gave myself up for lost. At this moment a chance appeared, faint, indeed, but still within the possibility of attainment; and I grasped at it. A shallow ditch, or rather drain, ran through the middle of the field across which I was running, and by bending a little to the left, I saw that I could intercept a hedge-row between me and my pursuers. I did so, and no sooner shut them out from sight than I plunged into the drain. There I lay pressed closely to the bottom, my person being barely screened by the low edges, in a state of itching which my imagination itself cannot now conjure up, far less my powers of description delineate.

I had barely time to act thus, when the thunder of horses' hoofs became more and more terrible. Voices, too, were heard in loud and triumphant clamour, till the whole troop swept by within fifteen feet of the spot where I lay. How I listened to the receding noise of the chase! with what an agony of joy my heart beat, as it became every instant less audible! till at last I ventured to look up, and received the assurance that my pursuers were gone. Now then was the time for me to act. I did not dare to rise, because I saw at a glance, that any attempt to traverse the open country must expose me, in case of their return, to immediate detection; but judging from the direction in which it ran that the drain would lead to the river, I resolved to follow it. I accordingly dragged myself along upon my belly a distance of perhaps a quarter of a mile, moving with extreme caution and no little difficulty; and my labours were amply recompensed by the conclusion to which they led. I had not been mistaken as to the termination of the drain. It not only ended at the river, as I had supposed it would, but conducted me to a spot where a small boat, with a couple of oars, lay moored to the stump of a tree. In an instant the cord which fastened it was cut; and in the next I sprang into it; and plying the oars with all my might, I was soon far beyond the reach of my mounted pursuers.

Such was the last adventure worth recording, which befell me during this memorable campaign. The Hudson having been cleared of all American craft, by the reported advance of the British squadron, I met with no interruption during my solitary voyage, and I reached Kingston in safety a little before noon, in front of which Commodore Wallace lay at anchor. I was received by both the naval and military commanders with the consideration which I had reason to expect from them. My credentials were examined and approved, my story listened to with patience, and a promise made that General Burgoyne's requisition would be attended to in due time.

That time, however, never arrived. The 13th had been consumed in the capture of Kingston; the 14th was devoted to its destruction; the 15th was spent I know not how; and on the 16th orders to march on the morrow were issued; but before that morrow came, the last act in this humiliating drama had been acted. Authentic intelligence reached the general, of the treaty which rendered Burgoyne and his brave army conventional prisoners to the Americans; and he returned with all possible precipitation, crest-fallen and humiliated, to New York.

In 1800, a French prisoner at Liverpool exhibited a most extraordinary propensity to devour nauseous diet, particularly cats, of which in one year he eat 174, many of them while alive.

An Esquimaux boy, supplied by Captain Parry, eat in one day 104 lbs. of solid food, and drank of various liquids 1½ gallon. A man of the same nation eat 10 lbs. of solids, including two candles, and drank 1½ gallon, yet they were only from 4 to 4½ feet high.

During the last great plague in London, one pit was dug in the Charter House, 40 feet long, 16 feet wide, and 20 feet deep, and in a fortnight received 1114 bodies. During this dire calamity, there were instances of mothers carrying their own children to these public graves; and of people delicious, or in despair for the loss of friends, who threw themselves alive into these pits.

Dr. Lettsom ascribed health and wealth to water, and happiness to small beer, and all diseases and crimes to the use of spirits: making of the whole a moral thermometer. The Abbé Gallani ascribes all social crimes to animal destruction, thus—treachery to angling and cursing; and murder to hunting and shooting; and he asserts "that the man who would kill a sheep, an ox, or any unsuspecting animal, would kill his neighbour, but for the law."

Among the mammalia, man only has but one thumb.

Such is the force of education, and so much are men what the habits of infancy make them, that in spite of the conceits of the English, when Florida was ceded to England by a treaty with Spain, in 1769, the whole of the Spanish population left the province and towns, except one in a single town and another single in the woods. The same feeling was exemplified by some inhabitants of Nova Zembla, who, on being brought to Denmark, and clothed and fed with every luxury of civilization, so pined for their return to their own inhospitable desert, that some of them died before they could be sent back. Something like this strong principle doubtless governs birds and animals in their return to their native haunts.

A Family Tour

THROUGH

SOUTH HOLLAND, UP THE RHINE, AND

ACROSS THE NETHERLANDS.

BY LIEUTENANT COLONEL BATTY,

Author of "An Historical Sketch of the Campaign of 1815," "Campaign of the Allied Army," "Views of Continental Cities."

INTRODUCTION.

The following tour contains much information in a small compass, and possesses strong claims to notice. It appeared last year in London as one of the volumes of Murray's Family Library, and is now for the first time republished in America. At the present time, when Antwerp and its vicinity is the theatre of war, it will be found highly interesting and useful; it gives a vivid picture of the country, its inhabitants and scenery, and has the merit of being divested of the usual book-making addenda taken from "Travellers' Guides."

Soon after the tour was completed, the Revolution of Brussels, and the expulsion of the House of Orange from the throne of Belgium, occurred. The latter country was for a short period governed by a regency, succeeded by the present monarchical government in the person of Leopold, Prince of Saxe-Cobourg. The exaltation of this personage was decided by the principal European powers at a conference held in London, and acceded to in general terms by Holland herself. But the boundary between Belgium and Holland became a subject of litigation, the former claiming the port of Antwerp, with its fortifications and others on the same side of the Scheldt, while King William refused to concur in such an arrangement. In consequence of this refusal, France and England resolved on compulsory measures to give Leopold possession of the disputed territory; France engaging to send an army by land to reduce the forts, while England was to co-operate by sea, blockade the Scheldt, and indeed all the forts of Holland. It is well known that these combined armaments have succeeded in taking the citadel of Antwerp by siege after a vigorous resistance, and that the French are pushing their army along the river to force the remaining obstacles to the completion of the compact made at the conference. Whether the king of Holland will retain a belligerent attitude after these misfortunes, or whether he will be aided in further opposition by Prussia or Russia, remains to be seen.—Ed.

PREFACE.

Our family party of six persons, with a male servant, set out from London, with the intention of making the tour of the southern provinces of Holland,—of ascending the Rhine as far as Mayence,—thence paying a visit to Frankfort,—returning by the Rhine to Cologne,—from thence crossing the Netherlands by Liège, Waterloo, Brussels, and Ostend, to London.

They gave themselves, or circumstances rather obliged them, to dedicate, just one month to the performance of this tour, which they accomplished in twenty-eight days, travelling very much at their ease in the carriages of the different countries (not diligences),—in trekschuyts and steam vessels,—saw whatever they considered to be interesting,—put up at the first hotels,—dined sometimes at tables-d'hôte, and at others in their private apartments, and were finally set down from the Ostend steam vessel on the Tower hill. Every one of the party returned with the pleasing recollections of what they had seen, and with invigorated health.

Those who may wish to spend a month in visiting that most extraordinary and interesting country, Holland,—to enjoy the magnificent scenery of the Rhine, to admire the splendid decorations of the churches, and to be gratified with the beautiful state of agricultural industry in the then apparently happy Belgium, cannot do better than to follow the track which is laid down in the following pages, drawn up from notes taken on the spot by one of the party, and now published in the hope that they may prove of some use to future travellers.

CHAPTER I.

LONDON TO ANTWERP.

On the 6th of August, we embarked at Deptford, in a sailing yacht, with our little family party, bound for the Scheldt, and from thence wherever chance might direct us, under a pledge, however, not to exceed the time of one month from the day of embarkation. We dropped down the river with the tide, the wind at east, the weather beautiful; but night coming on before we could get over the flats, as they are called, we anchored in Whitstable Bay. In advancing to this, the younger part of the family in particular were greatly amused by the luminous appearance of the sea, which happened to be more than usually brilliant in this climate. They compared the train of light, which flashed from the sounding line, to the tail of a comet. Every body began to philosophise on this phenomenon, and we young ones in particular were naturally inquisitive as to the cause of such an appearance, which, we were told, is not of very common occurrence in this temperate climate; and that, when it does occur, is not any thing like so brilliant as within the tropics;—there, we were informed, it is awfully grand.

On the 7th, with a fine south-westerly breeze, we got under weigh at about six in the morning, reached the North Foreland at eight, and were at anchor in Flushing Roads, directly before the town, at seven in the evening, having run about one hundred miles in thirteen hours.

It was our intention to have landed the following morning at Flushing, our object being principally to inspect the dockyard, besides which, we were given to understand, there is not much to attract the notice of strangers in this town; and indeed, the only objects in the naval arsenal, that we expected to derive much gratification from viewing, were some large roofs under which ships are constructed, and which towered high above the mud banks that defend the town from the incursions of the sea, and far above all other roofs, that of the church, alone excepted. Of these coverings for ships we could see three, which appeared, when viewed from without, to be similar to the same kind of buildings in all our dock-yards. The morning, however, was so windy, and the sea before the town so rough, from the exposure of the roadstead to the North Sea, that we did not think it worth a wetting to attempt the shore. It was, besides, desirable not to lose the advantage of a young tide up the Scheldt, which had turned at six o'clock this morning. We therefore weighed anchor a little before seven, and proceeded at the rate of twelve miles an hour up this magnificent river.

Flushing exhibited no external appearance of commercial bustle. A Dutch eighteen gun sloop, and some half dozen ships of a small class, were lying in the road, and about as many a little higher up, opposite the fort called the Rammakins. Between this fort and Flushing we observed two or three new martello towers, that are supposed to give a more complete command of the entrance of the Scheldt, which is here at least three miles in width. We observed some artillerymen firing at a mark, on a floating buoy, from one of the forts of the town, the only symptom that displayed itself of military existence along the banks of this beautiful river, each side of which, and without interruption, exhibited the more gratifying effects of peaceful and laborious industry.

It was not without reason, perhaps, that the Dutch had been strengthening the works at Flushing, considering the lesson they received, in the course of the last war, of the total inefficiency of those that then existed, assisted as they were by the opposite batteries of Cadzand, to prevent the passage of the Scheldt by a vigorous and determined enemy. The distance across appears to be barely two miles and a half, though called three; yet on the occasion of our memorable expedition under Lord Chatham, which, by a strange misadventure, took refuge in the eastern instead of the western Scheldt, and got into what Sir Home Popham called the Recompot (literally creampot), Lord William Stuart, in the Lavinia, with nine other frigates, forced this passage through a crossfire of the enemy from the two sides, with the loss only of two or three men in the whole. The wind was light, and the fire of the batteries from the two sides nearly two hours, yet they passed almost wholly untouched by the enemy's shot.

That side of the island of Walcheren, which faces the sea, is defended against the encroachments of that element by one continued wall or ridge of high sand hills, interrupted only at West Capel, where an artificial dyke has been raised to the height, it is said, of thirty feet, and defended in a very ingenious and extraordinary manner. This artificial barrier is of so much importance, that, on its stability, the safety of the whole island may be said to depend.

At the point of the island where Flushing is situated, a strong wall of masonry protects the town against the sea; and the side facing the Scheldt is embanked with great care, and its repair evidently kept up at an enormous expense. Embankments or dykes of the same kind are carried along both banks of the river; and at the base of each is thrown out a barrier of stones and stakes to protect the higher ramparts of earth; and these again are covered with great care and ingenuity with a kind of thatch, consisting of bean-stubble or straw. The stones at the base are sometimes thrown into a kind of a wicket or basket-work of withy twigs, and the whole kept together by ropes made of the same material, and interwoven with rushes; and where the current or the tide sets strongest, rows of stakes or poles are driven into the sand, to act as breakwaters for the protection of the base of the sloping bank, which receives a further consistence by being grown over with grass, on the gently sloping sides of which very fine cattle may be seen grazing, many of which are handsomely spotted.

These dykes, and their supporting embankments, are seen in great perfection along the shores of South Beveland, the island next to Walcheren, and one of the most beautiful and fertile territories of Holland; that is to say, beautiful for its cultivation and its fertility in all kinds of grain, madder, pulse, hemp, rape, and flax; in its abundance of orchards of apples, pears, cherries, and plums; in the number of its villages, situated in the midst of trees, but, to the navigator of the river, known only to exist from the frequent spires of churches that are seen to rise in every direction out of the woods. Even in those villages that are close to the banks, seldom is any part of the houses visible, except the chimneys and the tiled roofs; but a church spire in the midst of trees, and a windmill erected on the bank or some artificial mount, the better to catch the breeze, are sure indications of the co-existence of a little hamlet with those conspicuous objects.

In various parts of the shores of the river, in addition to the regular embankments, are small breakwaters of stonework, thrown out at right angles into the stream, intended to guard the dykes against the shock of floating timber or vessels, but more particularly against the masses of ice which float down in the winter season. These stones are all brought hither, by water conveyance, from the neighbourhood of Brussels, as not a pebble of any description is to be found in any of the Zealand Islands, nor in the northern provinces of Belgium. The general surface, in fact, on both sides of the river, is below the level of the high water mark, so that a vast extent of fertile country has actually been rescued from the sea by human labour and ingenuity. It is evident, therefore, that unless due precautions were taken against the breaking in of the sea, which not unfrequently happens, the whole country would be subject to inundation, and revert to its ancient state of useless sterility—alternately a sandy marsh and a sheet of water.

This is, in fact, what has actually happened to the eastern side of this very island of South Beveland, where, at low water, is a vast extent of sand, which the Dutch have named 'Vendruken land,' or land swallowed up by the sea. To obviate a disaster of such fatal import, innumerable inland dykes are constructed in every direction, not only to mark, as they sometimes do, the division of property, but also to afford additional barriers to the waters, so that if the first barrier or sea dyke should give way, a second and a third may be found to resist the further ravages of the flood. At the commencement of the present century, however, Walcheren was inundated by a breach of the sea at West Capel, and the water is said to have stood as high as the roofs of the houses of Middelburg, which fine city was saved from utter destruction only by the strength of its walls. This event is commemorated by an inscription on a stone.

The sea had once before washed away the sandy downs, which form a barrier along the western coast, and submerged the ancient town of West Capel, which was afterwards rebuilt further inland. It is here that, in order to prevent future accidents of the same kind, an enormous dyke, thirty feet high, has been raised to fill up the breach. The expense must have been enormous, but the salvation of the whole islands of Walcheren may be said to depend on its stability.

In all these banks several sluices are constructed, by means of which the inhabitants have not only the power of letting out the water from the sands, but also of letting in that of the river or the sea, in the event of an enemy invading the country; and by this desperate measure to make it impossible for him to remain; but this is an advantage gained only at the expense of an infliction of general misery and distress, amounting very nearly to complete ruin.

The master of our vessel was well acquainted with every part of the river, but we were compelled to take a Dutch pilot, for the sake, of course, of paying him his fee. We were desirous, in proceeding, to keep close to the northern channel on the Dutch side, along the shores of Beveland, but the pilot made several objections, which our master knew to be perfectly frivolous; his only avowed reason, on being pressed, was, that the king did not like it—and as in such cases, when stat pro ratione voluntas, and when we are told that le roi le veut, it would be folly to resist, we stood over to Penzance on the southern side. From this place a fine canal has recently been opened the whole way to Ghent, and of the depth of sixteen feet, which, while it admits ships of very considerable burthen, acts as a drain to the surrounding country, through which it passes. At Terneuse it communicates with the Scheldt, by two separate sluices or locks. This water communication is of the greatest importance, both to Brabant and Holland, by opening a direct intercourse between Antwerp and other principal towns of Belgium, and to the latter country, through various channels of communication, with Dort and Rotterdam.

In proceeding up the Scheldt, it is impossible not to be struck with the simple means by which the Dutch have succeeded in producing the same effect, though, perhaps, in a smaller degree, for which in England we launch out into the most extravagant expense. Nothing can exceed the economy practised in the construction of their flood-gates, and the wooden piers in which their sluices are placed; a species of hydraulics, that with us are generally formed of the most costly workmanship in masonry. Having no stone in this country, but what must come to them from the banks of the Meuse or the Rhine, necessity has driven them to the use of other materials, and its place is efficiently supplied by the less costly, though less durable, article of wood.

On the muddy shores and the sand banks of the Scheldt, left bare at low water, whole shoals of seals may generally be seen in different attitudes, some playing about and wallowing in the mud, while others are standing upright, as if waiting to give notice to their companions of any danger that may be approaching. These creatures are possessed of a high degree of cunning, and are not easily to be caught napping; the usual mode of taking them is by setting a long range of nets below the surface of the high water line, so as to admit them freely at that time of tide to the shores or banks of the river; over which nets, as the water falls, they are unable to pass, and are thus caught. In the same manner the inhabitants place rows of twigs, with nets between them, the more readily to catch various kinds of fish, which by first encountering the difficulty of passing through the twigs, generally fall into the nets between them.

The distance from Flushing to Antwerp is reckoned, by the bending of the river, to be sixty-two miles, which our little yacht effected in five hours and a half, and would with ease have done it in five hours, had the wind not failed us in the narrow part of the river, just above Lillo. The appearance of the ancient city of Antwerp becomes here an interesting object, and the more imposing the nearer we approach it along the last reach of the Scheldt; nor will the traveller feel any disappointment on his arrival before this great commercial port of the Netherlands.

At the same time it must be confessed there was nothing on this noble river, either in our progress up it, or before the city, that conveyed any impression of an active or extensive commerce. In sailing up or down the Thames, or in approaching London within four or five miles—in the first case, the multitude of shipping, of all descriptions, from the largest Indiamen to the deep laden barge scarcely emerging from the water, crossing and recrossing each other in every possible direction—in the second, those lying in close contact, tier after tier, for several miles below the first bridge of the metropolis, afford indications not to be mistaken of the commercial wealth and prosperity of London. But the Scheldt, when we ascended it, was a vacant river; we neither met nor overtook a single sail, and with the exception of some ten or twelve small vessels, mostly brigs, except two or three American ships, there was little appearance of trade along the common quay of Antwerp. But a great number of vessels were lying in the small harbours that branch out from the river, and in the two large basins.

Antwerp, however, is a fine old city. It is impossible to enter through an ancient gateway into its narrow streets, bounded by lofty houses, with their high gables and pediments of several stories of windows, and ascending by steps on each side to a point, without being attracted by their grotesque but, at the same time, picturesque appearance. Indeed, their novel and fanciful shapes are much more attractive than the more recent and wider streets, with their more spacious houses, many of which are not inferior to any that are met with in London.

The Rue de la Mer, which had formerly a canal down the middle, like those which are generally met with in a Dutch town, but is now filled up, appears to be as wide as Portland Place, and from the variety in the architecture of its houses is infinitely more picturesque and striking.

In this street is the commodious hotel of Le Grand Laboureur, in which we took up our quarters; and in it also is the palace of William I., a handsome building enough, but nothing remarkable, being little better than a common sized house of the first class, the apartments surrounding a quadrangle. In fact it belonged to one of the merchants of the town, but was purchased and furnished for the use of Bonaparte and his generals, when he should happen to pass this way. It certainly has no pretensions to the name of palace. It consists of two suites of six or seven small rooms, some without any other furniture than a deal table, and a few of the commonest chairs, and others entirely without furniture of any kind. If the present royal family should remain a day or so at Antwerp, which they have not yet descended to do, there is a bed fitted up in one of the suites of apartments for the king, and another in the opposite side for the queen, but their attendants must shift for themselves, and sleep on the floor, unless timely notice be given to prepare for better accommodation than this palace at present affords. On expressing some surprise to the young woman who showed us round, that it should be left in so unfurnished a state, she readily observed that, "if Napoleon had remained their sovereign, it would soon have been furnished, and that right well too."

Antwerp, though still a place of very considerable trade, has had the misfortune of being stripped of its splendour and prosperity on several occasions. Her merchants were at one time the most wealthy body of men in Europe. As an illustration of this, a story is told of one John Deems, who lent to Charles V. a million of gold, to enable him to carry on his wars in Hungary, for which he obtained the royal bond. The emperor, on his return, dined with the merchant, who, after a most sumptuous entertainment, produced the bond, not, however, for payment, but to burn it, which he is said to have done in a fire made of the chips of cinnamon.

The greatest loss which the prosperity of this city received, was in consequence of the treaty by which the navigation of the magnificent river, on the right bank of which it is situated, was prohibited. It is said that Antwerp before this contained not fewer than two hundred thousand inhabitants, and had sometimes two thousand ships and vessels lying in the river, and its harbours and its basins. The former are now reduced to less than sixty thousand, and the latter to at most two hundred. The town had before this treaty been sacked and set on fire by the infamous Alva, when six or seven thousand of its inhabitants are said to have perished: and the third, and last time, that its prosperity suffered a severe blow, was occasioned by the overthrow of Bonaparte, when his grand design of making Antwerp the greatest naval arsenal in the north of Europe fell with its projector. His plans for this purpose were undertaken on an immense scale; but they were by no means deserving these extravagant encomiums that were bestowed on them while in their progress. The two basins are undoubtedly planned with great skill, and executed with excellent workmanship. They are conveniently entered from the river, well protected by the guns of the citadel, communicate with each other by a stout pair of iron gates, and another pair connects them with the river. For the security of shipping in the winter months these basins are admirably adapted; and the old East India House, a great quadrangular building, which stands immediately between them, is well situated for the reception of merchandise or naval stores; but they are mere basins, possessing no conveniences whatever for the building or repairs of ships. As commercial docks they are of considerable importance to the town, and on that account solely they escaped demolition, when the dock yard, which was higher up the river, was destroyed.

This demolition of the naval establishment was carried into effect in virtue of the fifteenth article of the Definitive Treaty of Peace, signed at Paris the 30th

May, 1814. By this article, all the ships of war then at Antwerp afloat, and those on the stocks, were—after those actually belonging to Holland, prior to its incorporation in the French empire, had been given up to the Prince of Orange,—to be divided, so that his most Christian Majesty should have two thirds, and the Dutch, in trust for the allied powers, the remaining third; all those on the stocks to be broken up within a specified time, and the ships, docks, and every thing belonging to the naval arsenal, broken up and destroyed. Commissioners were appointed for this partition and demolition, amongst whom was the commander and the surveyor of the British navy. The division was as follows, viz:

To the French.—	12 Sail of the line,
	4 Frigates,
	2 Brigs; besides
	9 Sail of the line, and
	2 Frigates on the stocks, to be broken up.
To the Dutch.—	3 Sail of the line,
	5 Frigates; and, in trust,
	7 Sail of the line.
Total.	{ 31 Sail of the line,
	11 Frigates,
	2 Brigs.

The ordnance stores, guns and ammunition, were also divided, as well as the timber and other naval stores, the estimated value of which exceeded two millions sterling.

Thus perished the dockyards of Antwerp, which Bonaparte had taken so much pains and spent so much money to complete, and which had occasioned so much uneasiness to Great Britain.

The work of destruction being finished, it next became a question as to the demolition of the two fine basins, which, however, would have been no easy matter; at least to such an extent as would have rendered them irreparable. It was calculated that the larger of the two was capable of containing thirty-four sail of the line, and the smaller one, fourteen. The representations of the citizens, however, in favour of their being suffered to remain uninjured, as the receptacles of their merchant shipping, and of their vast utility in protecting them in the winter season against the ice, (which, it seems, floats about in such large masses that, heretofore, those of large dimensions were generally under the necessity of going up to the anchorage in the Rupel branch of the river, seven miles above Antwerp,) prevailed; and it was conceded to the town that these two fine basins should not be destroyed.

All the fortifications, the storehouses, the smitheries, rope-house, and other buildings connected with the dock-yard establishment, were destroyed, but the citadel was suffered to remain untouched. Since the establishment of Antwerp as a naval port by Bonaparte, nineteen sail of the line and thirteen frigates had been put upon the stocks; and between four and five thousand artificers of different descriptions were employed in the dockyards. He had computed, a very little time before his fall, that ten sail of the line might be launched every year. It was boasted of, as a great feat, that a thirty-six gun frigate had been completely finished in one month, with the assistance of the galley slaves to saw the timber. The artificers, for the most part, were soldiers, and their pay was made up to three francs per day. The timber was generally brought by water from the neighbourhood of Tournay and Gemappes; each piece was fashioned in the forest to the shape and purpose for which it was intended. The cannon and heavy iron work were sent from the foundries of Liege. To make this naval arsenal complete, it was intended to construct dry docks at the head of the inner or large basin, the wall of which, at that part, still remains unfinished, or rather, that line of the basin was originally left without masonry. The rise and fall of the tide, which is from fourteen to sixteen feet, is highly favourable for the construction of dry docks, of which, convenient as they are, and considered with us as indispensable, there is but one or two, at the most, in all Holland; the vast expense, from the nature of the soil, and the total want of stone and other material in that country, having probably deterred them from such undertakings. It is supposed that a dock for the reception of a seventy-four gun ship could not be constructed, in any part of Holland, or even at Antwerp, for so little as one hundred thousand pounds.

The masonry of the two basins here alluded to is very fine, the walls being five feet thick, exclusive of the binders. The whole of the works executed at Antwerp by the French is said to have cost them two millions sterling.

The great object of these two basins was the security of the fleet against the floating masses of ice in the river, during the winter, where it is utterly impracticable for large ships, such as those of the line, to remain in any thing like security.

Before they were ready for the admission of the ships that had been built, we understood that twelve sail of the line were sent into winter quarters in the Rupel branch of the river, where, by due precautions of stockades, &c., they escaped without much damage. But no part of the Scheldt affords safe anchorage for large vessels in the winter season.

Even the roadstead of Flushing is at all times a wild, exposed anchorage for ships, being open entirely to the North Sea, which in bad weather rolls in with great impetuosity. Vast sums of money have been expended at that port to render the defensive works, as they thought, impregnable. The magnitude of our last expedition, however, alarmed them; and it is said that no less than five miles were laid, to spring the dykes and inundate the place, if they found it untenable. Fortunately, however, for the people of Flushing, we found it more convenient to seek for shelter in the Roombot, and content ourselves with the possession of the agreeable capital of the island, Middelburg, which was assailed and taken from another quarter. Flushing, however, did not entirely escape; and the inhabitants say that the mischief done to them by the English, was not made good at a less expense than twenty-four millions of francs, or about a million sterling; which, in its present desolate and neglected condition, may be considered about the purchase money of the fee-simple of the town. Still, it was fortunate to have escaped with so little damage; for when the bombardment took place, about one hundred and twenty houses were set on fire; and, on the evacuation of the island, all the public works of Flushing, the arsenal, the basin, the ships of war, the careening wharf and pits, and the storehouses in the dockyard, were either blown up or burnt, or otherwise destroyed. The Dutch were, ultimately, in some degree, avenged of this work of destruction, by the dreadful havoc which the Walcheren fever made among our officers and troops.

The Scheldt, it must be admitted, is a magnificent river, and capable of receiving commodious naval establishments in various parts of its course. Terneuse, indeed, on its left bank, has been considered as preferable to Antwerp, in many points of view, for a naval arsenal; and, among others, on account of its proximity to the mouth of the river, and of the depth of water, which is sufficient to admit ships of the largest size to lie there with all their guns and stores on board, ready at any moment to put to sea, which is not the case with regard to Antwerp. Bonaparte was fully aware of this advantage, and had some intention of removing the naval establishment from Antwerp to Terneuse. A plan to this effect was proposed, which he is said to have seized with eagerness; it contained, among other things, a basin that would hold sixty sail of the line, from whence they might put to sea at once, fully equipped in every respect.

Fortunately for the world, and for Great Britain in particular, his career was cut short in that very portion of Europe, where he had long cherished his magnificent plans for our destruction!

The demolition of Antwerp, and the transfer of ship building, and artificers, and commerce, to the ports of Holland, was one of the heaviest blows that could, in recent times, have been inflicted on the inhabitants of the former; and yet we observed no external symptoms of decay in any part of the town; the houses were all inhabited, and kept in high order; the people bustling and cheerful; the Bourse daily crowded and noisy; the shops well stocked, and every appearance of an active trade carrying on. This city must, indeed, from its advantageous position, always command a very considerable inland trade, independent of what is carried to it by the Scheldt; and, as far as appearances went, we certainly did not observe any visible signs of poverty among the inhabitants. The markets were most abundantly supplied with all the necessities of life, and at a cheap rate—cheap as compared with the rate of wages, and not merely as compared with the prices of similar articles in England. The common people are remarkably well clothed; and from their quiet and placid behaviour, a stranger would judge them to be contented and happy.

It cannot fail to occur to the mind of an Englishman, while visiting Antwerp, that if we were to reverse the case, and suppose it to have been a port of England which had suffered the injury, as well as the indignity, of having one of its principal dockyards blown up, and its fleet partitioned and carried away chiefly by the aid of that very same people who come in shoals to visit the country and take up a residence among them, how very different a feeling would have prevailed among, and how very different a reception the destroyers would have experienced from our countrymen! For, although we were the chief instigators of the blow that crushed the very sources of their prosperity, we did not learn, and certainly did not experience, that the citizens of Antwerp ever manifested the least ill will or incivility towards the numerous Englishmen that have since visited their port; they ascribed, as in justice they ought, the whole of their misfortunes to the French.

There are several very fine old buildings in Antwerp, of a peculiar style of architecture, and the houses in general exhibit a very pleasing fancy in the shapes and ornaments of their gable ends, many of which are extremely picturesque; but, with the exception of the churches and convents, and the Hotel de Ville, there are few public buildings that deserve much attention. This last mentioned ancient structure is situated in the Grand Place, which, however, scarcely deserves the name of a square, and is altogether inferior to another adjoining, called the Place Vert, which, from a churchyard, has been converted into a handsome square, planted with trees and fenced in by posts of blue stone and iron railings.

There is something imposing in the architecture, and remarkable in the general appearance, of the Hotel de Ville; the central part of the front is cased entirely with variegated marble, and ornamented with statues. The main façade is little short of 300 feet. It was once burnt down, and restored, as an inscription tells us, in 1581. We were told that the public library, within this building, was open every day from nine o'clock till four; but the extent and value of its contents were not ascertained by us—being unable to prevail on a cold phlegmatic Dutchman, the only guardian of the place, to admit us; so that we did not see what little there is to be seen within this externally imposing edifice.

We were more fortunate, however, in our visit to the Museum of Paintings, in the suppressed convent of Recolets, to which, though shut up from the public, during the exhibition of pictures by modern artists, we, being strangers, found no difficulty of admission.

In this collection have been brought together many of the best pictures which were at one time in the several churches and convents of the city; and among them are a few specimens, that may be classed with the most perfect of the numerous pictures painted by Rubens. The Museum consists of two great rooms. On the right side of the first gallery is the celebrated painting of this artist, "Christ crucified between the two thieves," universally acknowledged as one of the most magnificent specimens of art, both in design and execution, and generally esteemed among the first, if not the very first performance of Rubens.

The figure of Christ, "already dead," is that of a person who has departed in calm and tranquil repose, free from all appearance of convulsive movement, and contrasts finely with the hideous distortions of the features of the robber who reproached him, and who is evidently writhing with agony; and as the executioner, with a bar of iron, is breaking his limbs, we see the convulsive twitchings of every part of his body, while the blood trickles down from the foot he has torn from the cross, to which it was nailed. But no pencil, except that of Rubens, could have painted the heavenly countenance of the Magdalen, as she looks at the horseman pointing his spear against our Saviour's side. "It is," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "by far the most beautiful profile I ever saw of Rubens; or, I think, of any other painter; the excellence of its colouring is beyond expression." It would occupy too much space to describe the whole of this collection.

In the Museum are also several good pictures of Van Dyk; but after the eye has feasted on the brilliant colouring of Rubens, they appear, to a mere amateur, and not one of the cognoscenti, cold and spiritless. There are two or three crucifixions by this master, a Pieta, as it is called, being the dead Christ on the knee of the Virgin, and a few portraits. That, however, in which Christ is expiring on the Cross, and Catherine of Sienna embracing it, while Saint Dominic is standing in an attitude of contemplation, is esteemed, as it ought to be, a sublime composition, heightened as it is by the dark and agitated appearance of the elements in the back ground. This picture formerly belonged to the nuns of the order of St. Dominic. There is also a fine portrait by Van Dyk of Cesar Alexander Scaglia.

Of artists of less note there are several good pictures,—some by Seghers, Jordaens, Old Frank, Martin de Vos, Breughel, Pourbus, Coxie, and other Flemish masters.

We had not time, nor, indeed, much inclination, after feasting on the rich productions of the old masters in the two galleries of the Museum, to bestow much attention on the pictures of living artists which were now exhibiting in two other galleries; in addition to which was a room appropriated to statuary figures, at the end of that on the left of the entrance.

There appeared, however, to be many very respectable performances; and what was sufficiently encouraging to the progress of art, the rooms were crowded with spectators. It is not improbable, from the numerous collections that have been made, and are still making, by individuals, that Antwerp is once more likely to become the seat of the arts for the encouragement of the painters of the Netherlands. The contest will be between this place and Brussels; but the advantage is on the side of Antwerp, from its possessing the greatest number, and the finest specimens of the first artist that adorned his native country, the celebrated Rubens.

The Cathedral of Notre Dame, even if it were not in possession of the chef-d'œuvre of this great master, cannot fail to invite the curiosity of the protestant traveller. Our sex-vit was to this fine building, whose magnificent towers are justly reckoned among the first which exist in the world; or, more correctly speaking, the tower which is surmounted by a spire; for though there are two precisely alike, yet only one of them is completed, by having a lofty spire rising from its summit, and making the whole height to be about four hundred and fifty feet, to which may be added fifteen feet more to the height of the shaft on which the cross is placed. It is said, indeed, by some of the guide-books to be five hundred feet. The massive tower may reduce the appearance of its height, and deceive the eye; but it certainly does not appear to exceed four hundred feet to the pinnacle of the cross. The spire is light and elegant, and of the same class as that of Strasbourg and the Town-hall of Brussels. This noble edifice is said to have taken nearly a century in completing, being commenced under the direction of an architect of the name of Appelmans in 1422, and finished in 1518. One of the towers is furnished with a fine set of chimneys or carillons, the largest bell of which is said to weigh sixteen thousand pounds.

The interior of Notre Dame fully corresponds in grandeur with the exterior. From the great door which is between the two towers, or in other words, from the lower extremity of the nave to the opposite end, behind the great altar, the dimensions are given as follows:—The length five hundred feet; the breadth two hundred and thirty; and the height three hundred and sixty feet. Of the accuracy of the last dimension there may be some doubt; and the length appears to be somewhat exaggerated.

The columns which support the arcades are not to be classed, in point of beauty, with those of York Cathedral, nor those even of Westminster Abbey; but what may be wanting in elegance, or grandeur of design, is amply compensated by the high order and the perfect state of neatness in which every part of the church is kept, and in the beauty of the decorations. The grand altar is a masterpiece of architecture, designed by Rubens; and facing it, at the lower end of the nave, is a portion of eight columns, which support the loft in which the organ is placed, equally chaste and beautiful.

The pulpit is a fine piece of carved wood, laboriously and admirably executed by Verbruggen. It is supported by four figures as large as life, hand-in-hand; and the railings of the steps and other parts are surmounted by birds of various kinds, some of which exist in nature, and others are imaginary; but the whole of the workmanship is exquisitely beautiful. All the confessionals are fronted with upright figures of different characters, and in different attitudes, all of them highly expressive of the meaning which the sculptor intended to convey.

In the several chapels are various pieces of sculpture in marble, and paintings by Van Baelen, Diepenbeck, Backer, Otto Venius, and others; and in one on the right, as we descended from the choir, is a beautiful piece of sculpture in marble, representing Christ crucified. But the most precious and valuable treasures which Notre Dame contains, are two pictures of Rubens, one of which is considered as the chef-d'œuvre of this great master. It is the celebrated "Descent from the Cross," which, of all the numerous works of Rubens, maintains the pre-eminence.

Sir Joshua Reynolds has recorded his disappointment on first seeing it—not, however, at the picture itself, so much as the manner in which it has been misused by cleaning, blotching, and varnishing. This is no doubt true; but placed where it is, in a very indignant and cross light, it will require a skilful and a practised eye to detect it. He considers the Christ "as one of the finest figures that ever was invented;" adding, that "the hanging of the head on his shoulder, and the filling of the body on one side, give such an appearance of the heaviness of death, that nothing can exceed it." He admits, likewise, that two of the three Marys have more beauty than Rubens generally bestowed on female figures. It would be ridiculous as well as presumptuous to dispute the taste and judgment of Sir Joshua Reynolds; but we certainly all agree to go much further than this qualified praise he has bestowed on this wonderful production, and to pronounce that female figure on whose shoulder the foot of Christ appears to be resting, to be possessed of one of the sweetest and most heavenly countenances that ever was produced by the pencil of man; and the young woman by her side, who is looking up to Christ with intense anxiety, as not much inferior.

It was said by some English critic, that the women of Rubens were like Flanders wares. It is true, that in some of his large pictures, such as the "Rape of the Sabinas," and some others, the female figures are not of the most elegant or delicate shape, or the most lovely features; but in the figures in the picture in question, and indeed, in all his productions in the Museum of Antwerp, he has amply redeemed this fault.

The great mass of light in this picture proceeds from the white sheet, which, Sir Joshua says, was a bold attempt, and which few but Rubens would have ventured on, for fear of hurting the colour of the flesh; but he does not notice, what many will think detracts somewhat from the dignity and solemnity of the subject, the vulgar though natural mode in which the figure, leaning over the cross, takes the sheet in his teeth, in order to have both his hands at liberty to assist in lowering down the body.

On the left of the nave of the cathedral, in proceeding towards the choir, and as a companion to the "Descent," is another celebrated picture by Rubens, of the "Elevation of the Cross." This we did not see, a ladder being placed against the doors that concealed it, for the purpose of cleaning the frames, and varnishing the outside pictures, against the grand fête that was to be held at Antwerp the following month, preparatory to which all the churches of this city were undergoing the process of painting and cleaning; but the picture in question is represented by Sir Joshua Reynolds as one of this artist's "best and most animated compositions." On the outside of the wings are painted, "St. Catherine with a sword, and St. Eloi attended by a female Saint and Angels."

The church of St. James, even if it were not for the splendid picture of Rubens, would be of superior interest in every respect to the Cathedral. It is filled in every part with well-executed sculpture and paintings of great merit, though not of the highest class.

The exterior of St. James's Church is by no means undeserving of notice. The tower is finely marked by bold projections; and, though not belonging to any particular class of architecture, will deservedly attract the traveller's admiration.

The only other church, worthy of notice, is that of St. Paul, formerly belonging to the Dominicans. In some respects, the ornamental part of this church is not inferior to the preceding. Against the columns of the nave are placed the statues of the twelve apostles; six on each side, rather of a colossal size, but very well executed. The magnificent altar-piece in the choir, with its marble columns and various sculpture, is the work of Verbruggen, as is also the marble statue of St. Paul which faces it.

We happened to visit St. Paul's at the time of high mass, and the effect was very remarkable. The choir is separated from the nave and the side aisles by a screen, and the high altar is visible only through a great arch between it and the nave. A high flight of steps leads up to the altar.

The effect was quite theatrical. The platform before the altar at the top of the steps; the magnificent candelabra, with lights burning in them; the splendid dresses of the officiating priests; their activity and rapid movement up and down the steps; the ringing of the bell, and the elevation of the host, seen, as it appeared, at an immense distance through the centre arch, and huge oleander shrubs in full flower ranged on each side,—had really the effect of a scenic representation, which was not diminished by the pealing organ, the band of music, and the vocal accompaniment, which tended to keep up to admiration the jeu de théâtre.

The mass being ended, the congregation, consisting chiefly of women, and, by far the greater number, women of a certain age, were entertained with a concert of vocal and instrumental music in aid of the organ, which is considered by the people of Antwerp the very first instrument of the kind in all Brabant, and is, at all events, unquestionably a very fine and powerful organ; yet a regular band of wind and stringed instruments was stationed in the organ-loft to assist in the performance.

They played, as we were told, an overture of Mozart, after which some light pieces, which did not appear to be exactly suited to the solemnity of the place; but the object evidently was to please the audience, while the elderly ladies, in particular, were crowding round one of the inferior priests to kiss some relic, which he held in one hand, and wiped with a cloth carried in the other every kiss that this precious article, whatever it might be, received, before it was presented to the next. But this process went on in rapid succession, while, in the mean time, the tin boxes were passing round to collect the grossen, cents, or shuyers, from the poor people who had thus been favoured with a holy kiss. On hearing the lively music, and the effect it produced, one could not help thinking that Whitfield was not far wrong when he answered some of his flock, who objected to the introduction of lively tunes into his chapel, that he did not see why the devil should be allowed to run away with all the good ones.

Without intending to speak slightly of any religion, which has for its object the adoration of the Deity, or being fastidious as to the forms and ceremonies which may be thought necessary to impress the public mind with the duty and necessity of assembling together, for the purpose of joining in public worship; and fully agreeing with the poet that, we still thought that the exhibition at St. Paul's appeared to outstep the bounds of decorum, by converting into a display of levity, not to say mockery, what was intended to be an act of solemnity.

"For modes of faith let zealous bigots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

Evelyn speaks with rapture of "delicious shades and walks of stately trees, which render the fortified works of Antwerp one of the sweetest places in Europe." Since his time, too, we have heard of shady walks, and the groves and pleasure-grounds within and without the walls; but they have all vanished; and it will require some years longer before the traveller can speak with delight on things of this kind. The inflexible Carnot, who was intrusted with the defence of the place, laid all around it bare; and the young trees, that have since been planted, are something about the size of those which are intended to form the grand mall in the Regent's Park, London.

The trees, however, have been replanted, and even the rising generation may perhaps enjoy the benefit of their shade. The Quay, at present, seems to be the best promenade; and when these trees have attained ten or twelve years' growth, it will then form a handsome walk by the side of the Scheldt.

CHAPTER II.

FROM ANTWERP TO ROTTERDAM.

The most convenient, as well as the most expeditious mode of proceeding from Antwerp to Rotterdam is by the steam boat, which, during the summer months, starts daily, at a certain hour, from either port, regulated by the state of the tide. The somewhat circuitous route among the islands, cannot make the distance much less than eighty miles, which, in our case, were performed in ten hours; having left Antwerp at nine in the morning, and landed on the Quay of Rotterdam at seven in the evening.

Our fellow passengers were not far short of a hundred, English, Dutch, Germans, Norwegians, and Americans; the ladies nearly as numerous as the gentlemen. A good substantial dinner was provided at a price reasonable enough; we had delightful weather, the water smooth, every body in good humour; and the navigation among the islands was not only pleasant, but full of interest; the ingenious and laborious works of the industrious Hollanders meeting the eye, in every possible contrivance, to save their lands and habitations from the inroads of the sea.

Among the various people of European nations assembled in the steamer, every person, with the exception of two French ladies, spoke intelligible English. The steward had been a prisoner of war in England, and entered into the British army; was sent to the Cape of Good Hope, where he was wounded in a skirmish with the Kaffers; and, though young and healthy, had the good fortune to enjoy a pension for life from Chelsea Hospital. He was one of the many thousand foreigners, who, perfectly able to maintain themselves, are mainly supported by the bounty of Great Britain; and it would seem but reasonable, when certain gentlemen in the house of commons are grudging the pittance of half-pay to officers of the British army, those of the German Legion, many of whom are serving in the armies of their respective states, should be the first to undergo a reduction, more especially when it is considered that ten shillings on the continent is equivalent to twenty in England.

The course pursued from Antwerp is down the Scheldt, in the first instance, as far as Batz; then through the narrow channel close to the edge of the extensive sand, along the eastern side of South Beveland, which is the Verdronken, or sunken land; the channel of deepest water, which is shallow enough, is here marked off by tall branches of trees, continuing for a long way, and until the fortress of Bergen-op-zoom is passed at a considerable distance to the right. We next enter the long and narrow channel of Tholen; through the Volk Kalk into the Flakke and Holland's Diep. After this the steamer enters another narrow channel, more resembling an artificial canal than an arm of the sea, and it continues nearly of an equal width as far as Dordrecht or Dort, being seldom more than from fifty to sixty yards wide. It has no visible artificial embankments, but both its sides, apparently on a level with the water, are thickly clothed with tall reeds. Yet in this narrow channel were lying at anchor a long range of square-rigged vessels, Dutch, Americans, and Norwegians, at least from two to four hundred tons burthen, but not a single English ship among them; a fact that was noticed with a sort of triumph, as indeed well it might, by a young American officer, who was one of the passengers, and who suffered none of his country ships to be passed without calling the attention of the passengers to the stripes and stars. These vessels were laden chiefly with staves, lumber, tobacco, and other articles of American growth and produce.

Very little population had hitherto been seen along the shores of the islands; but on approaching Dort, the scene began to change; cottages and workshops of various kinds skirted this narrow navigation close to the water's edge; and here and there a neatly painted house was seen planted in the midst of a garden. At some little distance from Dort the uniformity was relieved, and the unvaried scene much enlivened, by the appearance of some fifty or sixty windmills,—some reckoned up near a hundred,—busily whirling round, some employed in grinding corn, others in crushing various kinds of seeds, chiefly rape, for their oil, some in the preparation of snuff, but by far the greater number in sawing wood. The reedy banks of the channel had now given way to little patches of garden ground in front of these mills, the lower part of which were generally very neat inhabited dwellings; their roofs, and also the sides of the mills above the habitable part, were mostly thatched with reeds, in a very neat manner, and so contrived that nothing but the points were visible, which gave the appearance of their being covered with a brown rough coat of sand or pebbles, but at a little distance this covering resembled the skin of a mole.

Now also we had on both sides of this navigable channel, which from Dort to Rotterdam may be considered as the united branches of the Rhine and the Meuse, numerous small establishments of ship and boat builders, small villages, and now and then a gentleman's house and pleasure grounds. The confluence of the two streams at Dort had considerably enlarged the navigable channel, which here takes the name of the Maas, and retains it till it reaches the sea, having first passed Rotterdam, Delfshaven, and the Brille. A little above Rotterdam we observed, among other shipping that were at anchor, one of the most extraordinary, and it will probably turn out one of the most useless, and it may be added, dangerous, vessels that ever was sent upon the ocean. A friend of ours had the curiosity to go on board, and ascertain the particulars of her size and construction. She was a steam boat, named the Atlas, and intended for Batavia. Her length measured two hundred and fifty feet, breadth thirty-eight feet, and her calculated burthen nine hundred and fifty tons. She had three engines, each of one hundred horse power; four masts, of which her foremast was so calculated as to carry a fore and aft sail, square top-sail, topgallant-sail, and studding-sails. The topsail-yard was seventy-four feet long; the other three masts were rigged alike, with fore and aft sails, and gaff topsails; her deck was described as rising considerably from the bow and stern towards the centre, which gave her the appearance of being hogged; and this, the engineer said, was purposely done to enable her to bear the weight of the engines without breaking; but he expected they would bring her deck to a level. It would probably not stop there, but rather sink it to an inverted arch, and the ship itself to the bottom of the sea, if any person can be found careless enough of his life to carry her out upon that element. She is wall-sided, and appeared to have no bearing on the water. The Dutch, having no name in their own language for steam, but ruik or damp, have borrowed one from us, and called this kind of vessel a Stoom-boat; the Germans have named it a Dampf-schiff.

On landing on the quay of Rotterdam, we found the Hotel des Pays-bas, a large and most excellent house, completely full, which compelled us to take up our abode at the New Bath Hotel, a much inferior one on the same quay. The house was small and indifferently furnished; but the most essential part, the beds, were good, and the linen, both for them and the table, white as snow. This article the traveller will find clean and neat throughout Holland, Prussia, and the Netherlands. And it may here be added, that in no single instance were we disgusted or annoyed, notwithstanding the heat of the nights, with bug, flea, gnat, or musquito, in any part of our route, with the single exception of a few small gnats that had entered the open window at Antwerp. This is the more surprising, especially in Holland, where so much stagnant water prevails.

The landlord affected a taste for pictures, and showed us one covered with a curtain in the dining room, for which, he told us, an Englishman had offered him ten thousand guilders, about 830*l*. The subject was St. John in the Wilderness, by Murillo, and he said it was out of the Orleans' collection.

All the luggage of the ninety or a hundred passengers was bundled on shore as fast as it could be got out, and laid on the quay at the same time. The night closing in, it was not without reason that some of the party were apprehensive of the fine opportunity that was afforded the Dutch porters to take advantage of, and exercise their thieving propensities, at which, they had learned from Marianne Starke's "Guide," they were uncommonly expert, and likewise much given to imposition. It would be but fair on the part of Marianne Starke (if such a person there be), or of her publisher (if it should be a nom de guerre), to print in a note, as an act of impartiality, and for the benefit of Dutchmen who may travel in England, the following notification, which appears in an English newspaper, that happened to be in the steamer—"Margate is very full of company, and plenty of pickpockets; thieving is so much the fashion here now, that constables are obliged to be stationed on the pier during the time of landing the passengers; and it is quite impossible to frequent public places, without a protecting guard." With regard to ourselves, it is but justice to say that every article, great and small, belonging to seven persons, was carefully lodged in the hotel, though nearly dark; and that the porters, so far from practising or attempting imposition, left the remuneration for their trouble entirely to ourselves, only observing, with a smile, that it was now keemes, or fair time; as much as to say, "I hope your honours will give us a trifle to drink." When we call to mind the daily reports from the several police offices of thieving, robbing, pocket picking, house breaking, and swindling, we have not much to boast of English honesty over that of foreigners.

ROTTERDAM.

A smooth flowing river, as large as the Thames at Westminster, and thrice its depth, bordered on the one side opposite to the town with a high green sloping bank planted with trees, and on the town side with a noble, uninterrupted quay, of at least three fourths of a mile in extent; and on this quay a long line of fine old elm trees, of some centuries' growth, yet still in full vigour,—such are the objects that, on approaching Rotterdam by water, first strike the stranger's eye, and, with the several tiers of ships along the whole extent of the quay, are admirably calculated to convey to his mind an impression of the wealth and importance of this commercial city.

The name given to this fine quay does not at all correspond with its present description. It is called Boontjes, or "the little trees," which, like the "new streets" of our towns, are frequently among the oldest that are found therein. The "Boontjes" are now fully equal in size to the largest trees in St. James's Park, having been planted in the year 1615.

It is not very difficult to give a general idea of Rotterdam; but the effect which is altogether produced on a stranger, who, for the first time, has visited a Dutch city, is not so easily to be conveyed. The ground plan of the city is that of a triangle, the base being the quay we have mentioned, stretching along the river, in its whole length about a mile and a quarter, according to the plan, the central portion of which is the "Boontjes," occupying, as before said, about three quarters of a mile; and a perpendicular, drawn from it to the opposite extremity, may be somewhat less than a mile. Through the middle of most of the streets runs a straight canal, bordered by large, lofty, and healthy trees,—oaks, elms, and lime trees, chiefly the latter; and all these canals are, or at least were, crowded with shipping of every conceivable size and form. They are crossed by numerous drawbridges, which, mixed with the shipping, the trees, and the houses, have a very picturesque effect. Between the trees and each of the canals is the quay, which is of a width sufficient for shipping, landing, and receiving all articles of merchandise; and within the row of trees is the paved street for carts, carriages, and horses; and between this again, and extending close to the fronts of the houses, is a paved footpath of bricks, or clinkers as they are called, set edgewise, which, like our trottoirs, are for the sole use of foot passengers, but, unlike ours, are not raised above the level of the street. It will readily be imagined, that in these canal streets, with all the shipping, there will be an incessant bustle.

The houses are generally on a large scale, and lofty; in many of the streets they are really elegant. But belonging, as they do, chiefly to merchants and tradesmen, their work-houses or magazines are sometimes on the ground floor, and frequently extend far behind, while the family is contented to inhabit the upper stories. With all this, however, nothing can exceed in cleanliness every part of the exterior of those houses. Here we observed, as in Antwerp, that the women were constantly employed in washing the walls, the doors, the window shutters, and windows, by means of small pump engines, or with pails, mops, and scrubbing brushes; and, when engaged in this operation, they are seldom deterred from pursuing their task of brushing, scrubbing, or dashing water, by the heaviest showers of rain that may happen to fall. In fact, a Dutchman's house externally is as neat as paint and water can make it; nor are they less neat and clean in the interior. The floors, in general, are so rubbed and polished as scarcely to allow one to walk upon them with safety.

There are three principal canals, or rather, from their superior size and opening into the river, are called havens or harbours. One of these, on the western extremity of the city, is named the Leuve haven, and two others towards the eastern extremity, the old and new havens. They are, strictly speaking, three branches or creeks of the Maas, communicating with each other and with the various canals which intersect the town; thus not only affording a constant supply of water to the canals, but, by the ebbing and flowing of the tide, keeping up a circulation; and, like the arteries of the human body, conveying to all the smaller branches a fresh supply of water, and preserving it from becoming stagnant and putrid. In addition to this supply from the Maas, is that of the river Rotte, which descends through the very heart of the town, contributing its portion to the replenishing of the canals.

The old haven, near the extremity where it joins the Maas, is too wide for a drawbridge, and is crossed, therefore, by a flat bottomed boat, which plies as a ferry.

The other havens and the canals have many drawbridges over them; and some have permanent stone piers, with openings only in the middle to let the vessels pass through when their masts stand.

It may be observed that, in general, each particular species of merchandise has its appropriate canal and quay; and following up this principle, each of the eight or ten market places has its own peculiar articles for sale, as the butter market, the cheese market, the fish market, &c.

It is said that Rotterdam at present contains about fifty thousand inhabitants, which is about one third part less than in the days of its prosperity; and it may be doubted whether, with all the appearance of briskness and bustle, it is making much progress towards the recovery of its former prosperous state: for though there certainly were evident indications of an active commerce about the quays, and the canals and basins were crowded with shipping, most of them Dutch bottoms, and evidently, from their state of equipment, engaged, or about to be engaged, in trade; yet it was a remark we made, in perambulating the town, that none of us had noticed a single additional house recently built, or that was building, or even an old one repairing, in any one of the streets; and there are certainly not many streets in Rotterdam that we did not, in our short stay, visit. The same observation will apply to the suburbs and their environs, at least on the side which faces the direction of Amsterdam.

In fact, Rotterdam, like all the sea port towns of Holland, will yet require time to regain its former state of activity and prosperity. Before that luckless hour in which the sober-minded and calculating Dutchman was seized with the frenzy of Vrijheid en Gelykheid—liberty and equality—which ended in driving away the Oude Stadhouders, and receiving the fraternal embrace of the French;—that is to say, before the year 1793, the number of ships that annually cleared out from Rotterdam is stated to have been about one thousand nine hundred; from that year to 1814, the number had dwindled down to something less than two hundred. They have now again gradually advanced to about one thousand five hundred; and when they shall have reached that point in the scale, from which they descended, the citizens of Rotterdam will probably once more build new houses, and renovate some of the once splendid establishments, particularly those connected with their East India trade and possessions, that have fallen into decay.

In the midst of their decreasing prosperity, however, it does not appear that any of their charitable institutions have been neglected or abridged; and absorbed as the Dutch are generally supposed to be, in the ways and means of accumulating "filthy lucre," they cannot justly be accused of any disinclination to relieve the distresses of humanity, or to promote the moral and intellectual advancement of their countrymen. They have their Bible Societies and their Missionary Societies; they have a Society of Arts and Sciences, instituted for public benefit; they have a Philosophical Society, which takes the name, or rather adopts as its motto, the words "Variety and harmony,"—" Verscheidenheit en Ooreenstemming;"—words that, to an English ear, are not well calculated to convey the idea of harmony. But there is still another society for experimental philosophy, with a name that almost frightens one to look at,—"Genootschap van Proefondervindelijke Wysgeerte." Its objects are highly important to society, but to this singular country in particular—the improvement of agriculture, navigation, hydraulics, and highways.

The public buildings of Rotterdam are not particularly striking. The ports or gates are among the most remarkable. The Exchange is a modern building, with a dome in the centre, and a turret at each end. The East India House is a large plain building in the "Boontjes." The Court of Justice is a neat building enough; and the Schiedam-huis is, perhaps, the handsomest specimen of architecture in Rotterdam. On its front are several pilasters crowned with Corinthian capitals, and the pediment in the centre is filled with allegorical sculpture. It was the house in which the commissioners for the regulation and management of dykes and canals held their meetings; and in it were lodged Napoleon and Maria Louisa; when, in 1811, they made the tour of Holland. The India House and Custom House have nothing remarkable in their size or appearance.

To almost every house in Rotterdam, and sometimes to every window of a house on the first floor, there is fixed a single or double looking-glass or reflector, by means of which a person in the room, sitting before the window, can see by reflection the whole length of the street, the passengers, the trees, the canal, and the shipping. When two of these reflectors are placed at right angles, and the right angle pointed towards the window, thus, Δ , a person within directing the eye to that angle will see the whole street both to the right and to the left. In some of the towns of England one may now and then observe one of these reflecting glasses, which is generally supposed to be intended to put the inhabitant on his guard against unwelcome visitors, and on that account they have been whimsically called dinner-scopes. In Rotterdam they are universally adopted for the amusement of the ladies, more especially those of the upper classes, who appear but seldom in the streets.

We were surprised at first that so few shops were observed in the principal streets—in several of them none whatever, till we were informed that in the Hoop street, or High street, there were nothing but shops. This street is so far singular, that it has no canal in it. It runs in a direct line east and west, through the town, and may be assimilated to the Strand in London, before its improved state, as to length and breadth, and the number of its shops; but the houses in general are far superior to those of the old Strand; and when we passed through it, we found the street nearly as crowded and full of bustle as that of London; but this was probably occasioned by its being the annual fair or Kermis.

This street, so different from the rest, was built on a ridge raised considerably above the others, while narrow alleys on either side had a regular descent from it.

The same kind of street, we were told, was to be met with in most of the towns of Holland; and, indeed, we found it to be so. Sometimes we were led to conclude that this elevated situation was owing to the accumulation of earth that had been thrown out in digging the canals in the streets parallel to it. This, however, could not have been precisely the case here. The line of Hoog street was originally the dyk or rampart that protected the old town, to the northward of it, from the inundations of the Maas, which then washed the foot of this rampart; and which the whole extent of the town between it and the Maas, which is, in fact, the largest and best portion of Rotterdam, stands on ground gained from the water, and consequently much lower than the rampart on which the Hoog street is built.

There is not much in Rotterdam, after the first sight of it, to attract the traveller's attention. The churches in Holland have little to recommend them; for here, as in all countries where the reformed religion took root and expelled catholicism, the churches were stripped of all their statues, pictures, and other decorations that were profusely lavished on them by their former possessors. The old Romanish cathedral, at the upper part of Rotterdam, is a fine lofty building, having a remarkably large square tower, with bold projections, the picturesque effect of which is increased by its unfinished state, the top appearing to be in a ruinous and crumbling condition. Internally, with the exception of a few monuments, there is little beyond the magnitude of the building itself to attract notice. The choir is fenced off from the great aisle by a screen of bronze railing. The high altar, with its former ornaments, its sculptures and paintings of saints and angels, has wholly disappeared; and a plain pulpit usurps the place where the altar once stood, to be used only for the celebration of marriages, and the examination and confirmation of catechumens.

To compensate in some degree for the absence of ornament, an organ has recently been completed, which may be classed among the first instruments of the kind for power and tone that are any where to be met with. The gentleman who happened to be in the church when we visited it, and who was one of its deacons or elders, assured us that it contained five thousand five hundred pipes: that the large disposition pipe was thirty-two feet high, and sixteen inches square.

The height of the ceiling he said was two hundred feet; deduct from this the height of the portico or colonnade on which the organ stands, and the height of the ornament between its summit and the ceiling, which together did not appear to exceed fifty feet, and there remains one hundred and fifty feet for the height of the organ; it did not, however, appear so high. It requires three pair of bellows to supply it with wind. This gentleman sent for the organist, who played with several stops; some of the tones were so deep and powerful as to shake the floor. The human voice stop plays sweetly, and in a chorus the tenor and treble are peculiarly soft and melodious; and we imagined the resemblance of the sounds to those of human voices to be very striking. The Haarlem organ has generally been mentioned as the largest in the world, but we were assured that this of St. Lawrence was very considerably larger and more powerful.

Every stranger, who takes up his abode in Rotterdam, thinks it right to pay a visit to the statue of Erasmus, erected in the great market place, on the centre of an arched bridge, and looking down the canal. It is of bronze and almost black; but we were told that for some time after it was first put up, it was the custom to make it undergo an annual scouring, till it was quite bright, and that the practice was only discontinued on those who had the charge of it being satisfied that by such a process they were destroying the beauty of the workmanship and altering the features. The figure appears intent on a book which he holds open in both hands; it impresses one with the idea of a sober, sedate person, just in that act and attitude which best would become the character of that great man which it was intended to represent. On two of the sides of the pedestal are two long Latin inscriptions, and on the other two sides the same number in the Dutch language. His real name in that language was Gerrit Gerritz, a cacophonous appellation, which he appears to have felt was not exactly calculated to float smoothly down the stream of time, beyond the precincts of his own country; and he therefore translated it into Latin and Greek terms of cognate signification, and called himself Desiderius Erasmus. We did not perceive that there was any thing remarkable in the execution, either of the head and features, or of the drapery; we thought it above mediocrity, but far below what Chantry and Westmacott, Bailey and many others at home have executed.

Not far from hence, in a narrow street without a canal, stands the cathedral, which leads to the small house in which this learned man lived, and in a niche between two windows in the upper tier, there is also placed a small statue of him, under which is this inscription, Hec est parva domus, magnus quo notatur Erasmus. But, alas! to what vile uses many men's houses, as well as their bodies, be turned!—this humble dwelling of Erasmus is converted into a gin shop.

The stork, in its annual visits, for it is a bird of passage, is never molested in Holland. It, therefore, does not scruple to build its nest on the tops of trees in the midst of towns and villages, on the towers of churches, and even on the chimney tops. In our rambles through the streets, some of our party happened to observe a flock of these birds wheeling high in the air over our heads, when a Dutch gentleman told us that, on the following day or the day after, they would certainly take their leave of Holland, being congregated for their departure; he said it had long been remarked that these creatures knew precisely, and strictly kept, their appointed days of arrival and departure in and from Holland, which were about the middle of February and the middle of August, within a very few days more or less. This is, in fact, just what has been said of this bird in days of old, as we learn from the book of Job, "The stork in the heavens hath its appointed times." It is not exactly known to what parts of the world they migrate from the northern portion of Europe; but they are common to Egypt, Palestine, Barbary, and the plains of Northern Africa;—why then, it may be asked, do they leave the food they seem most to delight in—such as snakes, frogs, reptiles, and insects—just at the time when they most abound?—and proceed to these sandy and barren countries, where, it is true, snakes and lizards, and a few venomous reptiles may be equally plentiful, but are, perhaps, the only kind of food which Holland affords. Perhaps they may be possessed of delicate appetites similar to our own, and have discovered that, like some of our birds and fishes, these aquatic animals of Holland are out of season in the middle of August. The truth is, we know but little of the real history of migratory animals, or of the cause for their migration.

Fortunately for the stork, it is held as a sacred bird, not only by the Dutch and Danes, but also in Asia and Africa; for different reasons, perhaps, in these different regions. In Holland, not so much for any service it may be supposed to render, in cleaning their dykes and ditches,—for the Dutch have no dislike whatever to frogs,—but on account of the alleged filial affection of the young birds for their parents. This trait was so well known to the ancients, that the stork became an emblem of filial piety; its English name, indeed, is taken from the Greek, and signifies natural affection.

A Danish author says that when the storks first make their appearance in early spring, nothing is more common than to see many of the old birds, tired and feeble with their long flight, supported occasionally on the backs of the young ones; and the peasants have no doubt that they are laid carefully in those very nests, in which the year before these young ones had been nurtured. Thus says the poet,—

"The stork's an emblem of true piety;
Because when age has seized and made his dam
Unfit for flight, the grateful young one takes
His mother on his back, provides her food,
Rejoicing thus her tender care of him,
Ere he was fit to fly."

The Dutch have the character of being a grave and sedate people, but they have also a great deal of dry humour and drollery about them, that is sometimes exceedingly amusing; and no people in the world are more fond of social intercourse than they are. On every side of the city of Rotterdam are tea-gardens, and houses of entertainment, where the citizens meet to enjoy themselves with various kinds of games, drinking their wine, tea, or coffee, and smoking their pipes. They have also their Vauxhalls and Almack's in the suburbs, and what is still better, besides the societies already mentioned, they have a very flourishing one for the encouragement of literature and the fine arts. There is also a botanical garden, which we regretted not having time to visit.

The kermis, or annual fair, to which people of all descriptions resort from different parts of the country, was held at this time in various parts of the city; and the wider streets were filled with booths for the sale of trinkets and children's toys, cakes, and gingerbread, with all manner of eating and drinking, tossing of pancakes, and the same kind of exhibitions and amusements as are seen in one of our own country fairs of the better kind.

This annual festival had just commenced as we arrived, and was to continue a fortnight. All was cheerfulness and bustle; but neither noise, nor tumult, nor drunkenness incommenced the inhabitants in their houses, or the passengers in the streets. It was decent mild, quiet humour, and comely drollery.

We found some difficulty in getting admittance to the dock-yard. It was necessary, we were told, at the gate, to have an order or a recommendation from some respectable inhabitant; but as the dock-yard was situated at the extremity of the town, and our time was pressing, we desired the porter to take our cards to the Schout by Night, or rear-admiral, who was acting as the commissioner, and whose name was De Reus. He immediately gave an order that we should see every thing; on which the officer who attended us seemed to lay great stress, as a special mark of favour; but we soon found that this "seeing every thing" was in fact to see very little worth seeing. It consisted chiefly of three objects, which seemed to be considered as the only "lions" that could be interesting to a landsman, and the only ones shown to strangers, though it is more than probable there was nothing more to be seen than the nakedness of the land.

First, there was the armoury, in which the muskets, pikes, swords, pistols, and all the offensive weapons, except the great guns, used in ships of war, are kept, in bright order, and tastefully enough arranged. They are contained in two small rooms, and could not, at the most, be more than sufficient for the supply of five or six sail of the line.

The second object of exhibition was a new steamboat lying afloat in a canal, that was housed over, built expressly for the use of his majesty, and intended to convey himself and family between the Hague and Brussels, or any other part of his dominions traversed by rivers or canals; though it is probable they will soon give up the navigation of the latter by steam on experiencing the havoc and destruction which the waves, raised by the paddle-wheels, will occasion to the earthen banks. The length of this vessel measured 135 feet; it had two engines of 35 horse power each. The chimney or funnel, and the rigging that supports it, the railing that runs along the sides, and every thing on deck that is metal, were of copper, kept bright by constant scouring and rubbing, which, in this damp climate, and not the best of all possible atmospheres, must be a daily drudgery to several persons. The sides are painted green, and the upper works green and gold, highly ornamented with emblematic sculpture, covered with gilding. Even the rudder is gilt down to the water's edge. The cabins are neatly fitted up, and lined with mahogany. The king and queen have each a bedroom. There are bed places for eight gentlemen attendants, and for two maids of honour.

The third "lion" was a twenty-oared barge, of a beautiful model, built also for the use of the king. This magnificent boat is sixty-four feet long, splendidly painted in blue and gold. On the prow, which projects considerably beyond the cut-water, is the figure of Neptune, with his trident, sitting in a splendid car, drawn by four tritons, exceedingly well carved, and richly gilt; the whole of the carved work on this barge, and the steamboat, is indeed far superior to any of those gaudy logger-heads, which we sometimes see stuck under the bowsprit of our ships of war.

The builders of our dock-yards in fact admit that the art of carving wood in ship building has of late years been lost. With the Dutch it is kept as a separate branch, and in each of their yards is a carver's shop.

We next visited some of their storerooms, which in this yard are not extensive, but they were nearly empty. The timber was scanty, and mostly fashioned, in which state, we were told, it is brought into the yard.

A seventy-four gun ship, not further advanced than her keel, had just been laid down, and her floor-timbers were all ready, but we did not observe any of the other timbers for her frame. The roof under which she was to be built very much resembled those in our dock-yards; but we saw nothing of those galleries within it, which have been commended as an improvement on our own.

Under a second roof was a fifty-gun frigate building, and under a third, one of the same class repairing. The new frigate had a round stern, similar to those which Sir Robert Seppings was accused of having pilfered from the Dutch, but which, though perhaps superior for all naval purposes, he has reconverted almost to square ones, reserving, however, the principle of upright timbers, which by giving strength constitutes its greatest merit. The Dutch frigate's stern was certainly round with projection in the centre, like one of those sentry boxes sometimes seen in the angle of a bastion, and which serves in the ship as the substitute for a quarter gallery.

The opening between the timbers of this frigate were filled in, so as to make the hull one solid mass, and the builder took care to observe, as if it was something new, that if a plank should start, there would be no danger of the ship sinking. We did not go into the hold, but our conductor said that she was strengthened with diagonal braces, and that all her bolts below the water line were of copper. They also made use of straight timbers, and the futtocks of the ribs had square heads and heels fastened by cogues. In short it appeared to us that the whole of Sepping's inventions had been adopted in the dock-yard of Rotterdam; and so satisfied were they of the utility of roofs, that all the small craft even were building under cover.

The timber, made use of in the dock-yard of this place, is brought by water from various parts of the Netherlands, and is squared, and mostly fashioned in the forests, but being used without a proper degree of seasoning, the ships are not of long duration. This was particularly the case with those built under Bonaparte's reign, at Antwerp, one half of them being rotten without ever going to sea, and nearly useless at the end of five or six years. In fact all the German timber is light and porous, in comparison with our best Suffolk oak, and liable to that speedy species of decay which has been called, improperly enough, the dry-rot.

One would be led to conclude, that the Dutch must experience a considerable degree of inconvenience from the want of dry docks, though they seem not to feel it. In our dock-yards, they are so common, that the bottom of a gun-brig or a cutter cannot be looked at, without their assistance. When the Dutch have occasion to examine the bottoms of their largest ships, the operation of heaving them down, while afloat, is resorted to, by means of careening pits, in which the necessary blocks and purchases for the purpose are placed. It is, however, but an awkward process, when performed on large ships of war, and not without considerable danger, but it is resorted to in preference to the certainty of incurring a large expenditure for the construction of a dry dock, especially in a country where the foundations are bad, and no materials to be had except what must be imported from other countries at a great expense.

CHAPTER III.

FROM ROTTERDAM TO AMSTERDAM.

There are two methods of making the journey from Rotterdam to Amsterdam, as there are, indeed, between almost every two towns throughout Holland,—by land and by water. The latter is the most common, and most easy and convenient, as well as by much the cheapest, but is somewhat slower than posting; the treckschuit going barely at the rate of four miles an hour, while post horses, or others hired for the journey, will make good a little more than five miles an hour. The distance in either way, in the present case, is nearly the same, as the straight line of road generally accompanies, in a parallel direction, the straight canal, and in most parts of it has a straight row of trees on each side; every thing in Holland, where it can conveniently be done, being laid out with a line. The trifling difference, however, in point of speed is not the only objection which a stranger, desirous of seeing the country, will make to the water conveyance. The banks of the canal are sometimes so high that the view is intercepted by them, and confined to the line of the canal. We, therefore, hired a four wheeled carriage, known in Holland by the name of char-a-banc, which, with its three cross seats, we found to be sufficiently roomy to hold, without inconvenience, six persons and their luggage, besides a servant on the dickey. In this vehicle the owner agreed to carry us to Amsterdam in two days; and for the hire of this, with two horses, the owner feeding them, and paying the driver, we were charged forty-eight guilders or florins (four pounds sterling); the distance being about fifty miles, or a little more.

On the 11th of August, about noon, we left Rotterdam. The road, as we afterwards found to be common throughout Holland, was paved with a particular kind of brick, called a clinker, set closely on edge, very neatly fitted together, and as level as a bowling green.

After running for some distance along the side of the canal, the road branched off, and here commenced a continued succession of neat, and sometimes very handsome villas on both sides, and at no great distance from it. Here and there an elegant chateau occurred, surrounded by an extensive domain well planted with patches of trees, but generally in straight lines; and for the most part the mansion was approached through a grand avenue. The boundaries also of these large estates are frequently terminated by avenues of trees, each row belonging to separate proprietors; but the division of property is mostly marked by a dyke and a ditch. Most of these country houses, whether large or small, have a ditch of stagnant water dividing the little front garden from the road; and close to this ditch, generally indeed rising out of it, and not unfrequently bestriding it, is sure to be found a small building, square or octagonal, called a lust-huis, or pleasure house, with a window in each side, commanding a complete view of the road. These little buildings or pleasure houses are so very numerous as to form a characteristic feature of this part of the country. They occur, indeed, as we afterwards found, by the sides of the roads throughout South Holland. In the summer and autumn evenings they are the common resort of families, where the men enjoy their pipes with beer or wine, and the females sip their tea; and both derive amusement in observing and conversing with the passengers on the road. In any other country, these would be considered as just the seasons of the year, and the time of the day, when these ditch-bestriding pleasure houses would be shunned, the effluvia from the stagnant water being then strongest, and the frogs, which are every where seen skipping about, most lively and noisy. But the same vitiated taste, which has selected the ditch for the site of the pleasure house, may deem the croaking of the frog, when in full song, just as melodious to their ears, as the note of the nightingale is to their more southern neighbours.

As there is no want of water in any part of Holland, the flower-gardens attached to these villas have generally a fish-pond in some part of them, and when they happen to face the road, the pleasure-house is frequently placed on a hillock in the middle of the garden, and is accessible only by a bridge or a flight of steps. Each villa has its name, or some motto inscribed over the gateway, the choice of which is generally meant to bespeak content and comfort on the part of the owner, and they afford a source of amusement to the stranger as he passes along. Thus, among others, we read, "Lust en rust," Pleasure and ease; "Wel te vrede," Well contented; "Myn genegeendheid is voldoen," My desire is satisfied; "Myn lust en leven," My pleasure and life; "Niet zoo gualyck," Not so bad; "Gerustelyk en wel te vrede," Tranquil and content; "Vriendschap en gezelschap," Friendship and sociability; "Het vermaak is in 't hovenieren," There is pleasure in gardening. And over the entrance to one of the tea-gardens, near Rotterdam, was inscribed, "Het vleesch potten van Egypte." Some of the larger gardens abound with fruits and vegetables, and beds and borders of flowering shrubs and plants are laid out in all the grotesque shapes that can be imagined. It must be confessed, however, that an air of comfort presides over these villas. Most of the dwelling-houses are gaily painted in lively colours, all the offices and outhouses are kept in neat order, while the verdant meadows are covered with the finest cattle, mostly speckled brown and white.

At the distance of about eight miles from Rotterdam is the ancient town of Delft, once famous for its woollen manufactures, and more especially its pottery ware, which employed many thousands of its inhabitants, and which was known under the name of Delft-ware all over Europe; but the superior and cheaper article, manufactured by Wedgwood, gave a death-blow to the potteries of Delft, which can scarcely now be said to exist. The traveller will observe, in passing through this town, a fine old Gothic church, and also one of a more recent date, with a lofty spire; but as they were said to contain only monuments of the family of the house of Orange, of Grotius and Van Tromp, and that there was little worth seeing in the town, we did not stop; but in passing through a spacious market-place, we could observe a copious supply of fine vegetables and the common fruits of the country. The streets and houses appeared to be kept in neat and clean order, but the town were a dull aspect, the more so, perhaps, after just leaving the bustle of Rotterdam. The whole country around Delft, with the exception of some contiguous gardens and potato beds, consisted of rich pasturage, and a great number of very fine cattle were grazing in the meadows. No appearance of tillage, except small patches of stubble here and there, and a few enclosures of clover.

The same kind of villas, parks, and gardens, as those we had passed continued from Delft to the Hague, which is not above five or six miles. Two or three villas occur on the road, one of which is Ryswyck, of no other note than being the place where a treaty of peace was concluded in 1657.

THE HAGUE.

The Hague is a well-built, handsome, and clean town, said to contain thirty-five thousand inhabitants. In passing through the streets there is neither crowd nor bustle; but one sees an evident appearance of fashion among the inhabitants, which is not to be observed in the commercial and manufacturing towns of Holland. This, indeed, was the case even under the old regime, when the Stadtholder used to pass many months of the year at the Hague; and it has become a still more fashionable residence since the Restoration, and the conversion of the republic into a monarchy, the presence of the royal family always drawing after it a multitude of employés, foreign and domestic.

It is now the residence, in alternate years, of the king of the Netherlands; and the States-general hold their meetings during that residence in the halls appended to the old palace, near the Vyverberg, or Fish-pond hill, at the upper or northern end of the town, which, of course, is the fashionable quarter. Here, too, is the Hotel de Ville, or Town-hall. In this neighbourhood the houses are generally elegant, and the adjoining country as beautiful as a flat and even country can be made. Close to this quarter is the deer park, a small meadow, with a wood behind it. Through this wood is the public road which leads to Leyden, and passes close to the "House in the Wood," which belonged to the princess Amelia de Solms, and is now the occasional residence of the king of the Netherlands, or some part of his family. It is a neat pavilion, but not deserving the name of a palace. It once contained some good pictures; but little is now left within it worthy of attention except the ceiling of the saloon, part of which was painted by Rubens.

It is pretended that in this wood are oak trees of five hundred years' growth; but we saw none that, in England, would not attain the size of the largest at most in one hundred and twenty years. Some of these, however, and the beeches and lindens, are of a respectable size and healthy foliage. Our time would not permit us to visit the public library nor the museum, which we regretted the less, having understood that the best pictures had been removed to Amsterdam, and that those that remained were mostly the work of Dutch artists, and by no means of the first class; but the celebrated "Ox" of Potter still remains at the Hague. We therefore pushed on for Leyden, the distance being about eight miles.

Beyond the Hague the estates of the nobility and gentry are on a larger scale than any we had yet met with; and of course the smaller villas and the lust-houses were less frequent. Many parts of the road reminded us of England, the grounds being broken by copse-wood, in which, when cut down, the young standard trees were left growing; and there was in places some little inequality of surface—something that might be said to approach the size of a hill. The mansions generally stood at the head of one of the long avenues which run through the domains; and those avenues which led to no house, from their length and level surface, were interminable to the eye.

LEYDEN.

Leyden is a very fine town, situated on that branch of the Rhine, which alone carries with it its name to the sea, and which surrounds the town, supplying its numerous canals with water. The Rhinland through which it flows is esteemed the garden of Holland. There is no doubt the Romans having had a station on the spot where Leyden stands; as several Roman antiquities have been found, and the remains of an old castle still exist on a mound in the middle of the town, supposed to be of Roman structure, though the prevailing opinion seems to be that this burg, as it is called, was built by Hengist, after his return from his conquest in Britain.

Leyden made a glorious stand in opposing the Spaniards under Baldis, when he laid siege to it in 1574, on which occasion six thousand of its inhabitants are said to have perished by famine, disease, and the sword. The devotion of the citizens, on the above occasion, procured from Prince William of Holland, who relieved the place, the highest praise, and, what was of more importance, funds for the establishment of an university, which is deservedly esteemed among the best disciplined and the best regulated school for the classics, law, medicine, and divinity, on the whole continent.

They were just now employed in adding considerably to the buildings of the University, the number of students, which generally amounted to about three hundred, having increased to five hundred within the last three years. Attached to the University is a museum of natural history and comparative anatomy, beautifully and scientifically arranged, and a library of fifty thousand volumes. To the museum has recently been added the splendid collection of birds belonging to Mr. Temmink of Amsterdam, the produce chiefly of Java and the other oriental possessions of the Dutch; and Professor Lesson is probably the first ornithologist in Europe.

The botanical garden does credit to all who belong to it, being kept in the highest possible order. The walks are beautiful, and without a pebble: they are covered with a mixture of peat earth and the spent dust of tanners' oak bark. The garden is tastefully laid out in clumps of shrubbery in various forms, round which, on borders, are the various plants, named and numbered according to the system of Jussieu. The whole extent is seven acres, four of which have been added only a few years ago, and laid out in good taste by the late Professor Brugman as a garden for the reception of medicinal plants, and for the use of the medical students. Among the hot-house plants we saw a date palm with fruit upon it, which the gardener said had been there two hundred years.

It may be questioned whether the botanical garden of Leyden and the museum are not superior to the Jardin des Plantes and its museum in Paris. Taken altogether, we were of opinion that they had a decided preference, though they wanted the attraction of living animals, of the influence of which we have had experience in the multitudes that flock to the zoological gardens of London.

Near the University a large open space, planted with trees, serves as a promenade for the inhabitants. It seems that this place was once covered with good houses, which were destroyed in 1607 by the explosion of a vessel laden with gunpowder, when more than one hundred and fifty persons, and, among others, the two professors, Luzac and Kluit, perished under their ruins. No stronger proof is wanting of the decay of the trade and manufactures of Leyden than that of converting the ground, where some of the best houses stood when the accident happened, and which is the most agreeable part of the town, into a mere promenade, instead of replacing them by others. In all our walks we did not observe a single new house building; and, in fact, we were given to understand that the population had decreased a full fourth part of what it was in the days of its prosperity.

It is a common observation that the High street of Oxford may be reckoned among the finest in Europe; but striking as it is, those who hold this opinion can know very little of Europe. Without going farther, we may observe that the Breede street or Broad street of Leyden, though far from being one of the finest in Europe, is superior, in some respects, to that of Oxford. In the first place, it is much wider, and at least three times the length; and, contrary to the usual practice of laying out streets by the Dutch, it has the same gently-winding turn, but wants the gradual ascent, which contributes so much to the beauty of the High street of Oxford. The houses in that of Leyden are generally superior and more picturesque; and though the number of colleges of ancient architecture, with their turrets, towers, and spires, in Oxford, exceed the number of public buildings in the Broad street of Leyden, there is one at least that will bear comparison with the most picturesque college in High street. This is the old Hotel de Ville, built, as appears by an inscription in front, in the year 1571. It has a tall spire, somewhat remarkable in architecture, and not inelegant. It is built with a dark blue stone, which has the appearance of black marble, and its prominent parts are tipped with gilding. The body of the building has nearly thirty windows on a line in front, three pedimented, or gables highly ornamented, a handsome balustrade, surmounted by a ridge of stone globes, and the whole front of this remarkable piece of architecture may be said to be "With glist'ning spires and pinnacles adorned."

The ground-floor of this town-house is appropriated as a market for butchers'-meat, but no appearance of it is visible from the street. This is also the case, as we afterwards found, under the old Hotel de Ville at Bruges. Nothing can exceed the cleanliness of Leyden in all its streets, whether those with or those without canals. The former, with their quays, are particularly neat; and as there is little trade, and, of course, few shipping that carry masts, the bridges are mostly of stone, of which they pretend to say there are not fewer than one hundred and fifty.

We paid a visit to the ancient church of St. Peter, which was built in 1321. It is not only the largest in the town, but by far the best specimen in the style of Gothic architecture, perhaps, in all Holland; and the inhabitants persuade themselves it is also the first in point of decorations and magnificence. As in all the reformed churches, so in this, the Iconoclasts have left nothing of ornamental sculpture remaining that formerly belonged to it, and have substituted only a few monuments in its place. One of these, erected to the memory of the celebrated Boerhaave, is carefully pointed out to strangers. It is an urn, supported on a pedestal of black marble, having on the front a medallion bearing the bust of the deceased with this inscription:—

"Simplex sigillum veri."

And below it is the following:—

"Salutifero Boerhavii genio sacrum."

There are several other monuments of distinguished professors of the University, but none that are calculated to attract much attention. The choir, as usual, is screened off by a railing of bronze, and stripped of all its former Romanist decorations.

The environs of Leyden are extremely beautiful, and the whole country around is studded with villas, gardens, and pleasure-houses, standing, as usual, over ditches or in the middle of ponds. The most frequented, and, indeed, the most delightful promenade, shaded by a double row of trees, is without the walls, and close by the side of that branch of the Rhine which waters and surrounds the town. This gently-moving stream—so gentle that its current is scarcely perceptible—may here be about from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet in width; and the bank opposite to the walk, and between the river and the wall, partakes in some places of the picturesque, being high and well clothed with shrubby plants, and briars and tangling creepers. It would, perhaps, be difficult to point out in any part of the world a more enchanting walk on a fine summer's evening than that which borders the Rhine where it skirts the walls of Leyden.

A very mistaken notion seems to have been entertained that the insignificance of the Rhine, in this part of its course, is owing to its waters being lost in the sands. Nothing can be more incorrect than such an idea. That this Leyden branch is of comparative insignificance is very true; but instead of being absorbed, the waters of this noble river, on the contrary, pursue their course in full vigour, and with increased volume into the sea.

The province of Holland in general, however, and the district of Rhineland in particular, are most deeply concerned in the smallest or Leyden branch, as by the proper management of this stream only is that part of the country preserved from one sweeping inundation. The main works for this purpose are at Katwyk, where, by very simple but effectual contrivances of flood-gates, the waters of the Rhine are let out into the sea, and those of the sea shut out from the land. The distance from Leyden is about ten miles, through five of which nearest to the sea, a broad and deep canal has been cut, across which a triple set of double gates have been thrown, the first having two pair, the second four pair, and the last seven pair, with stone piers of excellent masonry between them. Against these last gates the tide rises twelve feet, and to take off the pressure, an equal depth is preserved in the great dam within them. When the Rhine has accumulated behind the other gates to a certain height, the whole of the gates are thrown open at low water, the rush of which completely scour the passage of sand, which, before the adoption of these gates, used constantly to choke up the channel of the Rhine; and the waters, thus impeded, frequently inundated the country, and had more than once threatened Leyden with destruction. It has been calculated that these seven gates, when thrown open, are capable of discharging a volume of water not less than one hundred thousand cubic feet in a second of time.

Still, however, we were given to understand that the commissioners for the management of the Rhineland waters are not without their apprehensions of the inefficacy of these sluices, on the breaking up of a long frost, or the continuance of heavy rains; and it was rumoured, that an engineer was expected from England to examine and report his opinion whether any thing more, and what, could be done for the better security of the country.

On the 12th of August, about ten in the morning, we continued our journey towards Haarlem, on a road which for its goodness, smooth and beautiful as they are in any part of Holland, is not exceeded in the whole of this country. In travelling along it, the passenger is gratified by witnessing a constant succession of gentlemen's seats, the grounds of many of them laid out in exceeding good taste, and all of them kept in neat order; and this continues for sixteen miles. On approaching Haarlem within a few miles, the meer or lake of that name, which is, in fact, a little sea, is seen to the eastward, between some of the sand hills which its waves have thrown up. By the inequalities of the surface which extend to the side of the road, and the mixture of sand and gravel of which they are composed, it would appear that this sea must at one time have been of much greater extent than at present. Most of these eminences or hills, if we may so call them, are generally planted with firs and other northern trees; the parks or domains over which they are scattered are surrounded with our ordinary park paling; cottages here and there are seen by the roadside with their little cabbage and potato gardens; hawthorn hedges are not unrequited; and, in short, these and some other indications of the approach to Haarlem, were so many appearances of what we every day see in England, that, without any great stretch of the imagination, one might suppose one's self to be travelling in some corner of the British isles.

Immediately before the entrance into the town of Haarlem is a wood of considerable extent, in which is an excellent house, that once belonged to Mr. Hope of Amsterdam. It was purchased by Bonaparte, as a residence for his brother Louis, for five hundred thousand guilders; about forty-two thousand pounds sterling.

We did not remain long in Haarlem. It appeared to us very much like the other towns in Holland, very well built, very clean, and very dull. Its population was said to be greatly diminished, and its once flourishing manufactures of silks, velvets, and damasks, for which it was famed, have now nearly disappeared, and that little remained but the weaving of linen and woollen clothes and of lace. In fact, it was stated that the population, which was once reckoned to be forty-eight thousand, was reduced to about seventeen thousand. It still, however, has its Academy of Sciences, and the Teylerian Society, founded by an individual from whose name it is derived. It has a library, with a collection of philosophical instruments, and of subjects of natural history; and lectures are delivered in all the different departments of science.

The river Spaarn, issuing from the Haarlem Meer, traverses the city, and having supplied its canals, passes on and joins the lake or creek of the Zuyder Zee, on the southern shore of which the city of Amsterdam is built. The name of this narrow prolongation of the Zuyder Zee is written on the Dutch Maps Hel Y; a name that has somewhat puzzled strangers, particularly if you ask a Dutchman what it is called, as he is sure to say it is Tui. The fact is, the letter y in Dutch is pronounced the same as the i in English, or ai; and by abbreviating the definite article het, the, it becomes in common parlance 't ai. This will explain how our map makers have written it, some Tui, some Tye, and others, still worse, the Ye, on their maps. A Frenchman in describing Amsterdam, calls it the E-gree. Any enquiry as to the origin or meaning of the name was useless. In fact, the letter y in their alphabet has no particular meaning; but as its pronunciation is precisely that of ai, and as this syllable, or something like it, signifies water in many of the northern languages, and in North Holland there are other rivers or waters named Ju and the Eu (Ea), it is not, perhaps, an overstrained etymology to suppose that "the ai" is nothing more than "the water." The Eu or the Ea is the provincial name of the water which flows out of Windermere and Coniston lakes down the Cartmel sands.

There is little more to be seen at Haarlem than the church of St. Bavo, in which is the celebrated organ whose size and tones, and number of pipes, have been supposed to be without a parallel in this class of instruments; but as we had seen and heard that of St. Lawrence at Rotterdam, we did not deem it worth the loss of time that would have been occasioned by waiting for the organist and bellows-blowers, to give us a peal. We should, however, have been tempted to delay awhile, had the season of the year been that in which the tulip, the hyacinths, and the jonquils are in blossom, for which the adjoining gardens are celebrated, and with which they annually supply our florists in England. The art of raising these bulbous-rooted plants so as to produce their flowers in perfection, simple as it may appear to be, is not yet domesticated with us; we have still our fresh importations annually from Holland. The gaudy tulip was an object which at one time drove the grave, the prudent, and the cautious Dutchman, as wild as ever did the South Sea bubble, or the senseless speculations that took possession of our countrymen a few years ago, the gullible John Bull. The enormous prices that were actually given for real tulip bulbs, of particular kinds, formed but a small fraction of the extent to which the mercantile transactions of this gaudy flower was carried. If we may give credit to Beckman, who states it on Dutch authorities, four hundred perits in weight (something less than a grain), of the bulb of a tulip named Admiral Leiffen, cost four thousand four hundred florins; and two hundred of another, named Senper Augustus, two thousand florins. Of this last, he tells us, it once happened there were only two roots to be had, for one at Amsterdam, the other at Haarlem; and that for one of these were offered four thousand six hundred florins, a new carriage, two grey horses, and a complete set of harness; and that another person offered twelve acres of land. It is almost impossible to give credence to such madness. The real truth of the story is, that these tulip roots were never bought or sold, but they became the medium of a systematised species of gambling. The bulbs, and their divisions into perits, became like the different stocks in our public funds,—the objects of the bulls and bears,—and were bought and sold at different prices from day to day, the parties settling their account at fixed periods; the innocent tulips, all the while, never once appearing in the transactions, nor even thought of. "Before the tulip season was over," says Beckman, "more roots were sold and purchased, bespoken and promised to be delivered, than in all probability were to be found in the gardens of Holland; and when Senper Augustus was not to be had any where, which happened twice, no species, perhaps, was often purchased and sold." This kind of sleek gambling reached at length to such a height, that the government found it necessary to interfere and put a stop to it.

On the great market-place of Haarlem is a statue of Lawrence Koster, who is supposed to have been the inventor of printing. He holds forth triumphantly, as it were, in his hands, the letter A as a type of his claim to the invention. It faces the house in which he lived, and in the front of which is the following inscription:—

"Memoria sacrum
Typographia, ars omnium conservatrix, hic primum inventa, circa annum 1440."

It is asserted that the first book that was printed is Le Miroir de Notre Seigneur, which is preserved with great care in the Hotel de Ville, and another copy of which is said to be preserved in the public library of Hoorn. The prevailing opinion, however, is, that Faust was the inventor, who, with Gutenberg, printed the first book in Mayence. In opposition to this, it is maintained by the people of Haarlem that Faust was a servant of Koster, who stole his types, and fled with them to Mayence. If the assertion be true that Faust was, about the time when the invention is said to have taken place, the servant of Koster, one of two things is pretty clear,—either that Faust did carry off his master's invention, or that Koster received the first intimation of the art from Faust while in his service. So recently as 1822, a commission, composed of several learned professors, investigated these claims, and reported that it appeared from historical documents, that Koster's invention dates somewhere between 1420 and 1425. Haarlem is still famous for casting types, particularly those of Greek and Hebrew; for printing the latter language, the Jews mostly derive their types from this city.

From Haarlem to Amsterdam the face of the country has wholly changed its character. The road takes now an easterly direction, and nothing meets the eye but one continued meadow, intersected by ditches to drain off the water, without a tree, or almost a bush in any direction, and terminated, after a few miles travelling, by the Haarlem Meer on the south, and the lake or great water Ai, on the north. A fine broad paved causeway, of ten miles in length, conducts the traveller from Haarlem to Amsterdam; for five miles it is laid out in a mathematical straight line, and is bordered by a noble canal parallel to it. The other side of the road is bordered by a ditch and a row of willows. These willows, and the causeway and the canal, are so perfectly straight and parallel, that the eye placed at one end of the five miles, would see the other end, were it not hid, den, as it were, below the surface, by the natural convexity of the earth.

At the end of the first five miles, the waters of the Haarlem Meer and the Ai communicate beneath a narrow artificial isthmus, having a gentle swell resembling that of a bridge; over this the causeway is continued. At this spot the relative heights of the two waters of the Ai and the Meer are nicely regulated, by means of sluices and gauge-posts, marked into very nice and minute divisions; and the greatest attention is paid to the state of the waters at this particular spot, the safety of Amsterdam and the adjacent country from inundations depending much on the management of these two inland seas. The Dutch are said to have a plan for draining Haarlem Meer, and thereby gaining about sixty thousand acres of land; the success must depend on its depth, but a few hundred pumps worked by windmills would easily and speedily empty its water (if moderately shallow) into the Ai.

Close to the narrow isthmus, that divides them, is a neat inn, where carriages and horses are to be had; and where also is an ancient ebatan, named Swannenburgh, in front of which, and on the pillars of the gate, are sculptured several figures of swans. Having crossed the narrow neck, the canal and the road recommence with an angle, inclining more to an easterly direction, and continue for another five miles, close up to the gate of Amsterdam. The canal is supplied by the Ai, through several inlets. In fact it forms in many places a part of the Ai, and is only separated from it, and the navigation protected, by rows of strong posts, called a boom, which, by breaking the waves, preserve the opposite bank of the canal or the causeway, which would otherwise be constantly exposed to the danger of being washed away.

A steady and undeviating perseverance in uniformity, order, and regularity, is discernible in all the public works of the Dutch. An instance of it struck us forcibly in proceeding along this causeway. By the side of the canal is a narrow tracking path for the horses which draw the treckschyns and other craft. To prevent them from encroaching on the carriage road, a series of hard blue stone posts, about three feet high, all of the same form and dimensions, are firmly fixed in the ground at equal intervals of twenty yards, making the total number about eight hundred and eighty. These stones must all have been brought either from the banks of the Rhine or the Meuse, probably of the latter, for nothing of the kind is to be found in all Holland.

On arriving at Amsterdam, we put up at a very excellent hotel, on one of the Burghwals, called the Waapeen van Amsterdam, which and the Doelen are the best in this city.

CHAPTER IV.

AMSTERDAM.

Neither the approach to Amsterdam, nor the entrance into it through the Haarlem gate, holds out to the stranger any promise that he is about to be gratified with the sight of a large and beautiful city. The environs on this side, far from wearing a tempting appearance, very much resemble that low tract of marshy land, which stretches along the banks of the Thames between Greenwich and Woolwich; an extensive flat of dark green meadow, intersected with dykes and ditches; but somewhat enlivened by the constant whirling motion of some two or three hundred windmills, some grinding corn and seeds, but most of them employed in pumping water from one ditch into another, till finally it is disposed of in the sea.

On entering the city, the first object that catches the eye of the stranger is a row of tall houses, built without any regularity of design, along a quay facing the Zuyder Zee; some leaning one way and some another, and all out of the perpendicular, threatening momentarily to fall. We looked in vain for trees, which we had expected to find like those on the Boompjes of Rotterdam. The first turning to the right, however, from this quay, afforded a more favourable prospect; but still this capital of Holland had a sort of Wapping or Thames street appearance, and looked inferior in every respect to Rotterdam. A better acquaintance satisfied us of the error which the first impression had created.

Amsterdam is situated on the south bank of the creek or lake Ai of which we have spoken, just where the river Amstel, after pervading the city, falls into it from the south. This extraordinary city—beyond all doubt the most extraordinary that Europe affords, not even Venice excepted, as to its situation, its rise, and rapid progress to the state in which it now is—dates back its origin to some part of the thirteenth century, it being then a mere assemblage of fishermen's huts, perched on the drier and more elevated patches of a swamp, but not high enough to secure them completely from being occasionally submerged by the sea. But the superabundant products which these poor industrious people were able to derive from the seas and the waters by which they were surrounded, met with a ready market from their northern and southern neighbours. The result was naturally a rapidly increasing intercourse between the Batavians, the Belgians, and the northern natives on the Baltic, with whom they exchanged their dried and salted fish for various kinds of grain and clothing; and this commerce brought the merchants of these countries to their shores, some of whom found it to their advantage to reside occasionally among them, others to form connections, and domiciliate themselves entirely, in spite of their bogs and swamps; to build store and dwelling houses, and to adopt means for the protection of themselves and their property against the encroachments of the Ai, rendered more formidable by the storms that swelled the Zuyder Zee.

Amsterdam is in form of a crescent, its inward curving line and two horns stretching along the Ai, the length, by the plan, being about thirteen thousand five hundred Rhinecland feet, and perpendicular from the centre of this line, seven thousand five hundred feet, or as nine to five: the circumference on the land side twenty-five thousand five hundred Rhinecland feet, surrounded by a wall of regular bastions, and a wet ditch, bordered by a row of trees.

It is supposed that the first foundation of the city was laid along the borders of the Amstel, which is now the centre. All this part, down to the Ai, is irregularly built, and is surrounded by the Amstel and its branches, the Roken and the Damrak. The streets and canals in this quarter are named the Burghwals; and this part of the city still retains the name of the "Oude Zyde." Perhaps the earliest building of a public nature is the old Waag, or Weighing-house. The more recent, regular, and well-built streets follow a direction round this cluster, and are parallel to each other, and each of them a crescent, continued from one angle of the city to the other.

It could only have been when the city had attained a high degree of prosperity that these magnificent streets were laid out and built. Their names are the Heeren Gracht, the Keyser's Gracht, and the Prinsen Gracht; three streets that are not easily to be matched in any other town or city of Europe for their length, width, and the grandeur and elegance of their buildings. They are parallel, as we have said, to each other; but take the general shape of the town, which is that of a polygonal crescent, having all the lines perfectly straight between the angular points. These streets are each about two miles in length, two hundred and twenty feet in width, bounded by large and elegant dwelling houses, with a canal down the middle, crossed by numerous stone bridges, and bordered by rows of large trees of oak, elm, and linden, on each side, not inferior to those of the Boompjes of Rotterdam.

The numerous canals of Amsterdam, it is said, divide the city into ninety different islands, communicating by two hundred and eighty bridges, either of stone or of wood, the latter being drawbridges, and many of the former having sluices to open in the centre for the passage of boats, and others for the purpose of regulating the level of the water in the canals. These sluices are so placed and so well attended to, that little danger or damage is now apprehended from high tides and storms on the Zuyder Zee, which, in former times, was but too frequently experienced.

The mixture of the muddy water of the Amstel with the seawater from the Ai, the filth from the sewers, from the houses, and the streets, and the offal from the multitude of vessels that are moored in the canals, most of them inhabited by whole families, must necessarily have the effect of creating a smell not disagreeable, and sometimes highly offensive. Nor is the unpleasant sensation at all diminished by casting a glance at the colour which the surface of the water invariably bears, being that of a rich olivaceous green. The smell, however, except in the lower and more busy parts of the city, is scarcely perceptible, unless, indeed, as the old proverb insinuates, the water be stirred up, which must happen whenever one of the vessels moves her berth along the canal. It is then gare leau; and the street passenger, if he be to leeward, will do well to cross the first bridge he meets with, and get to windward as fast as he possibly can. This peculiar effluvia has been supposed by some to be injurious to the human constitution, and yet few cities can boast of a more robust and healthy set of inhabitants than those are of Amsterdam. It is said to be a fact, however, that no cavalry regiment is ever kept at Amsterdam, as the horses all become ill, and many have died, from the badness, as is supposed, of the water. The town is served with fresh water from the river Vecht, five or six miles distant, and carried round in carts: most of the houses, however, have cisterns to receive the rain water. It is not impossible, that if the water of the canals was not occasionally driven out into the Ai, by the admission of the pure fresh water of the Amstel, the air might become infected, and serious sickness ensue. Be that as it may, it does not appear that Amsterdam is more unhealthy than other towns of Holland, or subject to any particular endemic diseases. A humid atmosphere produces here, as it every where else does, fevers and coughs; but against the effects of such a chilling air the natives take care to supply themselves with thick and warm clothing; in addition to which the women, who lead a very sedentary life, place the feet on a little wooden stool under their petticoats, in which is a small pan of burning charcoal; and the men, in order to fortify themselves against the baneful effects of such an atmosphere, are said to drink plenty of gin, and smoke tobacco. This may be so; but it is fair to mention, that we never saw a Dutchman drunk in the streets, not even among the lower classes. Indeed so strict is the police of Amsterdam, that a beastly drunkard would not be tolerated in public.

Whoever is desirous of seeing human ingenuity and human industry most successfully and most extensively exerted for the purpose of counteracting the injurious effect of one of the most powerful and destructive elements, and by means the most simple, must visit Holland, and more particularly Amsterdam. He will there see and admire the simple and effectual means that have been adopted for the security of the town, by bringing the waters under complete control.

The whole extent of the sea front, with the quays and the shipping, is protected from injury by a double stockade of strong, square, wooden posts, known by the name of boom; or barriers, extending at a distance from the quay along the whole line of the city, from the northwest to the southeast corner, a distance of two miles and a half. These large beams of wood are firmly fixed in pairs, with openings between each tier, at certain distances, to allow ships to pass them to and from the quays. Of these openings or passages there are twenty-one, all of which are closed by night; so that nothing can arrive at, or depart from, the quay till they are set open. By means of these barriers, the injurious effects of the waves on the wharf wall, by being divided and dispersed, as well as of masses of ice driven down from the northward, are completely obviated.

All the quays, and, indeed, every house in Amsterdam, are built upon piles; and as each of these is a large tree or baulk of timber, of forty or fifty feet in length, some idea may be formed of the expense of building in Amsterdam, as well as of the immense quantity of timber that must have been brought thither for this purpose alone. It is recorded that the number of piles on which the old Town House, now the Royal Palace, is built, amounts to upwards of thirteen thousand.

Indeed the industry of the Dutch is not to be surpassed; and it is exercised, not only with great skill and ingenuity, but also with indefatigable perseverance; otherwise they never could have succeeded in accomplishing such great undertakings with such small means.

On no occasion, perhaps, is this ingenuity and perseverance more displayed than in the means employed in conquering the waters of the ocean, and in bringing under subjection the rivers, lakes, and canals with which they are surrounded on every side, by means of sluices, drains, ditches, and windmills, of the last of which, for this and other purposes, such as sawing wood, grinding corn, and crushing seeds for oil, the number in the vicinity of all their towns and cities is perfectly astonishing.

These windmills are remarkable objects on the Boulevards of Amsterdam. There are no less than thirty bastions in the line of fortification on the land side, and on each bastion is a windmill, of a description larger than common, for grinding corn, and other purposes. It is whimsical enough that, surrounded as they are with water on every side, there is not a watermill in the whole country. It suited their purpose better to raise a contention between the elements, by employing the wind to drive out the water. Necessity, indeed, taught the Hollander this; for if it were not for the complete subjection in which the waters are held by this and other means, the city of Amsterdam might, at any one moment, be altogether submerged. The idea of such a calamity, happening to a city which is stated to contain near two hundred thousand inhabitants, calls for every precaution that can be put in practice to avert it.

Of this number of inhabitants, consisting chiefly of Calvinists, Catholics, Lutherans, and Jews, by far the greater part are engaged in some kind of commerce or other—few of them in manufactures, except such as are in every-day use, and for home consumption. Many of the artisans and the poorer classes inhabit the cellars under the houses of the more opulent, and a great many reside constantly on the water, in comfortable apartments built on the upper decks of their trading vessels, more particularly those employed in the inland navigations.

In this and in many other respects the Dutch bear a strong resemblance to the Chinese; like this industrious and economical race, they keep their hogs, their ducks, and other domestic animals constantly on board. Their apartments are kept in a state of great neatness; the women employ themselves in all the domestic offices, and are assiduous in embellishing their little sitting-rooms with the labours of the needle, and many of them have little gardens of tulips, hyacinths, clematis, and various other flowers. Some of these vessels are of great length, but generally narrow, suitable to the canals and sluices of the towns. Each vessel is generally navigated by the members of one family, of which the female part is by no means the least service, nothing being more common than to see the women steering, poling, hauling the ropes, or employed on some other duties of the craft.

It must be obvious that great quantities of mud will be deposited in these canals, and that a constant expense of labour must be incurred in keeping them clear. This is as much a public concern as the cleaning of our streets is by scavengers. They employ for this purpose a dredging machine, worked by horses, instead of a steam-engine, which we make use of in the Thames and the dock-yards.

One of our first visits was to the dock-yard situated at the southern extremity of the quay, on the island of Kattenburg. It was in the dusk of the evening, and the guard was already set; but the officer on guard very civilly volunteered to wait on the admiral who ordered that he should be immediately admitted.

It has the advantage of a magnificent basin communicating with the Z, at the upper end of which, arranged in a straight line, are five slips for building ships of the line, with a series of roofs over each ship, but united so as to form one continued building. Adjoining these were four other slips, roofed over, for the largest class of frigates; and in other parts of the yard were twelve smaller slips, also roofed, for sloops, schuyts, and other small craft. The larger roofs had each a gallery round them within, just under the pitch of the roof. On enquiring for what purpose these galleries were made, we were told that the only use made of them was to accommodate spectators to view the launch of the ship.

There was but one ship of the line building, the Jupiter, of seventy-four guns. She had a round stern, and was nearly ready; there were also two forty-four gun frigates, and two twenty gun sloops. On observing to our conductor that it appeared they had adopted all our late improvements, both here and at Rotterdam—round sterns, diagonal braces, filling in between the timbers, &c.—he said they could not follow a better example.

There was very little timber in the yard. It is mostly received from the forests of Brabant and Flanders, and is brought to Amsterdam ready squared, and sometimes fashioned, by which a great expense of carriage is saved. What other stores they might have, we could not learn; but the person who went round with us supposed they might be sufficient to enable them to send a ship to sea of each class. It was, in fact, too late to go through the magazine or store house, which is a magnificent building at the entrance of the yard. Its dimensions are two hundred and twenty by two hundred feet; and it is six, if not seven, stories high. An inscription informs us that it was built in the year 1666, and completed ready for use in nine months.

In a line at the upper end of the yard, and close behind the largest of the roofed tiers of slips, is a long range of buildings, kept in very neat order, consisting of the officers' houses, and the different offices and workshops of the several trades, among which we noticed the block-maker's, the joiner's, the carver's, the blacksmith's, the house-carpenter's, and many others, the whole line occupying a space of not less than a quarter of a mile.

The number of men employed was stated to be about one thousand five hundred of all denominations, and that all the labour of the yard was done by hand, and mostly by task and job. There appeared to be no great exertion on the part of those who were at work. We observed twenty-two men employed, two and two, in carrying a plank on their shoulders, and they moved with it just as we see the convicts sauntering along in Portsmouth dock-yard. Some small craft were on the stocks; and a very beautiful yacht, daubed over with gold and blue paint, and carved with no mean workmanship, had just been finished for the use of King William. The only ship of war aloft was a frigate lying in the basin, housed over in the same manner as we see our ships in ordinary.

In fact Amsterdam has always been considered as a very indifferent port, whether for merchantmen or ships of war, on account of the shallowness of water, the shoals, and the difficulty of the navigation of the Zuyder Zee. That difficulty has, however, in some degree been obviated within these few years, by opening a ship canal from the Helder to a point opposite to Amsterdam.

This great port, from which it is said about two thousand sea-going vessels annually clear outwards, had no other communication with the ocean than by the Pampus channel into the Zuyder Zee, by which, added to the dangers of the navigation, outward bound ships had frequently to contend with the prevailing adverse winds from the northward. Then the Pampus channel, which connects the Zuyder Zee with the Ar, is so narrow, and so constantly barred up, that large vessels were unable to pass it at all, without loading or unloading by means of lighters, or being forced in and out on canals. To obviate these inconveniences the government resolved on cutting a ship canal from the Helder to Buysluys, immediately opposite Amsterdam. This canal, which is fifty miles long, one hundred and twenty-five feet wide at the surface, thirty-eight feet at the bottom, and twenty feet deep, was commenced in 1819, and finished in 1825, at the expense, it is said, of about seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. The level of the water is preserved by means of flood-gates at the two extremities, to the level of spring tides; when, at high water, the gates are thrown open to supply any waste that may have been occasioned during the neap tides; but it has other sources from whence it draws a supply of water as it passes through the country. Its course commences at the Diep, close to the Helder, where a pier had for some years past been thrown out into the Zuyder Zee. From hence it runs parallel to the coast, along the sea-dyke, as far as Petten; from thence a little easterly to Alkmaar; thence takes an easterly direction to Purmerend; thence directly south to Buysluys, which is directly opposite to Amsterdam, and just where the Ar, in its passage to the Zuyder Zee, has been contracted by an artificial dyke, to create a current for the purpose of scouring out the channel, and preserving a sufficient depth of water in the port of Amsterdam.

On the published plan of this canal are marked a double set of floodgates at each extremity, and two or three others in the interior, for no other purpose, it would appear, than to retain the water; for as the whole line of country is perfectly level, no locks, of course, were necessary. In the print is represented a forty-six gun frigate, and a large Indianman, of a thousand tons burden, passing through the sluice at the same time, in the year 1820, when the canal was first opened. They are represented as being dragged by six or eight horses, each at a speed not less than three miles an hour. This work must prove of the greatest importance to Amsterdam, and remedy most of its commercial inconveniences, but not that, which is above human skill to remedy, of being shut up for two or three months in the year, and sometimes longer, by ice. The ground, however, is of so loose a texture, that the banks had given way in several places, and it was apprehended that a constant expense would be incurred in their repair.

The public buildings in Amsterdam are, perhaps, less remarkable than in most other cities of the Continent; but it may be doubted if the city itself, as to the style and magnitude of the dwellings, the width of the streets, the broad sheets of water, bordered by the finest trees, has any superior in Europe. A house with eight, ten, or twelve windows on the same floor in front, and with four, five, or even six stories in height, is not uncommon in the three great streets we have spoken of at the upper part of the town. A pair of folding doors usually lead into a court-yard, round which are arranged the different offices, the coach-house, and stables, and very frequently a neat garden behind all; and where this is wanting, there are usually some fine flowering shrubs, mostly the oleander and myrtle, placed in pots or tubs round the court-yard. These splendid houses were mostly built in the days of prosperity, when the De Witts, and De Ruyters, and Van Tromps, so nobly disputed with England the sovereignty of the ocean.

In some part of the front of the very first houses, but generally in the gable or highest story, may be observed a beam of wood projecting a few feet, in which is a block and sheave for hoisting up goods, furniture, or articles of merchandise; for however wealthy a Dutchman may be, or of whatever rank, he has no objection to keep and rick a little; that is to say, to buy and sell. In the days of prosperity, an Oppor Koopman was the highest honorary title that could be given in their Indian possessions. In houses, however, where merchandise was never thought of, this apparatus for hoisting up goods is fitted. It marks a distinctive character in the people. Whatever furniture may be required for an English drawing room or bedroom, it goes in at the door and is carried up stairs, frequently to the detriment of the staircase. Whatever goes into a Dutch house is hoisted up to the highest story and let down to its proper place.

There is one building in Amsterdam which commands the attention of all strangers. This is the old Stadthuis, or Hotel de Ville, which that poor simple man, Louis Bonaparte, when created king of Holland, took possession of in 1808, as his palace, and which King-William still preserves in that character, though he very rarely troubles his good city of Amsterdam, his residence being divided between the Hague and Brussels. The Dutch consider this palace as the eighth wonder of the world. It stands on a large open space, called the Dam, rising with a gentle ascent from the head of the great canal, named the Damrak. It measures in front two hundred and eighty-two feet, in depth two hundred and twenty-two feet, and in height one hundred and sixteen feet, and with the tower and cupola, one hundred and eighty-three feet. On the façade, and ranged along the second story, there are thirty pilasters of the composite order, each thirty-six feet high; a second range of the Corinthian order forms a third story. This second colonnade, of the same height as those below, supports the entablature, out of which rises a pediment, whose base is eighty-two feet, and perpendicular height eighteen feet. A fine piece of marble sculpture ornaments this pediment. The city of Amsterdam is represented under the figure of a female wearing an imperial crown, and holding an olive branch in her hand. On her left is an escutcheon bearing the city arms. She is attended by Neptune armed with his trident, and sitting in his car, drawn by sea unicorns, so they are called, and accompanied by Naiads and Tritons, with their conch shells, as if announcing to the world the removal of this city. On the cornice of this front are three full length figures in bronze, said to be each twelve feet high, representing Peace, Prudence, and Justice. On the back front are also three figures, the centre one representing an Atlas bearing an enormous globe, with Temperance on one side, and Vigilance on the other.

We were disappointed in not seeing the interior, a positive order having been received to admit no one at the time we were there, as the young prince of Holland was daily expected. It seems, however, there is but one room that is deserving of particular notice, but that one is represented as the finest in Europe. It is the ball room, the dimensions of which are said to be one hundred and twenty feet long, fifty-five wide, and ninety feet high.

When King Louis took possession of the Stadthuis, the civil and municipal authorities removed into a building in the neighbourhood which was once a convent, but converted at the Reformation into the Prince's Hotel, and subsequently became the Admiralty. It is a large building, surrounding a square court, in the middle of which is a fountain.

There are at least ten or twelve churches of the established religion in Amsterdam, and churches and chapels of almost every other sort that can be named. At one time the Dutch were intolerant in the highest degree; and Catholics, Lutherans, Jews, and Anabaptists, and every other sect, were prohibited from holding any public place of worship, but were obliged to congregate in private houses. Now, however, they are allowed to assemble, each in his own church or chapel, for the performance of divine service; but even yet none of them are allowed the use of bells, and some are not permitted to raise a tower or spire, but only a simple turret or cupola.

Not many, indeed, of the established churches have lofty towers or spires; these are of no particular class or order of architecture, but nevertheless are of good proportions and pleasing designs. Perhaps they may be classed, in point of size and height, with the tower and spire of St. Martin's in the Fields, and in point of general appearance in the architecture, to St. Mary's or the new church in the Strand.

The reformers, in taking possession of the Roman Catholic churches, took care to strip them of every ornament and decoration that could be removed or defaced, particularly pictures and statues; they threw down the altars, and have shut out from public view the choir, at the head of which the grand altar used to stand; they also demolished the chapels and their altars. Thus stripped, the traveller feels little curiosity in entering a Dutch church.

In the old church that was dedicated to St. Nicholas, it is said, was a statue of the saint as large as life, of solid silver, which the Calvinists pulled down and melted, together with the candelabras and other pieces of plate belonging to the church. Here, as in the other churches we have seen, a balustrade of bronze separates the choir from the body of the church, and on its cornice is an inscription in Dutch, containing the following piece of history:—"The abuse introduced from time to time into the church of God was here exploded in the year 1578."

The altar, as usual, has totally disappeared, and a small plain pulpit supplies its place, from which catechisms are examined and confirmed, and marriages solemnised. In other parts of the church are several monuments, not very interesting, though generally in a better state of execution than we find them in our own churches.

There are, however, three large painted windows on the left transept as we go up the nave, which, though completely Catholic, the reforming iconoclasts have spared. We all agreed in considering them by much the best paintings on glass we had ever met with; and there is a history attached to them, which is believed to be true, and which appears to be borne out by circumstances. Two of these windows were the gift of a wealthy burgo-master, of the name of Claas Van Hoppen. Claas was accused of heresy, and of favouring the new or reformed religion. The priests and his confessor threatened him with excommunication unless he recanted, and immediately undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, to obtain absolution from the pope, who had, no doubt, previously been made acquainted with his wealthy circumstances, and also that he was a bon vivant. The penance imposed by his Holiness was, that he should make a present of two painted glass windows to the church of St. Nicholas, and that for one whole year he should drink nothing but water. The expense of the glass windows was but a trifle to a man of his great wealth; but having never been a water drinker, he felt convinced of his inability to fulfil that part of the punishment. He therefore solicited a second audience, at which he acquainted his Holiness that the water of Amsterdam was so unwholesome that no body drank it plain; and all he requested was to be permitted to add a few grains of corn to correct its impurities, or he feared he should die before the windows were finished. The pope assented to this reasonable request, and Claas Van Hoppen took good care to malt his water well.

The corner, in which these windows are, is called the Vrouwen Koir, or women's choir, there being a great number of female figures painted in the act of prayer. The arms also of the Van Hoppen family are painted on the glass, and carved also on a tombstone.

The subject of the painting on the first window is the "Salutation of the Virgin Mary by the Angel Gabriel." The second, the "Visit to the Virgin by her cousin Elizabeth." Beneath are the two apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul. On each side are a number of persons on their knees, and among the group on the right is a man clad in a grey frock, who is supposed to be Van Hoppen; and this is the more probable, as near to him is represented a bishop with his crozier, on which are written these words:—"Nemo leditur nisi a se ipso."

Beautiful as these two windows are, the third is still more so, and obviously painted by a different artist. It represents a person, supposed to be the Holy Virgin, on her death bed. She is raised up by her attendants, and holds a lighted candle in her hand, the flame of which is so perfectly natural that the spectator can scarcely believe it not to be so. A numerous group surround the couch while she is apparently receiving the viaticum; and a host of angels hover above, ready to convey the soul of the dying saint to the regions of bliss. There is another window behind the choir covered with the painted arms of all the burgomasters, from the reformation of 1578 down to the present time. This church has what may be called an elegant tower and spire, said to be two hundred and fifty feet high. In 1760 it was bodily lifted up by screws, to enable the workmen to repair the foundation. It is remarked for a fine set of carillons, which emit pleasing silvery tones.

The new church, originally dedicated to St. Peter, now to St. Catherine, stands on the Dam, close to the palace; and new as it was, no doubt, at the time, it is built on the model of the cathedral of Amiens. The dimensions are set down as three hundred and fifteen feet long, by two hundred and ten broad; and it is lighted by no less than seventy-five large windows. It contains some of the best modern monuments in Holland, particularly one of Admiral de Ruyter, which has usurped the place of the grand altar. The pulpit is a good specimen of carved work in wood, supported by figures of the four Evangelists.

Besides the steeples or spires of the churches, there are four or five lofty towers scattered in different parts of the city, most of which have their clocks and carillons. One of these, standing on the quay, is the Herring Tower, at which the company of merchants concerned in the herring fishery hold their meetings and keep their accounts; and this spot, on the return of the boats from the fishery, is said to exhibit one of the busiest scenes that occur in this great capital. There is another tower on the quay, named the Serayershoek Toer, or the tower of the mourners, so called from its standing on the spot where the wives and children of seamen were accustomed to take leave of their husbands and fathers on embarking on foreign voyages. It is now converted into offices for those who are charged with the duties of the port.

From the churches we proceeded to view the National Museum of Pictures in the Trippenhuis on the Kloveniersburgwal, which is open daily, except Sundays, to strangers. The name is taken from that of the original owner of the house, which was Trip.

It is a good building containing, on two floors, seven or eight rooms, well filled with nearly five hundred pictures, chiefly of the Dutch and Flemish schools, and many of them among the finest specimens of the several masters. Some of the best were removed from the Stadthuis when it became the palace; and to these were added others that were purchased at the public expense from private collections. All which are described in the guide books.

The total want of specimens of the school of Italian painting, might render the museum of Amsterdam of no great estimation in the eyes of those who can see nothing worth bestowing a look upon, but subjects treated in the manner which they are pleased to style the beau idant; that is to say, to produce something that does not exactly exist in nature, but superior to it—angelic features, superhuman forms, and beings created out of the fervour of a heated and luxuriant imagination; the story wrapt up in some hidden meaning, which none but the painter himself can understand or explain; gods and goddesses, nymphs, cupids, fauns, and satyrs—in short, any thing that is not human or natural, if painted with fine flowing lines and warm colouring, is extolled as the link which connects painting with poetry; and so far the conception is just, as both of them, to ensure the praise and admiration of their votaries, must deal in fiction. The Dutch and Flemish painters are mostly content to follow nature, and only fail when they attempt something that is beyond her. Rubens himself never succeeds so ill as where he attempts what is called allegory. It is in some of those pieces where he found it necessary to introduce creatures like nothing that exists on earth, and where his females are such uncouth beings, as almost to justify the resemblance they were said by one of his critics to bear to Flanders' mares.

Our next visit was to the park or plantation—plantatie, as it is generally called by the inhabitants. It is situated near the southern extremity of the city, at the end of that noble street, the Heeren Gragt, and is surrounded by canals; and, according to the space it appears to occupy on the plan, may be about one thousand yards long by five hundred broad; or, in extent of surface, about one hundred acres; it contains some tolerably fine trees, and is laid out in straight walks, at right angles to each other. Near one corner is a small botanical garden, consisting chiefly of medicinal plants, but not to be mentioned after the garden of Leyden.

Not far from the park is the stone bridge over the Amstel, where this river enters the city in a fine broad sheet of water, and with so gentle a current as scarcely to be perceptible. It is called, one knows not why, the Lover's Bridge. It is said to be six hundred and sixty feet long, and seventy feet wide; it has eleven arches, with piers of stone masonry mixed with brick-work, apparently of solid and well-executed workmanship. From the centre of this bridge is a favourable view of the city on one side, and on the other an extensive prospect over the flat surface of this singular country, divided into squares and parallelograms, by means of dykes and ditches, called polders; spaces that contain, within their boundaries, villas and gardens, which are kept dry by innumerable windmills employed in pumping out the water.

Ascending the quay of the binnen Amstel, or the river within the city, we are led to the Exchange, under which it passes through a large arch; and at this point, over the centre of the arch, is conspicuously placed the figure of Mercury, of a colossal size—rather an odd appendage to be selected as the guardian deity of the temple, wherein all the mercantile and money concerns of the capital are transacted. For though this winged gentleman was the protecting deity of commerce, the Dutch were no doubt aware, that among his other qualifications, he had the reputation of being well versed in the art of appropriating to himself what belonged to others. He is also renowned for activity and swiftness, which have not been supposed among the most prominent features of the Dutch character.

Like all the continental exchanges which resemble our own, that of Amsterdam is a quadrangular building, with an open square space in the middle, round which is an arcade or gallery, supported by forty-six columns, each being appropriated to some particular class of merchants or traders; and here people of all nations daily assemble in crowds, at a particular hour, for the transaction of business. This crowd were a very Jewish and shabby appearance, which made one of our party observe, that he never saw such a multitude of money men together, that looked so very much like a set of pickpockets. Having since visited the stock exchange of London, and the bank rotunda, he is quite ready to qualify the harsh opinion he had pronounced on the merchants and money-changers of Amsterdam.

A similar crowd, with a good sprinkling of Jews, were loitering daily about the lottery offices, which are numerous in the neighbouring streets, and particularly about the Dam. The prevalence of gambling is a vice, from which the Dutch government has no scruple in deriving a considerable revenue.

The little time we had to spare would not admit of our visiting all the numerous institutions with which this city abounds, for the alleviation of human misery and distress in all their various shapes. The several hospitals, generally kept distinct, for the reception of the aged, the infirm, and the desolate; the blind, the lame, the widows, and orphans; for foundlings, and for those deprived of reason; of which, taken together, there appears to be not fewer than forty, most of them large and convenient buildings. The various prisons, and houses of correction and of industry, are said to be under a better system of control and management, than are most of a similar description in other parts of Europe.

These several establishments have been founded by, and derive their support either from the public, the several religious societies, or rich individuals, particularly widows who are left in good circumstances, and who are frequently most liberal contributors to charities of this kind. But to make ourselves acquainted with the details of the management of institutions of this kind required too much time for a flying visit, and we were therefore reluctantly obliged to be satisfied with viewing, as we did most of them, externally.

Whether the whole mass of human wretchedness which this capital, in common with all large cities, must contain, would require a long residence to determine; but we could not help making the same remark here as in Rotterdam—that in all our rambles we had not met with a drunken person in the streets; nay, more, that we had not observed a man, woman, or child, in rags, or met with a real object of compassion in any part of the town; and the only beggars that accosted us, and those were in some of the lower parts of the town, were decrepit old men. The truth is, that if a young sturdy beggar should be discovered teasing passengers for alms, the police would instantly seize hold of him and send him at once to one of the work-houses, where, if he refused to perform the task set him, he would be treated with a spell at the pump.

Those who are at the head of the police are not so squeamish in Holland as we are. There is none of that fearfulness and timidity,—none of the nonsensical speeches and conversations which our Dogberrys of the East and of the West are so fond of making, for the pleasure of seeing themselves exhibited in the daily papers,—none of the gossiping, for the gentlemen of the press to detail in their respective journals, whenever a rogue or vagabond—especially one of notoriety—happens to be brought before them.

The law in Holland is clearly defined, and, if the fact be proved, the magistrate has no other line to pursue than to direct that the law shall take its course; and thus the public is relieved from a nuisance, and society benefited by the example. "All rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars," which the act of Elizabeth, in our statute-book, professes to set to work, the Dutch take good care shall be set to work; and they also take care to have ready in hand, what our statute likewise directs to have in hand, "a convenient stock of flax, hemp, wool, thread, corn, and other necessary ware and stuff, to set the poor on work."

To aid the police in the praiseworthy task of finding useful labour for the poor and idle, "The Society of Friends of Humanity and Public Utility," have established an agricultural colony called Frederik's-oord, near Steenwyk, on the eastern side of the Zuider Zee, where the land rises into barren heaths and dunes. This institution is said to have answered so well, that the king of Denmark undertook to form a similar establishment in his dominions, which, however, failed.

No loose women are permitted to infest the streets of Amsterdam; and the public eye, therefore, is not offended by their indecent and immodest conduct. Private haunts of intemperance and debauchery, it is well known, are winked at, perhaps sanctioned, by the government; which could not be prevented either here or elsewhere; and on this ground it may, perhaps, be deemed politic to allow them. But those disgusting dens of profligacy, known by the name of speel-houses or muscus, frequented by both sexes, and to which, on certain days of the year, respectable families were in the habit of taking their children, to witness scenes of vice in their most odious shape, in order to disgust them—a lesson of doubtful morality—can scarcely now be said to exist, except among the very lowest of the inhabitants.

The police of the city appears to be excellently regulated. Robberies or house-breaking are of rare occurrence. The minister intrusted with the police takes care to employ stout young men, who may be seen in the evening walking in pairs; and these are efficient guardians of peace and quiet during the night. Our new and excellent police establishment is not unlike that of Amsterdam.

Excepting about the quays, where there is always some show of business and bustle, and in the Warmoes Straat and Calvers Straat, in both of which are the principal shops for all kinds of wares and merchandise, and which may be compared, in point of wealth, with the Strand in London, but without the advantage of its side pavements, Amsterdam appeared to be just as dull and gloomy as the west end of London is in the month of October; and this arose apparently from the same cause, the merchants and gentry being at this time absent at their country villas, enjoying themselves,—some in the sports of the field, confined mostly to the shooting of rabbits, and others in the tulip and hyacinth beds of their neatly-trimmed gardens.

It was generally admitted that the trade, and consequently the prosperity, of Amsterdam had not yet recovered, since the peace, from the shock which they had here, as in Rotterdam, experienced by fraternizing with the French republicans; and it was also admitted, as a natural consequence, that the population had greatly decreased. The whale-fishery, once the source of great wealth, had entirely ceased; and the East India trade and possessions, to which had been mainly owing the prosperity, the splendour, and the maritime power of the nation, had now become a source of vast expenditure, without a hope of their ever recovering their ancient prosperity.

As a proof of the declining state of Oriental commerce, the East India House and its magazines on the island of Oostenburg are crumbling into ruins. They are fully sensible that they never can, under any circumstances, pretend to compete with the English and the Americans in the East India and China trade; and the opinion of the soundest politicians is, that the best thing they can do would be to abandon the trade and possessions altogether.

The bad management and grasping avarice of the Dutch servants in Java have created a rebellion among four millions of people, whom that active, intelligent, zealous, and humane governor, Sir Stamford Raffles, had made happy, prosperous, and free. Under his rule they had been relieved from the power of their oppressors, and freed from that impolitic and unjust system of exactions and forced deliveries of produce, which the Dutch had imposed on their land and their labour.

It was a great mistake on our part, in the negotiations for peace, to have voluntarily surrendered this fine island and its four millions of people to the Dutch, as an act of generosity to a fallen nation, for as to any claim on us, they had none. They never were, and it was not likely they ever would become, popular among the Javanese. Their system of policy has gone far to ruin this noble island, and they have reaped nothing but disgrace, expense, and embarrassment.

The same indication, which amounts nearly to proof of a decreasing population, that we noticed in other towns of Holland, struck us forcibly here. We did not see a single new house, or a house building in all Amsterdam; but we did observe three or four old ones pulling down in the Jews' quarter, with an intention, probably, of rebuilding them, as they stood on the margin of a canal.

The conclusion to be drawn from the few remarks we made of Amsterdam is, what many persons have supposed to be the case, that it is a very dull, and therefore not a very interesting place. The fact, however, is not so: there is always something going on to excite attention. Mrs. Montagu says, that she never could understand what the expression "stock-still" meant till she visited Amsterdam, when she at once felt its full force. No doubt the "stocks" or "stakes," of which there are so many thousands along the quays of Amsterdam, were "still" enough; but the sea by which they are surrounded is not always so. The canals are "still," but the craft constantly moving about in them is not so. The quays of a town from which two thousand vessels clear out annually, or about six daily, are not likely to be "still"; and if Mrs. Montagu had gone shopping in Warmoes Straat, or Calvers Straat, she would not have found much "still" life there.

No city, for its size and population, abounds with more societies for the cultivation of literature, science, and the fine arts, than Amsterdam. It has an academy of painting, sculpture, engraving, and architecture. At the Felix meritis, a most respectable society for the encouragement of every branch of art, science, and literature, of physics, music, and even commerce and political economy, lectures are delivered and dissertations read on all subjects. They have a library stocked with books in all departments of science; a collection of plaster casts from ancient statues; a chemical apparatus, and a collection of mathematical, philosophical, and even musical instruments, and they give concerts. All these are contained in a very handsome building.

The Society of Public Utility is common to every city and town in Holland above the rank of a village. Schools of every kind are numerous. Those for the poor are said to be well attended by more than four thousand children: they are under the direction of a certain number of curators, who admit the children of the poor without distinction of religious sects.

The shortness of our stay would not allow us to form any correct conclusions as to the state of society. The ladies seldom appear in public, and rarely in the streets, excepting in the two where the principal shops are; and very few carriages of any kind are seen in Amsterdam. One of the most common, which serves the place of our hackney coaches, is a small-bodied coach, like a Brighton "Fly," without wheels, and fixed on a wooden sledges, drawn by a single horse, and attended by a man who walks by the side, to prevent it from upsetting. The Dutch of both sexes now dress pretty much in the same manner as other Europeans. The Friesland ladies, however, have a peculiar head-dress, consisting of a small cap close to the head, to each side of which, and covering the temples nearly as far as the eyes, is attached a plate of gold. The first impression which this odd appendage gives is, that the wearer must have been trepanned. This tasteless head-dress, with its cap and golden plates, is said to cost from ten to twelve pounds; but being a distinction from the vulgar, it is considered cheap enough. These Friesland ladies wear besides golden ringlets round the neck, and pendants from the ear. They are said to be exceedingly tenacious of their ancient customs and dress, and also of their language, which differs as much from modern Dutch as the Flemish does.

The dress of the ladies of Amsterdam is French; and that usually worn by tradesmen's wives and servant girls differs but little from that of the same classes in England, except that the latter description of Hollanders have rarely any summer covering on their head but a cap, and they frequently wear long cloaks with hoods, as in the Netherlands. The men also now dress much the same as with us. The little round hat, the puckered jacket, and the wide breeches of the men have entirely disappeared, except among some of the northern fishermen; and the same kind of hat, the jacket, and short peccotat, displaying a pair of sky-blue stockings, have been equally deserted by the females.

Both sexes appear healthy, which our doctors say they ought not to do in a climate so humid, and amidst a stench from stagnant canals so deleterious. The deaths, we understood, amount to about twenty a day; which, on a population of one hundred and eighty thousand, give an average of four per cent; a much greater mortality than the average of European cities.

One cannot walk the length of a street in Amsterdam without meeting a certain gentleman dressed in black, with a crape depending from his hat, and a sheet of paper in his hand. He is known by the name of aan-spreker, (announcer, or reporter,) whose business it is to go round to the relatives and acquaintances of a deceased person, to announce his death. To give notice to the friends of the birth of a child, a written bulletin is frequently stuck up on the door-post of the house, stating the health of the mother and child to be, as usual, "as well as can be expected."

If Amsterdam should happily regain its former state of prosperity, it will either be necessary to build on the boulevards, or fill up the adjoining polders; though it is probable that, in such an event, another city would rise on the north side of the Ai, opposite to the old one, either by Buick-slugs, where the grand canal enters it, or at Saardam, or more properly Saandam, where the Canal Peter, under the name of Peter Michaelhof, learnt the trade of ship-building; and where the late Emperor Alexander, when at Amsterdam, visited the cabin and its homely furniture of his great ancestor.

The side of the Ai is preferable as a port to this which the city now stands, being the weather-shore, and sheltered from all winds. The king is said to have it in contemplation to appoint commissioners to examine and report on his naval establishments. He could not do better than remove the dock-yard of Amsterdam across the water, as, in its present position, it is exposed to the prevailing winds. At present, however, it would appear more prudent to direct his attention to his army rather than the navy. He will find that a military navy is not to be made without an extensive mercantile navy, which he has not. Certain northern political economists, among their many absurdities, have hazarded the assertion that an efficient navy may be raised and maintained without merchant ships, colonies, or commerce. A nation that should be foolish enough to try the experiment would find itself much in the situation of the Israelites, who were required by the Egyptians to make bricks without straw. The Dutch have more sense than to be gulled by such fooleries.

CHAPTER V.

AMSTERDAM TO NIMEGUEN.

Having thus in two days satisfied our curiosity in regard to Amsterdam, visited several of its institutions, and seen externally every street almost in the city, having one of the days been on our legs full eight hours, we made our arrangements for departing the following morning on our way to Utrecht. The distance is twenty-two miles, which by way of variety we once thought of passing over in a heckschuyt; but the weather was threatening; and wishing to get to the Rhine as speedily as possible, that we might see the more of that noble river, we hired a char-a-banc, with a pair of horses, for which we agreed to pay sixteen guilders, and three more for the amount of the tolls, which are high in all parts of Holland. The rain began to fall, and continued incessantly; and as there was nothing remarkable to be seen in Utrecht, we determined to proceed as far as Amerongen, a small town, or rather village, about sixteen miles farther on. For this distance we bargained to pay fourteen guilders, and two more for the tolls, making the whole sum thirty-five guilders for thirty-eight miles, which was performed by two very indifferent horses without halting, except to give them a morsel of hay and a little water.

The first part of the road after leaving Amsterdam is through a continued avenue of moderate sized trees, bordered by canals, with gardens, villas, and the same kind of little summer houses we have so often mentioned as those overlooking the road. It was quite amusing and delightful to pass so many neat houses, "whimsically pretty," as one of our countrymen calls the country dwellings of the Dutch, surrounded by their little gardens, walled in, as it were, within square enclosures of four green dykes, and, as a necessary appendage, as many ditches. Sometimes these enclosures are of considerable extent, containing several villas, and the place shut in is then called a polder, and the greater part of the country around the capital is made up of an aggregation of these polders. It was some time before we had passed the last of these curious communities, when a causeway commenced that was raised a little above the level of that same kind of flat surface, which occurred on the opposite or western side of the Haarlem Meer. It was, in fact, a continuation of those flat meadows, intersected with ditches, very rich and green, with numerous herds of cattle grazing, but destitute of trees, and almost of any kind of shrubby plant, except a few willows along the margins of the ditches. To the westward were seen some sand-hills or dunes in the distance, which were on the boundary of the Haarlem Meer, terminating the horizon.

At the distance of some six or seven miles from Amsterdam, the face of the country begins to change for the better. Something like woods and copses now began to show themselves, and the grounds were enlivened by good, substantial, and gentlemanlike houses, and these became more frequent as we advanced to the southward. The surface, too, was more broken and varied as we approached Utrecht. Here, indeed, the northern branch of the Rhine, which passes through the town of Utrecht, begins to show something like rising banks, and in passing through the town the stream is so far below the general surface of the country, that the streets and the houses are considerably above the level of the water, to which the inhabitants descend by ladders, sometimes from the second story. The fact is, that the general surface of the country having risen into something like hills at Utrecht, it was no easy matter to cause the river and its canals to rise to the level of the houses; they therefore sunk the houses to the level of the canals. We saw at once, therefore, that we must here take leave of the flat gardens, their fish ponds and ditches, and their corresponding little summer houses, which had afforded us so much amusement. The only striking object that appears from the road is the old church of Utrecht, partly in ruins, with its noble tower, said to be four hundred feet high. The once celebrated university has lost its character, and is nearly deserted by students, and the professors are said to be reduced to a state of great poverty. The population is reckoned at about thirty thousand, one half of whom are catholics. We had now to drive along a noble avenue of linden trees, three or four deep on each side of the road, and of an interminable length to the eye. We have been told, indeed, that the mall of Utrecht is the finest in the world; which, beautiful as it certainly is, cannot, as we all thought, be put in competition with those magnificent avenues of Hampton Court and of Bushy Park, whose noble trees of linden and horsechestnut far exceed in beauty any that Holland can produce. Neither has it any thing to compare with another of the few avenues which fashion has spared to England—that of the magnificent beech trees which leads to Stanstead House, in Hampshire,—not yet quite defaced by the demolition which it suffered by the avidity of its late proprietor.

The road continues for a considerable distance to be shaded by this avenue of beeches, elms, and lindens; and, scarcely a house occurs on either side that has not a very respectable appearance, with double or triple rows of fine trees leading up to it. The grounds, too, are frequently laid out with large plantations of various kinds of trees and oak copses, and the hedges which enclose them are also of oak. On a rising ground on the left, near the village of Zeyst, is a huge pyramid or mound of earth, said to be one hundred and fifty feet high, raised by the army of Marmont on the occasion of Napoleon being created emperor; but we could not discover that it was held in any kind of respect by the Dutch.

As we approached Amerongen the soil became more sandy, the general surface of the country more undulated, and we observed, for the first time since entering Holland, that rounded pebbles were imbedded in the banks by the road side, as if this indicated the ancient beach or bank of the Rhine, when that mighty stream may have flowed towards Utrecht in its integrity, and before it had been divided and diverted.

It has been observed that on the gates of almost all the villas or parks some inscription or motto is written up; here however the custom seems to be to publish in the same manner the name of the possessor of the domain, and generally with a notification to warn off poachers. Thus we frequently see "Jan Peterson's yacht," "private yacht," "myn eigen yacht;" that is, John Peterson's shooting-ground, private shooting, or for my own shooting. This kind of notice, it would seem, is effectual for keeping out poachers or intruders; for the game laws in Holland are as strict or more so than in England, and the license required for shooting is said to be much more expensive, and the penalty in proportion. It is not easy to imagine, however, what kind of game there could possibly be to hunt or shoot in some of these small domains of a few acres; but different notions of sporting are entertained by different nations: the onde stadhouder is said to have amused himself by coursing hares and rabbits in the court-yard of his palace, and the old king of Naples enjoyed the pleasure of shooting tame ducks from a window as they were driven past it in the pond. It may be taken for granted, however, that where there is plenty of game to eat, there must be plenty of game to shoot, and we experienced no want of it on our journey at table; but it did so happen that, in the whole of our route through

Holland, and along the Rhine as far as Mentz, from thence to Frankfort, and on our return from Cologne through the Netherlands, we never saw a single pheasant or partridge, either running or on the wing; yet the latter in particular was served up at table daily throughout the month of August. To make amends, hares and rabbits were seen skipping about in great abundance.

We were now travelling along a very extensive domain of a gentleman whose name, if it was not the name of his place, appeared at every little gate and opening of the wood—it was Brookhuysen, to which was here and there added "myn eigen yacht." This property continued for at least a mile, and the plantations of young firs that bordered the road were very extensive on both sides, and rabbits in scores were every where seen skipping across the road. We were now on rising ground, and had evidently taken leave of every thing like a level meadow, and all the open spaces in the woods and copses were under cultivation. Here too on the rising ground to the left we observed for the first time a few long-haired sheep browsing on the heathy land.

The crops on the right were chiefly confined to buckwheat, of which we passed some hundred acres by the road side in the course of the latter half of this day's journey; but this grain, with the exception of a few fields of oats and some patches of clover and potatoes, was the only kind that we observed. It is used here, as in China, for making the lighter and finer kinds of pastry. From the quantity of fresh ploughed land, however, it is probable that the wheat harvest had been got in and the stubble turned under by the plough. The road itself the whole way was smooth and beautiful, and as level as a bowling green, but in some few places, where the level surface was interrupted, it was covered with gravel.

The only inn at Amerongen is the post house, not very good as to accommodation, but the people extremely civil, and desirous of making it as comfortable as our unexpected visit and their means would allow, which is all that a traveller has a right to expect. We paid, however, for their civility—the charge for a bad supper, and an equally bad breakfast, with lodging, being twenty-seven guilders, or forty-five shillings, just about double of that which the best hotel in Amsterdam would have charged. Indeed we have invariably found, what is perhaps not unreasonable to expect, that at the first hotel, where the fire is best, the charge is least.

On the morning of the 15th at nine o'clock we left Amerongen, and proceeded with the same horses that had brought us from Amsterdam, and which were to carry us to Arnhem, a distance of more than twenty miles, for sixteen guilders. This town is not precisely in the direct road, but the rain which had continued incessantly to fall in torrents for eight and forty hours had made the lower and usual road quite impassable.

That, however, between Amerongen and Arnhem proved to be quite delightful, perfectly level, and with a very gentle curvature or rise in the middle. It was covered with clinkers, and we had often remarked, in passing over one of these roads, that the water never remained on any part of them. The last two days satisfied us, that let it rain as hard and as long as it may, not a drop of water will be seen standing on either any part of the middle or the sides of the road, provided it is properly kept in order, as they all seem to be. This may be noticed as a fact, but we were unable satisfactorily to account for it; perhaps, however, it may be explained by supposing the clinkers to be laid on a bed of fine sand, and this perhaps on faggots, which would let the water pass through the crevices between the bricks, and into the substrata that support them.

On approaching the ancient fortified town of Rheenen, the Rhine, or that branch of it which passes close by this place to the northward, now appeared in its natural character of a fine flowing stream, winding close along a bank on which we travelled, elevated several feet above its surface, it having here completely lost its slow and sluggish motion, more like that of an artificial canal than a river.

Rheenen is an ancient town, in which there is little to excite a stranger's attention, except it be the tower of the old church, which is a bold and striking specimen of heavy Gothic. In the neighbourhood of this town, the land appears to be neatly and carefully cultivated, chiefly with tobacco. It is planted in small squares of a rood, or sometimes less than a half a rood in extent, the side of each square being planted by a row of the large French kidney bean, or scarlet runners, which had now reached the height of six or seven feet, and formed a close hedge all round the little plantations to secure the broad leaves of the tobacco plant from the wind. The bean was now in full blossom of scarlet flowers; and the ground on the right of the road being covered as far as the eye could reach with these patches of tobacco, the face of the country in that direction presented a very singular and beautiful appearance.

On the left of the road, the surface rose into hills of considerable height, sometimes covered with thickets of brushwood, mixed with small plantations, in some places, of Scotch firs and Weymouth pines, mingled with oaks, beech, and birch. These, with the heaths and the fern intermixed, gave this part of the country very much the appearance of many of the heath lands of England; the more so, as the road twisted and winded among them, as is usually the case in our own country.

A little beyond Rheenen we descended to the valley of the Rhine on our right, where all was flat, and we observed in places extensive and high embankments to protect the plain against the encroachment of the river.

The approach to Arnhem is particularly striking. It is through an avenue of fine beech trees near two miles in length, and the vista terminated by a lofty old tower of one of the churches, with the Rhine on the right, and the rising grounds of the left covered with villas, and well clothed. The environs of Arnhem were really beautiful; perhaps they may but appear to greater advantage after leaving the sombre flats of the neighbourhood of Amsterdam.

On arriving at Arnhem, our horses, as may be supposed, were cutely knocked up; and as the finely paved road of clinkers had here ceased, and a sort of rude Macadamized road commenced, it would have been madness as well as an act of cruelty to have taken them on to the spot where we were to cross the Waal to Nimeguen. We therefore prevailed on our honest Dutch driver to let his char-a-banc proceed with us to that spot, a distance of about nine miles, with a pair of fresh horses from the inn, for which we were required to pay the reasonable sum of five guilders.

The moment we had got through the town of Arnhem, we crossed the Rhine over a long stone bridge, the approach to which, and for some time on the other side of it, was over a very execrable road. We were now on the level valley of the Rhine, and between it and the Waal; the surface was low and swampy, and the road continued very indifferent: it appeared as if we had two embankments, one on the left to keep out the Rhine, and an immense one on the right to prevent the encroachment of the Waal. It appeared also, as we afterwards found to be the case, that the great public road to Rheenen, on which the rain here prevented us from travelling, was on the summit of this great bank.

We arrived about three o'clock at a small inn on the right bank of the Waal, directly opposite to Nimeguen, and the access to which is partly by a bridge of boats, and partly by a flying bridge, the former extending to about the middle of the stream on this side, and the latter over the other half next to Nimeguen. A ferry is not the most desirable method of crossing a rapid river; but of all the different kinds of ferrying, that by means of what is called a flying bridge is considerably the best and most convenient where it can be adopted, which is only where the river has a considerable current. An anchor is fixed at a certain distance up the stream, always greater than the breadth of the river, from which a cable of rope or chain passes to the platform of the ferry boat, which is here supported on a couple of large barges. This cable is buoyed up by passing over such a number of boats as may be found necessary. If the rudder of the large platform be moved so as to turn the heads of the supporting barges about a point of the compass towards the stream, so as to let it act against the sides of their bows, they will, of course, shear across, or oscillate like a pendulum, with a slow and uniform motion, to the opposite side, the cable and its supporting boats edging over in the direction of the platform. By having the height of the platform the same as those of the two piers or landing places on the sides of the river, carriages of any size, carts or waggon, without unyoking the horses, may drive upon it and pass over without disturbing passengers or baggage within them.

The young Prince of Holland, whose expected arrival in Amsterdam had prevented us from seeing the palace, crossed over this evening in a carriage drawn by six horses, not one of which was taken out, nor did the coachman or postillions leave their seats.

Having got our dinner at the little inn, and the steam boat making its appearance, though at a considerable distance, we crossed over by the flying bridge, and waited the arrival of the vessel at Nimeguen. The passage-money for six persons in the great barge, which we fortunately had to ourselves, and a servant in the fore-cabin, from hence to Cologne, was one hundred and four guilders, or 8*l.* 13*s.*, the distance being more than a hundred miles.

On departing from Nimeguen in the steam boat, we took leave of the last town of the United Provinces of Holland that we should have the opportunity of seeing, of a country that, with all its ditches and its dykes, its sloots, sluices, and polders, is unquestionably one of the most singular, the most curious, and most interesting countries in the world; and as to the people who inhabit, and whose ancestors may fairly be said to have created it, though they have been represented as cold and uncourteous towards strangers, rude in their speech, and repulsive in their manners, we can, with honest truth, declare, that so far from experiencing any conduct of this kind, or having the slightest ground of complaint in any one instance, or in any part of the country from Rotterdam to Nimeguen, we never found them to be wanting in the common courtesies and civilities of life. They may, perhaps, be more cautious and reserved towards strangers than the natives of other European countries usually are; but a very short acquaintance banishes all restraint, and they become cheerful, open-hearted, and communicative. We are told, however, by certain philosophers who resolve the different temperaments and dispositions of men into the effect of climate, that a Dutchman must necessarily be grave and phlegmatic, from the animal spirits being subjected to a dull, dense, and humid atmosphere, to which they are almost constantly exposed. This doctrine is mere theory, like many others espoused by the ingenious author of "Esprit des Loix;" but experience having proved it contrary to fact, is now pretty nearly exploded.

But the Dutch have been accused of avarice and inhumanity. That the middle class of society are economical and parsimonious, is very certain; but their parsimony and economy are, in all probability, the natural result of industrious habits of trade, and of labour not the most productive of profit. Their young men, almost from the period of their infancy, are instructed in the pursuits of commerce, and learn at an early age to consider the great business of life to be gain, a portion of which is laid by every year.

"Industrious habits in each bosom reign,
And industry begets a love of gain."

In a somewhat higher class of life there is a general inclination to the prosecution of commercial pursuits, and indeed in all their undertakings they are equally industrious, persevering, and patient, with the labouring classes. We require no greater proof of the general character of this nation for persevering industry, and their unconquerable determination to overcome difficulties, than their successful exertions in braving and conquering the waves of the ocean—than the fact that, without a stone or pebble, they have raised the most splendid edifices; without a tree they have laid the foundations of large cities on piles of wood; without a stick of timber fit for a ship's post-nast, they built a navy that disputed the seas with the most powerful navy in the world; that almost without an acre of arable land they supplied the markets of half of Europe with grain; that with a country not larger than Yorkshire they were able to raise a respectable army, and to take a leading part in the politics of Europe; and it ought to be added that, in all their mercantile transactions, the Dutch are remarkable for their punctuality, integrity and honour. Their patriotism or love of country has always been a predominant feature in the Dutch character; in whatever part of the world a Dutchman may be placed, the word Vaderland bears a charm, and is never heard without exciting a sensation of pleasure in his mind.

But then they are accused of being cruel and inhuman; and with what justice, as a nation, they can be so accused, it would not be so easy to show. The numerous charitable institutions of Holland, more particularly of Amsterdam, many of which are entirely supported at the expense of individuals, should alone be sufficient to disprove such an imputation. There is a little trait connected with one of these institutions, which shows that not only a humane but kind-hearted people. The hospital for the reception of the old and indigent of both sexes, on the quay of the Amstel, is contrived admirably for the comfort and convenience of the aged and infirm. The building is three hundred and sixty foot long by two hundred and thirty deep. A gallery on each of the three stories runs round the four sides of the square, and behind it is a large garden for the inmates to walk in, and enjoy the fresh air. This building has a dining-room of one hundred and twenty-three feet in length, and an infirmary of the same dimensions. The year 1753 was the centennial anniversary of its establishment, and on this occasion the directors gave a feast to all the pensioners, amounting to upwards of six hundred and fifty, who were regaled in the most sumptuous manner, and the best part of Amsterdam were present to witness the joy of the old people on this occasion. The emperor of China therefore is not the only humane person who can enjoy the gratification of making others happy by his annual feast given to the most aged of his subjects.

The beneficent society and the charitable and disinterested subscribers to the agricultural establishment of Frederick's-ord is another proof of the active benevolence and humanity which distinguish the people of Holland. It is no speculation founded on the remotest chance of profit, but solely on that of relieving the distresses of their unfortunate fellow subjects. Of this small canton or district (which oord signifies) Mr. Jacob, the controller of corn returns, has collected a detailed and most interesting account from the published reports of its progress and condition. This benevolent institution, whose object is to lessen the burden of pauperism and improve the moral habits of the juvenile portion of it, is indebted for its origin and its successful progress to the intelligence, the zeal and indefatigable benevolence of General Van den Bosch. This officer, when in Java, purchased an estate and made the pursuit of agriculture his study. A Chinese mandarin with a number of emigrants from that country settled by chance near him. The general soon observed that, with all his labour and care, the crops of his Chinese neighbour greatly exceeded his own; he therefore took lessons of the mandarin, and such was the successful result, that, when he returned to Europe, the estate which had cost him twenty-five thousand six dollars, he sold for one hundred and fifty thousand.

The general, on his return to his native country, published a little tract on the practicability of instituting a general pauper establishment in the kingdom of the Netherlands. It happened that the good king (for so he may justly be styled) was in 1817 occupied with a plan for bringing into productive tillage an extensive waste of heath land between Maastricht and Breda. The attention of his majesty was drawn to that of the general. A society was set on foot at the Hague for the intended experiment, under the patronage of the king, of which prince Frederick his second son, was nominated president for life. Twenty thousand individuals became members, and their contributions amounted to seventy thousand florins, or 5,633*l.* sterling.

The first operation was to purchase an estate near the town of Steenwyk, on the confines of Friesland, Overijssel, and Drenthe, consisting of about one thousand three hundred English acres, together with two thousand six hundred acres of heath land, for which the society paid the sum of fifty-six thousand florins, or about 4,666*l.* The river Aa, or Au, which runs through it, was made navigable for boats into the Zuider Zee. Buildings for fifty-two families, to consist of six to eight individuals each, a storehouse, a school, and a spinning house, were speedily erected.

All these operations were commenced early in September, 1818, and ere the 10th of November following, fifty-two indigent families sent by the communes entered upon their new habitations. To each family was granted seven morgen or fourteen acres of land. The whole outfit for each family, made on a minute estimate, was one thousand seven hundred florins, or 141*l.* 13*s.* sterling, which was to be repaid to the society in sixteen years, while the annual rent, with which the colonists were to be charged, was settled to be equal to the interest of the outfit; and such was the success of this small establishment, that, after a few years' experience, it was found that the annual excess of produce over subsistence, of each of the fifty-two families established at Frederick's-ord, amounted to one hundred guilders or florins, or 8*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* sterling.

Loans were now raised for extending the system, to be advanced by the king in his individual character, or by the government, or by the communes, or charitable corporations, or by individuals, each loan limited to five thousand one hundred guilders, or 425*l.* sterling, the exact outfit of three families: the advantage of thus grouping them together was, that two of them were to consist of six paupers each, and the third of six orphans or foundlings, not under six years of age, with a married couple, or a woman only to take charge of the children.

For every such sum the contributors had the privilege of sending three such families.

Sixty guilders were to be paid back yearly to the contributors, for the maintenance of each child, which in the orphan and poor-houses was found to cost nearly double; and it is reported that these twelve paupers do more than maintain themselves.

The first principle of this society is, that no colonist shall, even for the shortest period, be unemployed; and with this view they are under the inspection of the different officers, who exercise their respective duties with the strictness of military precision. General Van den Bosch, as superior director, superintended in person the whole establishment. A sub-director presided over one hundred families; a quarter-master over twenty-four families; a section-master over twelve, who was required to be a practical agriculturist. "Thus the whole mechanism," says Mr. Jacob, "remembers that of an army, divided into sections, companies, battalions, and brigades." They are employed in various kinds of labour, as the preparation of lime from shells, making of bricks, building dwellings, barns, &c., but the greater portion is employed in field labour; the chief implements are the spade and the hoe, at which they soon become sufficiently expert. Every kind of labour is performed by the piece, nothing by the day. The women are employed in spinning and weaving. The amount of their earnings is regularly kept, and a card given which procures at the public store food and other articles at fixed prices. The labour with spades of six individuals in digging fourteen acres, and repeating the operation when required, the sowing, and harvesting, may be supposed to occupy but a certain portion of the fifty-two weeks; the rest is chiefly employed in preparing the composts for manure, and on this, in fact, the success of the colony almost wholly depends.

In the southern provinces similar plans have been put in practice.

We saw too little of female society to form any judgment as to the share which the ladies take in the amusements of their lords and masters. They are understood, however, to make excellent wives, and to manage the domestic concerns with fidelity and ability; "yea," as an old anonymous writer has it, "it is a general observation in this country, that where the women have the direction of the purse and trade, the husbands seldom prove bankrupts, it being the property of a true-born Holland wife, presently after marriage, to apply herself wholly to her business." It may also be mentioned that instances of infidelity are more rare in Holland than in any other nation, indeed they can scarcely be said to exist.

The middling and lower class of females are certainly not remarkable for their beauty; but their dress is not exactly calculated to set off their features to advantage. Among the better classes, Parisian fashions have crept in since they have had the advantage of a visit from the French court in Amsterdam.

On the whole we could not agree with the antithetical summary of the Dutch character and their country, which Sir William Temple has given us, without a good deal of modification; but this might strip his paragraph of much of its prettiness. He says, "that it is a country where the earth is better than the air, and profit more in request than honour; where there is more sense than wit, more good nature than good humour, and more wealth than pleasure; where a man would choose rather to travel than to live; will find more things to observe than desire; and more persons to esteem than love."

But we will conclude by adding, that there are no people in Europe so well governed as the Dutch, with so little expense, and with so little trouble, because they are sober-minded, quiet, industrious, and obedient to the laws; and because they have a king to whom they do but bare justice in styling him the "father of his people."

CHAPTER VI.

PASSAGE UP THE RHINE. FROM NIMEGUEN TO COLOGNE.

The bad weather, which was but just clearing up this afternoon, had probably deterred passengers from embarking on board the steamer, which left Rotterdam in the morning, as there were not above half a dozen on board. We had therefore the pavilion, or stern cabin, wholly to ourselves; which was so far fortunate, as it was necessary we should pass the night in the boat. We left Nimeguen about six in the evening, and about nine reached Emmerick, the frontier town, which marks the territorial division of the king of the Netherlands and of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine. Here we were stopped about a quarter of an hour by a visit from the Prussian douaniers, who appeared to be military officers. They conducted themselves towards us with the utmost politeness, and were satisfied with merely opening our trunks, without examining or even touching any article within them.

We had not much to regret by passing up this lower part of the Rhine by night, as the whole country on both sides of the river is a dead flat, or nearly so, as far as Dusseldorf; and even there it does not much improve. Low natural banks, overgrown with reeds, rushes, and willows, not unlike the navigation among the Zealand islands; in some places the view shut out by artificial embankments; flat meadows of deep green, interspersed with corn fields, and here and there a poor looking village, make up, where the banks do not obstruct, the view for the greater part, of the lower Rhine. In short, the surface on both sides differs not much from that of Holland, having the disadvantage of not being enlivened with those numerous and neat little painted houses, trim gardens, and avenues of trees, which, while they adorn, impart an air of cheerfulness and comfort to the inhabitants of the latter country, and which are here wholly wanting.

The greater part of the inhabitants who made their appearance in and about the villages on the banks of the Rhine, were clothed in rags, half naked, dirty, and sunburnt, almost to blackness. This was more particularly the case between Urdingen and Keiserswerth. Near the latter of these places we passed a long straggling village on the left bank, called Gölz, covered by, and in places concealed behind, an embankment, which had a mean and wretched appearance, though, Mr. Schroeber* informs us, it possesses great historical interest, being once the Gelduba of Tacitus and Florus, where Drusus established a bridge across the Rhine. There is no vestige at present of any such work. Not only this village, but most of those we had passed, were every mark of extreme poverty. The houses mean; most of them in a ruinous condition, and surrounded with filth; the women and children, who were the only persons seen, were ill clad and disgustingly dirty, with ill looking, vacant countenances, and as brown as Portuguese. At Urdingen the Rhine is crossed by a flying bridge.

Hitherto we had scarcely seen a vessel of any description navigating this fine river; and among those few which were here and there lying at anchor under its banks, we did not observe a single one that carried the Dutch flag. It was not clear whether this circumstance was owing to any impediments caused by the discussions carrying on with the "Etats Riverains," in consequence of the treaty of Vienna, or merely to the difficulties and disadvantages occurring in a river navigation, with a current of at least four miles an hour, and in some of the contracted parts, five. Even our steamer could not make good above five knots in the most favourable parts, frequently not above four, and sometimes only three, and was obliged to cross constantly from one side to the other to catch the eddy water. The recent rains had considerably swelled the river, and of course increased the strength of the current.

On approaching Dusseldorf, the first hills are seen to mark their appearance at a short distance behind it. We had heard much of the beauty and bustle which might be expected at this German city, once famed for its gallery of pictures, but that portion of it at least which borders on the river showed no symptoms of either; and as we were only to stop half an hour to take on board some passengers, we did not think it worth our while to land. A ruined castle and the tower of a church with its ugly spire, blazing with twelve gilded suns, were the only objects that attracted our attention.

From Dusseldorf to Neus the river winds in an extraordinary manner, on account of its having, at some time or other, forsaken its ancient bed, which, however, it is said to have done in the time of the Romans, when it flowed close to the walls of Neus, then called Novesium. This town stands at present at the distance of nearly two miles inland, so that nothing more of it than the lofty tower and the cupola of the church of St. Quirin can be seen from the river. On the top of the cupola is a full length colossal statue of the saint, which has a fine appearance even at this distance. It was at Neus that Drusus is reported to have thrown a bridge across the Rhine; and it was here that, in the year 1813, the allied armies effected their first passage across the river; and there is now, at the head of the reach before Neus, a flying bridge whose cable is moored at such a great distance up the stream, as to require eleven boats in a line to buoy it up.

No sooner had we passed the great bend in the river before Neus, than a range of fine blue hills showed themselves in the distance, and were seen to great advantage through a thin transparent ethereal mist, that happened just then to be spread over their sides, the exhalations probably from the late rains, which the sun was just then dispersing. After the eye had been accustomed so long, and so completely satiated, with looking on the everlasting deep green of the meadows, swamps, and dykes of Holland, and with the willows and rushes of the low banks of the Rhine, it was a great relief to survey the gentle acclivity which the face of the country now put on, commencing close to and ascending from the banks of the river. The rising grounds were covered with cornfields, copses, and plantations of wood, and backed by those distant hills, which were wearing so enchanting a hue.

Opposite to the Chateau of Denrath, the Rhine makes another extraordinary bend which opens out into one of the finest reaches we had yet seen of this great river. This chateau had all the appearance of being a good substantial house; it was backed by an extensive wood of beech trees, through which several avenues had either been cut, or the trees, as is most probable, had originally been planted in regular lines to form them. The grounds in front and on each side were in a high state of cultivation, and numerous peasantry of both sexes employed upon them. At the bottom, or, more correctly speaking, at the upper end of the reach stands the ancient town of Zons, exhibiting its two spires rising out of its two towers—the one square, the other round. From hence all this part of the grand Duchy of Berg, as far as the eye could take in the country, was backed by a long range of hills, well wooded in parts, and chequered with cornfields up to their very summits, so that the view was eminently beautiful.

On the left bank of the next reach of the Rhine is the town of Worringen, from whence the voyager obtains the first sight of the "Seven Mountains," rearing their blue heads just above the horizon.

Several villages now begin to appear in succession along both banks of the river, till we approach Rhynkassel, in the immediate neighbourhood of which the surface of the country appeared naked and sandy, but the river itself winded into a succession of broad reaches resembling so many lakes, especially that fine broad expanse of water, on the right margin of which the town of Wiesdorf is situated.

Here we first get sight of the city of Cologne, with its numerous spires and towers. Presently the town of Mülheim appears, situated on the right bank at the head of one of the finest reaches of the Rhine which we had yet passed. At this place, which is supposed to have been the capital of the Ubians, Caesar is said to have thrown a wooden bridge across the river. In fact, a wooden bridge still exists across the Rhine at this place, but it is only a flying bridge of the common kind. From this spot nothing can be conceived more striking and magnificent than the appearance of the city of Cologne, at the distance of three or four miles, situated at the head of a noble expanse of water, bordered by a rich and beautiful country on both of its margins. The ancient town of Deutz with its old Benedictine Abbey is immediately opposite to Cologne; and farther inland on the slope of the hills is beautifully situated the once splendid chateau of Bensberg, now stripped of all its magnificence, and converted, as we understood, into a hospital for the reception of lunatics.

We arrived at Cologne at eight o'clock in the evening, and took up our quarters at the Rhyenberg hotel, which stands on the margin of the river, and immediately before which the steamboat lands her passengers.

COLOGNE.

Cologne, Cöln, or as the Germans call it, Keulen, is a fine old city, and at one time one of the most wealthy and flourishing cities of Germany. It still retains, on the lower part of the town, or that which is washed by the river, more evident vestiges of Roman remains than any other spot perhaps on the banks of the Rhine. In a great part of the wall which extends along the river—in the Pflaßfort Gate, (the Porta Paphia or Flaminia of the Romans) on which appear the letters C.C.A.A. which the antiquarians interpret Colonia, Claudia, Agrippina, Augusta—in the Thürms or towers rising out of this wall—in the mount on which the ancient church of St. Mary stands, still called St. Mary on the Capitol;—but above all, in the numerous antiquities that have been, and continue to be, dug up, in the town and its environs, and which have recently been collected and arranged in two rooms of the museum;—in all these we have evidences as strong “as proofs from holy writ,” and almost as strong as Rome itself can boast, of the ancient Romans having had one of their fixed stations at Cologne. The numerous busts, the sarcophagi, the stones marked with the numbers of the legions stationed at this spot, form a most valuable collection for the historian, as elucidating the Roman establishments of their colonies in that part of Germany through which the Rhine flows.

Cologne was without doubt the Colonia Agrippina. It is said that the Emperor Constantine caused a stone bridge to be erected over the Rhine at Cologne, and that the foundations of the piers may still be seen when the water is low; all the guide-books say so and the inhabitants believe it, but no one that we fell in with was willing to own that he had seen them. We were twice at Cologne, but looked in vain for these piers, which after all may probably be nothing more than a ridge of rocks, visible only in a low state of the river.

Cologne is a large city, extending full two miles along the left bank of the Rhine, and about a mile inland, somewhat in the form of a crescent. It is said to contain from fifty to sixty thousand inhabitants, an estimate which, judging from the extent and large space of ground unoccupied with houses within the walls, would appear to be exaggerated. These open spaces consist of gardens and vineyards, one belonging to the convents, from which an indifferent kind of Rhenish wine is still made, being an indifferent kind on ascending the Rhine where the grape is cultivated for that purpose. These gardens, with the public squares, appear to occupy a considerable portion of the city, perhaps not less than one third part of it. Besides, a city crowded with churches, chapels, and convents, and swarming with young priests and ancient nuns, living in a state of celibacy, is not one in which one would look for a dense population. It is stated in one of the guide-books that, previous to the occupation of the town by the French, it contained not fewer than twelve thousand mendicants, who had each his particular station, which, on his death, he left as an inheritance to his children. ‘This tribe of beggars, with two thousand five hundred ecclesiastics and a proportionate number of nuns, must have composed nearly a third part of the whole population.

There are still left beggars enough, not only here, but, as we afterwards found, in every town and village we had to pass through, and also on the road, where every third or fourth foot passenger that we encountered, came running up to the carriage, holding his hat to the window, or poking it into the inside. Many young Germans having finished their education, or served their apprenticeships, and wishing to see the world, make no ceremony in asking alms to assist them on the road. This offensive and intrusive custom is more frequently practised, and thought less of, by decent and respectable people in appearance, in catholic countries, than in others where that religion does not prevail. At least it is so on the continent, where, in fact, they are regularly instructed in the practice of begging. The priests beg from the people, and the people from one another. In every church the brass box is carried round with a rattling of its copper pieces to attract the attention of the auditory. Other boxes are set up with slits in their lids, to receive whatever the “charitable and the humane” may please to put into them; and on particular feast days, as we witnessed in Cologne, the shops are converted into chapels, and the figures of Christ and the Virgin Mary exhibited with open doors, in order to collect money; and decent looking boys and girls mix among passengers in the street, urging them to give money. In the church at high mass, the old women, who generally compose two thirds of the congregation, will drop their beads and stop in the midst of a prayer to ask a stranger for charity.

The city of Cologne with its churches, chapels, and convents, and its eighty-three towers and thirteen grand gates, which M. Schreiber has assigned to it, has certainly a very imposing aspect from the river. Some of the churches will amply repay the traveller for any spare time he may have to bestow on them, particularly that unfinished mass of building, called the Dom Church, which even in its present state is one of the finest monuments of Gothic architecture, and if ever it should be finished according to the original design, which is not very probable, would perhaps be the very finest specimen of this kind in all Europe. Looking at it externally, we observe over the tops of the houses that are clustered round it, a large mass of building, terminated by a high roof, surrounded by turrets and pinnacles, rising out of the most beautiful walls of florid Gothic, richly fluted and fretted, in which are numerous windows of stupendous height and dimensions.

This, which is the only finished part, is the choir, and at an immense distance from it, and apparently disconnected, the unfinished walls being concealed by lofty houses built close up to them, is seen a beautiful and magnificent but also unfinished tower of the same rich and florid Gothic, rising to the height of about two hundred feet, which is very little more apparently than the height of the choir. On the summit of this tower is an iron crane of very large dimensions, which was used for raising the stones; and as the progress of this noble building is said to have been put a stop to in 1499, and no attempt made since that period to finish it, this crane must have stood with its arm suspended in the air, a remarkable and conspicuous object, ever since—whether it was left by accident after the scaffolding had been removed, or by design, which is most probable, to impress on the beholder that the intention of finishing the building was not abandoned, is now useless to enquire; but we can safely say it is very improbable that another munificent personage—to carry it out, on his private fortune—will readily be found. It is remarkable enough that the name of the architect of this splendid building should remain unknown, but the original design is ascribed to the Archbishop Engelbert de Berg, whose successor commenced it in 1248.

A sister tower, with a grand entrance between the two, is raised only to the height of twenty to thirty feet. By the original plan these two towers were intended to rise to the stupendous height of five hundred feet, which appears to be about the length of the nave and choir.

There is enough of the interior to show what the arrangements were intended to be. The columns that were to support the roofs were all up, amounting, as is said, to one hundred. They are of an immense size, but at present support nothing, the only ceiling being a temporary flooring of planks; and the great nave is entirely shut up. The service is performed in the choir, which is approached along the left side aisle, and these are the only two parts that are left open; and the only finished part is the choir, and the chapels which surround it. The altar is very fine, but not exactly corresponding with the lofty Gothic style of the windows, columns, and roof. It is a Grecian temple on an octagon form, with eight Ionic columns. On one side of it is the figure of the Virgin Mary with her child, and St. Peter with his keys on the other, two tolerably good statues in white marble. In the choir are two tombs of two archbishops of Cologne, Antony and Adolphus Schauenbourg, surmounted with two figures of white marble, which appeared to be well executed. By the side of the columns are figures of the apostles.

Behind the choir is the shrine of the three kings or magi, said to have been removed from Milan to Cologne in the year 1170, by the Emperor Frederic I., surnamed Barbarossa. Their names are Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthasar. The three skulls, which are all that remain of them, are said to have had crowns of gold ornamented with all manner of precious stones, which were lost or stolen when these highly esteemed relicts were carried off, in 1794, by the grand chapters of Cologne, who fled with them to Aremberg, to escape the rapacity of the French. They were returned in 1804, but, as the Swiss in which they were sent away, and he hinted, what was not necessary, that they were now only paste or glass, insinuating at the same time that the French had stolen the real ones, though in point of fact they were never within reach of the French.

The next church we visited was that of St. Peter, in which there is nothing remarkable either as to the architecture or decoration. Above the grand altar, however, is a picture of Rubens, which is considered to rank among his best; though neither the subject nor the mode in which it is treated is calculated to give pleasure, but very much the contrary, to excite a painful sensation. It is the crucifixion of St. Peter with the head downwards, and the executioners straining their muscles and distorting their features in hoisting him up. The French carried it off and placed it in the museum of Paris, but were obliged to restore it at the end of the war.

St. Mary's is a fine old church, standing on a hill, to which we ascended by a flight of steps. On this hill it is supposed, as we have already observed, that the Roman capitol stood. There was no want of pictures in the choir, and on the side walls, but as we only saw it during service, and the church was full, we could not distinguish what the subjects were, or who were the artists. The church of the Apostles is a plain building, standing at the head of the largest of the five or six squares of the town. This square is planted round with trees, which afford a shady walk, and the centre is sufficiently large to allow of a parade, on which they mount guard every morning, and is capable of admitting from three to four thousand soldiers to be manoeuvred. The number of troops in Cologne was said to amount to about two thousand four hundred, who looked remarkably smart with their white belts over their blue uniforms turned back with red, and closely buttoned up to the throat. The Prussian officers, not only here, but in all the garrison towns, mix much in society, generally dine at the tables d'hot, and are much respected as a body of well behaved, gentlemanly men.

From the churches we paid a visit to the Stadhuis, or hotel de ville, which is a very curious old edifice. The portico consists of a double arcade of heavy Gothic arches, with Ionic columns of marble between them. On the entablature between the two tiers of arches are six long inscriptions, much defaced, and not easily legible on this account, as well as from their height. One of them we could make out to be in the Latin language, and inscribed apparently to one of the Cæsars. It related to something which concerned the Ubii; perhaps a brief history of the colonisation of these people, who emigrated from the eastern or German side of the Rhine, and settled at Cologne under Claudius Cæsar, who, in compliment to his wife, called it Colonia Agrippina. In the second frieze, between the two tiers of columns, is a bas-relief representing, apparently, Hercules strangling the lion.

Observing near this spot a great concourse of people entering the doors of an old building in the same enclosure, we found that it contained a collection of paintings and Roman antiquities; in short, that it was a museum recently established. It consisted of six or seven rooms, the walls of which were well covered with a very extensive collection of pictures, mostly by old masters of the German school, many of them as far back as the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and confined chiefly to sacred subjects; holy families, and other sacred personages, with the golden circle, or glory, as it is called, round their heads. There were besides a great collection of old portraits, and a few modern pictures; but there was then no catalogue, and from the general antiquity of the paintings, it probably would be no easy matter to prepare one.

The streets of Cologne are in so bad a state, that they would appear not to have been paved for a century; and what is equally bad, they are seldom, if ever, swept, or in any way cleaned. In the lower or most ancient part of the town, along the bank of the river, where the streets are exceedingly narrow and the houses lofty, the filth makes them almost impassable, and the stench highly offensive. The only scouring they get is from the torrents of rain falling from long spouts, which almost every house has projecting from the roof in the shape of dragons, snakes, and dolphins.

It may be doubted whether if the fifty or sixty thousand bottles of eau de Cologne, supposed to be manufactured here annually, were sprinkled over these streets, they would be thereby rendered sweet: perhaps, indeed, the liquid would only make them more offensive; for it appeared to us, when crossing in a steamboat (from Ostend), that a shower of rain drove below some ninety or a hundred passengers, whose wet cloaks and coats, with the heat from the engines and the smell of fried oil, caused so moist, musty, and fetid an atmosphere, that the steward thought he could not do better, by way of correcting it, than to sprinkle a couple of bottles of eau de Cologne; but this increased instead of abating the nuisance, and made the stench intolerable.

Cologne has been called “the dirtiest and most gloomy city of its size in Europe,” and “the people as motley and miserable as the buildings." This is somewhat overcharged; for, in the higher part of the town, the streets are much wider and in better order, and as the Sunday we spent at Cologne was a fête day of some kind or other, we observed all the streets in that neighbourhood thickly strewn with oak leaves, from baskets carried by several hundred boys and girls, who had been attending divine service at St. Peter's church. In the same streets, also, we observed before the open windows and doors of several houses, small altars with Christ on the cross, and the Virgin decorated with flowers, and coloured glass beads, the object of which was to collect a few cents or groschen from the poor.

We could not but remark that we never saw the churches so well attended in the whole course of our tour as those of Cologne: that immense building the Dom church was so crowded at the evening service, that it was almost impossible to squeeze in, but the attraction was a popular preacher, an elderly man, who was very energetic and animated; but it did not appear to us that either his enunciation or his action had any pretence to be considered as graceful.

At high mass on the Sunday morning, both at St. Peter's and St. Mary's, which we attended, the great majority of the audience consisted of females. In the forenoon the ordinary occupations seemed to be followed as on other days, and I found no difficulty in getting money at the bankers to enable us to proceed the following morning.

In the evening the bridge of boats, that connects Cologne with the small town of Deutz, directly opposite to it, was crowded with well dressed people of both sexes, this being, it seems, the favourite promenade in the summer evenings. A small toll of about a half penny is exacted at the entrance every time that a person passes. The company is not often disturbed by the opening of a passage to let vessels through, the trade apparently not being very active. Vessels lie on both sides the bridge, but mostly above it; their number might be from twenty to thirty, mostly of the long narrow class peculiar to the Rhine, and the lading appeared chiefly to be coals.

Cologne was once famous for its manufactures of cloth, but the wise magistrates of this city had the folly, on some riotous conduct of the weavers, to cause near two thousand looms to be burnt, the consequence of which was that the owners of them quitted the city, and carried on their trade in others, where a wiser policy existed. They also in the year 1616, in a fit of religious animosity, expelled every protestant from Cologne, though the persons of this community were the best and most industrious of their artisans.

They have still some trifling manufactories of cottons, of a coarse kind, and silks, of knit stockings, caps and gloves, of snuff, from one of which establishments we observed not less than four or five hundred men returning from their daily labour. The manufacture of eau de Cologne employs a considerable number of persons, and is said to produce a revenue of three to four hundred thousand francs. That brown pigment known to artists under the name of burnt Umber or Cologne earth, is prepared here from a species of earthy coal dug out of the mountains between Coblenz and Cologne.

CHAPTER VII.

FROM COLOGNE TO COBLENTZ.

Having satisfied our curiosity as to all that Cologne was likely to afford for our information or amusement, we hired a caleche and pair to take us as far as Frankfurt, from whence it had come the day before with a party. Our agreement was that we should stop at such places on the route as we might think fit, but not to exceed for the whole journey three days; and for this journey, which is at least one hundred and ten miles, we were to pay fifty-six florins, or fl. 13s. 4d. sterling, a sum that will not be deemed extravagant for the conveyance of seven persons and their baggage. This caleche is the kind of carriage most commonly in use along the Rhine, and indeed all over the Netherlands; it is not quite so commodious as the Dutch car-a-banc, but we contrived without inconvenience to stow six in the inside, all our baggage, part of which was placed in a large round basket under the seat of the driver, and the trunks were strapped on behind. The servant took his seat along with the driver.

On the 18th, at eight in the morning, we left Cologne, and arrived at Bonn about ten; the intermediate country well cultivated, but the surface rather flat, and devoid of much interest. The hills on our right, and those beyond the Rhine on the left, had now receded to a considerable distance.

It happened to be market day at Bonn, and the square in which it was held exhibited a novel and curious appearance in the assembled groups. In the centre of this square and down the whole length were about two hundred women drawn up in a long line of two deep, each having a clean white handkerchief neatly folded round the head. The chief articles of sale, which were carefully arranged in the middle space between the two lines, were greens and fruit of various kinds, bread, butter, and eggs. There was no noise nor tumult, and we could not but contrast the order and decorum that were here observed with what is usually seen in an English market, more especially in such a one as Covent Garden, where it would be no easy matter to oblige two hundred women to keep silence.

In the centre of the market-place is a pyramid and fountain, and the townhouse stands at the head of the square. It is supposed that the Roman general Drusus Germanicus threw a bridge over the Rhine at Bonn, but, in returning by water, we could not see any vestige of it. The neighbourhood of Bonn, however, is full of Roman antiquities, and many private collections of them are said to have been made there.

This city has recently revived one of those German Universities, where young men, like the polytechniques of Paris, fancy themselves to know more than their teachers, laugh at religion, set at defiance all authority, behave with insolence to their fellow citizens, lose all sense of decency, and muddle away their time in drinking-beer and smoking tobacco. They are, in fact, the fruitful nurseries of immorality, sedition and licentiousness. That of Bonn perhaps may be said to be as yet in a state of youthful innocence; and it was probably under this idea, and the influence of such names as those of Niebuhr and Schlegel, that had induced several English families to take up a residence at Bonn, for the benefit of their children's education, mostly however, as we understood, for the instruction of the female part in music, which is here much cultivated. The celebrated Beethoven and also Salmon received their musical education at Bonn. The population is estimated at about ten thousand, and a considerable portion is occupied in the manufacture of cottons and coarse cloths, alam and snuff.

The range of hills from Godesberg are seen to continue as far as that of Rolandsee, whose steep side descends to the very brink of the Rhine; and, on the opposite side of the river, the base of the "castled crag of Drakenfels," the first or northernmost of the Siebenbergen, or Seven Mountains, comes down close to the water's edge, in defiance as it were of its opposite neighbour. These two mountains of Rolandsee and Drakenfels form the grand portal or entrance into a deep, dark, and gloomy ravine, through which the contracted Rhine is seen to force its volume of water with an accelerated current.

When no longer hemmed in between the dark and glowing sides of the narrow portal or defile, its tranquil and expansive surface is interrupted only by two beautiful islands, the larger of which is called Rolandswerth, or Nonnenwerth, the Island of the Nuns, so named from a celebrated convent erected on the island. A few of the nuns were still left when the empress Josephine visited this spot; and their situation, and the beauty of the islands, interested so much that humane and kind hearted woman, that by her influence she saved the convent from suppression. The nuns, however, were now all gone, but the convent was yet remaining, being converted, at considerable expense, into an inn or hotel; a speculation which, it seems, had not answered the expectations of the proprietor, who was endeavouring to dispose of the whole island of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty acres, by lottery, in which, we were told, several of our countrymen in passing had taken tickets, "being so near to England." Unquestionably the island of Nonnenwerth would form one of the most delightful summer retreats that could be desired; and as to its nearness to England, it may not, perhaps, occur to an Englishman, that the distance from London to Nonnenwerth is several miles less than from London to Edinburgh. But this may easily be seen by placing one foot of a pair of compasses on a map of Europe, on London, and the other on Edinburgh, when Nonnenwerth will be found to fall within the circle described by them. It is not surprising, therefore, that English adventurers should start for a prize that would give them possession of so lovely a spot. As an inn, it was objectionable on account of the trouble of crossing the water, and the less likely to succeed, from there being by the road side, directly opposite to it, a tolerably good and long established house.

The nunnery and Rolandsee, so near to each other, could not fail to give rise to some romantic tale, in a country where romance has always been highly cherished; and accordingly Schiller has composed a ballad of Roland and his mistress, but shifted the scene into Switzerland. Tradition says that Roland, the nephew of Charlemagne, caused the present ruined castle of Rolandsee to be built, in order to be near his mistress, who had become a nun at the convent of Nonnenwerth.

Legends of this kind, whether founded or not, impart an additional interest to the romantic scenery of this and other parts of the Rhine; and they are so abundant, that almost every one of the numerous old castles has its legend of dragons and devils overcome, and ravished virgins rescued, by monks and Christian knights.

The other little island contiguous to Nonnenwerth is called Grafenwerth, which, with the former, divide the Rhine into three parts, forming three rapid streams; and these being somewhat dangerous, are called by the boatmen "God's help."

The boatmen of the Rhine, in fact, require help, even where there is little or no danger; they are the most clumsy and inept watermen, in the management of small craft, that can well be imagined.

Having passed these islands, we again witness the Rhine spreading out into a broad, expansive lake, its margins covered with numerous villages, those on the right bank being inhabited chiefly by men who work the quarries for slate and building stones. The level pieces of ground, next to the river, are exceedingly well and neatly cultivated with grain and vegetables, interspersed with orchards of fruit trees, apples, pears, cherries, and walnuts; and the sloping sides of the hills are covered with vineyards; and above these the higher parts are clothed with forest trees or coppice wood to their very summits.

Along both shores of this part of the Rhine, village after village succeed each other at short intervals; but at the upper end of the present reach, where the town of Unkel is situated on the right bank, and Oberwinter on the left, the mountains again begin to close and to put on a more rugged and picturesque appearance.

The mountains in this neighbourhood are composed chiefly of black basalt and argillaceous slate, with which almost all the houses of the towns and villages in the long defile of the Rhine are built and covered in; and with the former the streets are, for the most part, rudely paved. Vines are planted along the steep sides of the mountains on every little spot, however small, where any soil can be obtained.

After clearing the narrow pass of Andernach, the neat town of Neuwied, with its little blue slated roofs and white chimneys, appears at a distance on the opposite side of the river, the very picture of neatness and uniformity.

A little further on, we passed the small village of Weisserthurn, the white tower, a building apparently of no very remote antiquity, which stands near the end of the village. Close to this spot, on the right of the road, just above an orchard, an obelisk has been erected to the memory of General Hoche, with this simple inscription:

"The army of the Sambre and Meuse,
To its Commander in Chief,
Hoche."

The French under this general crossed the Rhine at this place two or three times—the last on the 15th of April, 1797, immediately opposite to this village. An island in the middle of the Rhine, of which he first took possession, gave great facility in accomplishing the passage. It is also at this very spot that Cæsar is supposed to have crossed the Rhine.

Beyond this island, the river is again seen to spread out its waters, and the hills on the left bank to recede, leaving between them and the Rhine a well cultivated valley or plain, over which are scattered numerous villas, with extensive gardens and pleasure grounds, with fruit trees in the greatest abundance; and the road passes over this description of country at such a distance from the river as to conceal it from the sight; and it is only again approached on arriving at a large stone bridge thrown across the river Moselle, and whose tete-d-pont, at the opposite end, is the wall and gate of Coblenz. On the left of the road at a little distance from this city, and on the tongue of land which separates the Rhine from the Moselle, is the monument erected to the memory of the French general Marceau, who, at the age of twenty-six, and in the fourth year of the Republic, perished near Altenkirchen, by a rifle ball, while attempting to intercept the retreat of Jourdan. It is a truncated pyramid, on the four faces of which are long inscriptions in French, recording briefly the history of his military career. "Qui que tu sois," says one of them, "ami ou ennemi de ce jeune héros, respecte ses cendres." They were so re spected; for his funeral was attended by the officers of the Austrian as well as the French army.

"Brief, brave, and glorious, was his young career;
His hour was won by two hosts, his friends and foes;
And duly was the stranger, huzing no more,
Pray for his gallant spirit's bright repose."

The bones of Hoche, whose monument, as before mentioned, is at Wiesser-thurm, are said also to be buried here.

The city of Coblenz takes its name from the position it occupies on the point of land, formed between the Rhine and the Moselle, — Confluentia. Its shape is triangular, one side extending along the Moselle, the other along the Rhine, and the third side inland stretches between the two rivers. On the opposite side of the Rhine, is the celebrated fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, "the Broad Stone of Honour," which is seen to frown over the small town of Thal, at its feet. The river is here crossed by a noble bridge of boats, which connects this fortress and town with Coblenz. The French, who destroyed every thing they could not keep, blew up the ancient works of Ehrenbreitstein, at the truce of Leoben; and thus the poet has truly observed—

"Peace destroyed what war could never build."

The ruins of the ancient castles and towers, mixed with the rugged and shapeless crags, are said to have given to the commanding mountain of Ehrenbreitstein a grand and imposing appearance from the opposite quay of Coblenz, but his Prussian majesty has thought fit to renew the fortifications, according to the modern picturesque plan of military works of this kind. In fact, the rugged summit of the rock has been smoothed down and levelled, and is now covered to an immense extent with bastions and batteries, with ramparts and round towers, which, but to look at from the opposite bank of the river, are enough to make a peaceable man tremble. These batteries, however, stiff and formal as they are, with the bridge of boats thrown across the Rhine, at one of its noblest reaches, gently flowing between its beautiful banks, the massive stone bridge which crosses the Moselle and forms a tete-du-pont to Coblenz, and the numerous towers and spires which rise above the walls and buildings of that city, compose one of the most magnificent views that the imagination can conceive, when seen, as we had the opportunity of doing on our return, from the middle of the Rhine about half a mile above the bridge of boats. Coblenz, however, is the last place that a peaceable man would choose to dwell in. Strongly fortified on every side, it would probably stand the siege of an enemy for many months; and if at last got possession of, the tremendous fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, if opposed to the invaders, as would most likely be the case, would speedily batter down the city of Coblenz with its cannon, and with destructive shells lay it in ashes.

The distance from Cologne to Coblenz is about fifty-two miles, which we accomplished in eleven hours, with the same pair of horses that, as already observed, had arrived at Cologne only the evening before, from Frankfurt. The day was closing in when we entered the town; and as we left it early the following morning, we saw but little of its interior. Our hotel was the Drie, Switzers, situated on the rampart, close to the river, in the neighbourhood of which every thing seemed to partake of the military character. It was the same from our first entry at the tete-du-pont, through all the streets, down to the brink of the river—nothing but soldiers, horse and foot, were parading the streets, and on leaving we observed the engineers busily employed in strengthening the old works inland and adding new ones; so anxious does his Prussian majesty appear to make any hostile passage of the Rhine, at this place, next to impossible, or at least not very practicable by a coup de main.

CHAPTER VIII.

COBLENZ TO FRANKFORT, AND BACK TO AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

On the morning of the 19th we proceeded from Coblenz through a pleasant country, but without any strongly marked features; the villages and scattered houses mostly surrounded by vineyards and orchards; the mountains receding on both sides of the Rhine, more tame than those below Coblenz, and well clothed to their summits with dense woods.

On proceeding along the left bank, we pass through the small town of Rheine. The Rhine here is of great breadth, and takes an immense sweep to the left, and in the deep bend is seen the village of Neuderspey, after which, on turning again to the right, we have the villages of Mittelspey and Peterspey, situated in the midst of rich meadows and orchards, above which, on the rising grounds, are extensive vineyards; while the opposite mountains on the right bank are wild and rugged; the villages at their feet men in appearance; the few inhabitants who showed themselves wearing, in their dress and appearance, the marks of great poverty. At Boppard the Rhine resumes its former direction.

Boppard is a very curious old town, built on the ruins of ancient forts and palaces, erected in the days of the Romans and the Franks. Some old convents have been converted into more useful purposes than their original intent,—manufactories of cloth and cotton. The church is apparently not less ancient or curious in its Gothic structure, and its octagonal spires, than the convents. The houses appear to be built mostly of wooden beams, arranged in various directions, and the spaces between them filled up with lath and clay; the streets are narrow; and as the second and upper stories project beyond the ground story, the opposite neighbours might almost shake hands out of their gable ends. The wood work is generally painted black, and sometimes carved and twisted into a variety of shapes. It is almost unnecessary to add, that the streets are ill-paved, and miserably dirty; but this is not peculiar to Boppard, being the common characteristic of every Catholic town along the banks of the Rhine. Indeed it may be mentioned, as a general observation, that although the road which skirts the left bank of the Rhine from Coblenz to Bingen is one of the most level and beautiful, perhaps, in all Europe, the moment it comes within the verge of a town or village, it seems to be infected with the prevailing malady, and ceases to deserve any commendation.

This fine road is, by common accord, ascribed to the labour of the French army while it held possession of the country.

From Boppard to Salzig the mountains recede from the river, and the intermediate space is composed of meadows, neat cottages surrounded with gardens and orchards, in which are planted innumerable quantities of cherry trees, while walnut and ash trees, mingled together, mantle up the sides of the mountains and the ravines to their very summits. The Rhine here assumes the appearance of a vast lake, on the opposite or right bank of which are the ruins of the two castles, usually called the Two Brothers, of Liebenstein and Sternfels, concerning whom there is a legendary tale, which, by a little ingenuity and dramatic tact, might be made acceptable to a modern audience at one of the minor theatres.

We now approach a very romantic part of the river, and perceive at a distance the extensive ruins of Reinfels, and the ancient town of St. Goar, situated immediately below them. From this part of the river is opened out one of the most wild and rugged views of mountain scenery that had yet appeared; the sides of the mountains looking like two black, gigantic walls; the river, from a noble expanse, becoming at once narrow, deep, and rapid, and the navigation not by any means free from danger. The ruined fortress of Reinfels is pleasingly picturesque, and the most imposing of any of the ruined castles we had yet seen.

The town of St. Goar, like all those we have yet seen on the banks of this noble river, has but little to recommend it. The houses are mostly, like those of Boppard, in a wretched state of ruin, built of wood and clay, and the upper parts of them overhanging a narrow street, dirty and ill-paved; and we observed that the interior of many of them, which had the doors open, was equally dirty, and almost wholly destitute of furniture. The few inhabitants we saw were mostly women, ragged and squalid,—their yellow faces, black hair, and coloured napkins tied round their heads, gave them very much the appearance of the lowest class of Malays, as we see them in prints, or the lowest among the gypsy tribes.

We had here a specimen of the laziness of the men, which, being the common practice in all that part of the Prussian dominions through which we passed, had frequently attracted our notice. The toll bar is a long pole, turning on a swivel, between two posts fixed in the ground, on the side of the road opposite to the toll-house, and is weighed down by a heavy stone fixed on the shorter end, so as to keep it always open in the day time. It is invariably painted blue and yellow, in a spiral line, like our barber's pole. The driver never thinks of passing one of these toll bars without stopping, as he would otherwise be liable to a penalty. The collector, however, will rarely take the trouble to come out of the house to receive the toll, but puts out of the window a little purse, at the end of a long stick, for the money; and if a ticket be necessary, he returns it in a slit at the end of the same stick.

On the opposite side of the river is another small town called Goarhausen, directly over which is seen the old castle of Katz, or, as it is sometimes called, Neukatzencleubogen. Mr. Schrieber says, this castle saluted Napoleon one day, which frightened his horse, and he gave immediate orders for its demolition.

It is at the foot of this Katzberg that the rugged and gloomy contraction of the river commences, of which we have just spoken. On entering the ravine, the first object that attracts the notice of the passenger is a naked mass of black rock, singularly curious, whose strata appear to have been thrown up and disrupted, and the great basaltic tablets and columns piled on each other in hideous disorder. This is the celebrated Lurleyberg, or repeating mountain, so called from an echo which, in certain positions, is said to repeat a voice or noise four or five times. This circumstance, together with the turbulent Rhine taking a sudden turn and foaming round its base, have given rise to a legend ten times told, and in ten different ways, about a water nymph and a prince, palatine, which every travellerashes up in a way that he supposes may be most palatable to his readers. This Ordine is said by some to have been mischievous, and that she used to charm the boatmen with her syren voice, and thus contrived to draw them into the whirlpool close to the rock.

We now approach Oberwesel, on the left bank, an old and impoverished town, with a remarkably fine Gothic church. Near the entrance of the town is a chapel, which, we are told by the guide books, was erected as a monument to the memory of a boy, named Werner, who had been stolen from his parents by the Jews, and murdered by them;—why, it is not said,—but the event is supposed to have happened in the year 1287.

The position of this town amid lofty and rugged mountains, and abounding with shattered towers and crumbling walls inclosing it, and in which are the remains of ten or twelve of the former still standing, and the distant fine scenery, viewed over the silvery surface of the Rhine, give to Oberwesel a more romantic character than almost any other spot.

A little beyond Oberwesel is the ruined castle of Schoenberg, perched on the summit of a lofty and picturesque rock, once the property of the family of that name, some of the descendants of whom are still in England, but write their name Schonberg.

Another ruined castle is now visible on a lofty peak called Stalblock; and in the midst of the Rhine stands the castle of Pfalz, built on a rock.

Opposite to this insulated castle, which is still in good repair, and on the right bank, is the town of Kaub, immediately under the ruined castle of Gutenfels, situated on the peak of a lofty rock. Kaub is celebrated by the passage of the army of Marshal Blucher across the Rhine at this spot, on the 1st of January, 1814. A little farther on, and on the left bank, stands the old town of Bacharach, situated at the foot of one of the loftiest points of the range of mountains, which is nevertheless, covered with forest trees to the very summit. Above the town, and on the side of the hill, is a ruined old church or chapel, dedicated to a saint of the name of Werner, built of red sandstone, and one of the finest specimens of florid Gothic architecture that we had seen on the banks of the Rhine. This chapel was dedicated to the boy, whom we have mentioned as being murdered by the Jews, and whose body floated against the stream as far as Bacharach;—a miracle that was highly deserving of being commemorated by a chapel.

Bacharach is a poor town, and in a more dilapidated state than any we had yet passed through. The houses, as usual, almost meet each other at the top; the streets, of course, are dark and dirty, and extreme poverty seems to be the lot of the majority of the inhabitants. Here, indeed, the Rhine is so closely hemmed in by steep mountains, as to admit of no other produce than what the vineyards afford, which may, perhaps, account for the Romans having considered Bacchus as the presiding deity of the place. In fact, the principal part of the food of the people, through the whole of the long ravine from Boppard to Bacharach, and as far as Bingen, must be brought to them from a distance, as, from the scarcity of land, wine and fruit are the only articles capable of being cultivated; and how the vineyards which we here see can possibly pay the labour of cultivation is quite a mystery. There is scarcely a patch of half an acre in any one continued space; mostly, not half a rood. Every little sheltered spot, however small, that possesses the least soil,—every little crevice between the naked rocks,—is choked up with vines; in many places the vine is planted in a basket, with adventitious soil, and sunk in the rocky fragments by the side of the hill. The care and the labour bestowed, though not toilsome, is constant; and the distance is frequently several miles which the poor cultivator has to go from his habitation to his vineyard,—we should rather say hers; for they appear to be chiefly women, who bear but very little resemblance to those fair and sylph-like damsels, with which painters are in the habit of peopling their vineyards, when assembled to gather the purple grape. A jacket and petticoat,—a dirty handkerchief tied round the head,—the legs and feet naked,—the features dark, dull, and unmeaning,—furnish the true picture of a female labourer of a Rhinish vineyard; and this was so generally the prevailing feature of the picture, in all places where the chief produce was wine, that we may, almost with certainty, come to the conclusion, that the culture of the vine is an indication of the poverty of those who perform the manual labour, however profitable it may be to the large proprietor.

From Bacharach to Bingen, and from thence to Mentz, or Mayence, the channel of the Rhine changes from the direction of north and south to that of east and west, in consequence of which the vineyards are chiefly confined to the right bank facing the south; and it is here that the vineyards of Asmanshausen, Ehrenfels, Rudesheim, Geisenheim, and Johannisberg, occur in succession.

Between Asmanshausen and Ehrenfels, the steep sides of the mountain, to the height of at least a thousand feet, are covered with vines, growing entirely on terraces, one rising above another to the very summit, the earth on which is kept up by well built stone walls, of five to eight feet in height; yet many of these terraces are not twice the breadth of the height of the walls that support them. Nearly opposite Bingen, and about Ehrenfels, we counted not less than twenty-two of these terraces, rising one above the other. It is remarkable enough that these fine walls, facing the south, are left naked, though they appear to be so admirably calculated for the vines to be led against their sides, and thereby not only to yield a larger crop of grapes, but to hasten their maturity; but this may, perhaps, be the very reason why they should not be so trained, as the vintage would fall at unequal times; or, as the walls are purposely built loose and without mortar, that the water may the more readily be drained off, such draining might probably injure the vine if trained against them; or, which is still more probable, the lack of soil would not admit of training the vines without injuring the standards in the terraces.

In proceeding from Bacharach, we first meet with the old ruined castle of Fürstenberg, then Soneck, then Bausberg, and after that Falkenberg. This last was under repair, as we were told, for the residence of one of the young princes of Prussia, where his royal highness would find himself perched aloft in the air, like an eagle on his acerie. The castle literally occupies the whole summit of the high pointed rock, which it will require some ingenuity to render accessible, even on foot, as the rock is precipitous on every side. This extraordinary habitation may truly be said, like Nick Bottom's tragedy, "to stand on the very pinnacle of its foundation."

On turning round to Bingerlock, as it is called, where the Rhine is more turbulent and more dangerous even than at its passage round the Lurdeyberg, we pass the great southern portal of the ravine, and behold at once the mountains to diminish in height, and to recede to a considerable distance from the river; and the little town of Bingen, placed on an eminence amidst an immense extent of vineyards, opens out, standing conspicuous in the beautiful landscape which now presents itself. The last mountain that closes this ravine is that of Rudesheim, with its terraces of vineyards creeping up its steep sides to the number of eighteen or twenty; the summit crowned with an old ruin, to which, as a matter of course, is attached a traditional legend, in which a dragon and a virgin are the chief dramatis personæ.

The romantic portion of the Rhine is that between Boppard and Bingen, in which the several reaches of the river form a constant succession of lakes, accompanied by the most enchanting and diversified scenery, encircled by a chain of the most picturesque mountains, some clothed with wood, others naked, black, and frowning with rocks, rearing their pinnacled heads under every fantastic shape, and scarcely distinguishable from the ruined remains of forts and castles, which are seen crowning their rugged summits, themselves "shaped as they had turrets been, in mockery of man's art;" while the narrow spaces between their feet and the margin of the lakes are smiling with cultivation, and enlivened with towns and villages in the midst of vineyards. Here, in short, is

On clearing the ravine, however, the scene was entirely changed, and the eye had now full scope to range round the whole of the southern, eastern, and western horizons. The sun was just setting as we left the dark and gloomy gulf, and its western rays, falling on the little town of Bingen, and the vine-clad side of the opposite mountain, afforded a contrast equally striking and agreeable. The broad expansive Rhine glistened in the sun beams, as its ample volume flowed majestically towards us, interrupted only by the Maus-thurm, or, as travellers interpret it, the tower of rats, which is built on a rock in the middle of the river, and by dividing the current, adds to the velocity and the noise of the Bingerlock, which is considered to be dangerous to navigation.

The endless succession of ancient dilapidated castles is generally spoken of by travellers with a degree of rapture in which some of us did not exactly partake. The eternal round tower, or stone cylinder, which always accompanies, and is always left standing amidst the castellated ruins, and that alone sometimes remaining, is the very reverse of picturesque. There is besides a moral feeling attached to them, that is apt to carry the recollection back to those days of feudal tenure, when murder and robbery were hardly considered as crimes; and when many an unhappy victim lingered out a miserable existence in the cells and dungeons of these ancient ruins, which still remain as memorials of the villainous scenes that have been transacted within their walls. A French writer thinks otherwise; he tells us how delightful he feels in transporting himself in imagination to those remote ages of ancient chivalry—those ages, as he calls them, of valour and virtue—in imagining himself to be surrounded by those preux chevaliers, the protectors of weakness, the defenders of a sex which in those days knew no other ornament but delicacy and gentility. Perhaps he would have been nearer the truth if, instead of preux chevaliers, he had painted these castles to his mind as the retreats of hands of brigands. Lord Byron, we suspect, has taken a juster view of them.

"Beneath those battlements, within those walls Power dwelt amidst her passions; in proud state
Each robber chief aimed his armed hall,
Doing his evil will, not less care
Than mighty heroes of a longy date."

As we were here to quit the Rhine, a word or two may be added on the general character of this interesting river. We frequently find the epithet "magnificent" coupled with the Rhine. To speak correctly, it is not sufficiently capacious to justify the application of that term; but to the eye of the traveller it possesses charms, abundantly superior to those rivers that are so truly magnificent, that one shore is frequently invisible from the other. The Rhine includes within its banks sublimity and beauty, softness and amenity. In gliding down the stream the eye embraces all these at a glance, and riots in endless variety,—the rugged and fantastic forms displayed by naked mountain tops, lying in picturesque with some ancient and ruined castle—the overhanging forest—the sombre crag mingled with the verdant vine—the neatly cultivated plain—the clustered town with its turreted towers and spires—the sequestered village, and the lonely cottage—the beautiful island, and the constant succession of new objects, and a new disposition of them,—these are the features ever varied that constitute the beauty, and afford that delight, which travellers rarely fail to derive from an excursion on or along the banks of the Rhine.

The town of Bingen is situated at the confluence of the Nahe with the Rhine, and is approached from the north by a stone bridge over the former, said to have been built, or its remaining piers at least built, in the time of Drusus. The situation is beautiful, and there was an appearance of industry and bustle which we had not witnessed since our departure from Amsterdam. A number of vessels were lying alongside the quay, and in every street were coopers, house carpenters, and masons, working at their several trades; the first preparing their large pipes for the approaching vintage, and the others on new houses building, and old ones repairing. Extensive floats of timber were lying along the quay and the shore, and about a dozen of those remarkably long and narrow vessels that navigate the Rhine were at anchor, having each a house on the deck, in which the owner or navigator with his whole family dwells. We remained for the night at the hotel of the White Horse, a good comfortable house, with a little garden by the river side, the people civil, and the charges remarkably reasonable. There is not much to be seen in the town.

On the morning of the 20th we proceeded on our route, which no longer skirts the margin of the Rhine, but passes in a direct line inland, and up a gentle ascent through the midst of highly cultivated vineyards, far different, in size and luxuriance, from those small patches on the mountain slopes of the great ravine of the Rhine.

Neider Engelheim was the favourite residence of Charlemagne, where, it is said, he built a palace surrounded by a portico of a hundred columns, brought from Rome and Ravenna. We observed some ruins, but they might have been a church, a castle, or a palace, but looked more like an old barn than any of them. On the highest point of this elevated country, in a small copse on the right of the road, stands an obelisk, on the front of which is this inscription—

"Route de CHARLEMAGNE. Terminée en l'An I. du règne de NARLOTH, Empereur des Français, sous les auspices de Monsieur JEAN ST. ANDRÉ, Préfet du Département du Mont Tonnerre."

On the other three sides are the names of Entrepreneurs, Ingenieurs, &c. The proximity of Ingelheim may have suggested to M. Jean Bon St. André the introduction of the name of Charlemagne, where some have supposed he was born; and at the same time the implied compliment to Bonaparte, to whom and to Julius Cæsar this and others of his detractors pretended to find in him a parallel. In restless activity, rapidity of movement, and unrelenting persecution of those who opposed him, Bonaparte might certainly be compared with Charlemagne. The enormities of the latter, however, were the results of fanaticism; those of the former, sheer pride and ambition, of which, as Byron says, he was the champion and the child, one

"Whose game was empire's, and whose stakes were 'honour, Whose table, cards!—whose dice were human beings."

MENTZ, OR MAYENCE.

Having passed the summit, we proceeded by a gentle descent, and a tolerably good road, planted on both sides with apple and other fruit trees, to Mentz, or Mayence. This city belongs to the territory of the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt; but as the smallness of the contingent furnished by this German Prince to the confederacy would not admit of his placing a sufficient garrison in this important place, it was settled at the Congress of Vienna that it should have an Austrian and Prussian governor, in alternate years, and be garrisoned by Austrian and Prussian troops in equal numbers; but such rapid changes having been found inconvenient, and the garrison composed of the two nations not agreeing well together, it was afterwards settled that each governor should remain three years. The number of troops were at this time so considerable, that the whole town wore a military appearance. In the streets few persons were seen but soldiers. The old palaces, hotels, and convents were converted into barracks, and the finest houses in the town occupied by the Austrian and Prussian officers. With all this, Mayence appeared to be one of the duller towns, for its size, that we have met with. The entrance into the town is over draw-bridges, bastions, and all the various kinds of defences, and within it are barracks and guard-rooms in almost every street.

The fine old gothic tower, and, indeed, the whole of the exterior of the cathedral, built of red sandstone, with its fretwork and pinnacles, is a very striking object. The tower was once surmounted with a spire of wood, eighty feet above the present crumbling summit, but was burnt down by lightning. It is a remarkable fact, that there is scarcely an old church along the Rhine or in the Netherlands, that in some part of its history, has not been consumed wholly or in part by fire.

The interior corresponds in grandeur with the exterior; but when the French Jacobins took possession of it, as they did of all the churches wherever they went, to convert them into barracks, hospitals, and magazines for their armies, the Cathedral of Mentz was most scandalously and wantonly abused. The beautiful marble tombs were mutilated, the pictures destroyed, the bronze and iron railings torn up, the ceiling is blackened, obviously by fire, and full of holes, as if it had been pierced by shot. The Swiss of the church, in pointing out the various mischief committed by the French, added, that the people of Mentz would not be sorry to have them again, as they spent a wagon load of money when there. This was the only church, however, we had yet seen that had not undergone repair, and been purified from the defilement and mischief done by these unholy miscreants, and there appeared to be some feeble attempt making to put this also into somewhat better condition; but whether at the expense of the clergy, the inhabitants, or the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, we did not enquire.

In a small square on the left of the great street, which leads to the quay, is a handsome fountain, representing

* A bleeding of all beauties; streams and dells,
Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, corn-fields, mountain, vine,
And chieftest castles, breathing stern farewells
From gray but leafy walls, where Ruin grates dwells."

the Rhine, under the personification of a well executed figure of an old man; and in this square is the public library, and the museum. The former we could not see as it was under repair, and the books were all displaced and on the floors of the rooms, but we went through the small collection of pictures, which generally speaking are not of the first class.

From Mayence a noble bridge of fifty-two pontoons or boats crosses the Rhine to Cassel, a small fortified town. The Rhine is here not less than from seven to eight hundred yards across, and widens out to more than twice that breadth a little higher up, where it receives the waters of the Maine.

Below the bridge are moored in the river sixteen or eighteen water mills, which were all busily employed in grinding corn. This bridge, like those at Coblenz and Cologne, has its convex side opposed to the stream, and like them also it furnishes a fine broad platform as a promenade for the inhabitants. There is, however, a very pleasant mall at the west end of the town planted with trees, extending down the bank of the Rhine above a mile, which is frequented for its shade in the heat of the day.

Being so near, not more than from six to seven leagues, to Frankfort, we determined at once to proceed to that city; and at the request of our very decent and well behaved driver, whom we brought from Cologne, we consented to go a little out of our way to the left of Cassel, to a village of which he was a native, in order to change our tired horses. These small animals are capable of performing an incredible quantity of work; and all the bait they get in the course of a day's journey is once, and sometimes twice, a loaf of rye bread, which they immediately devour with great eagerness, however tired they may be, and when they would refuse either hay or oats.

Having passed the hill of Hockheim and descended to the level plain, we entered upon an open and well cultivated country, a great part of whose surface had been covered with wheat, now all reaped and carried; a good deal of oats still remained uncut, and whole fields of poppy were under the sickle, from the prolific heads of which they express an oil. Beet and mangel-wurzel, clover and potatoes, were in great abundance, and large patches of hemp and flax intermixed, but very few turnips. There was no appearance of meadow or grass land, and it is not easy to conceive from whence the large towns on the Rhine, the populous villages in the valley of the Maine, and the city of Frankfort, derive their supplies of beef, mutton, butter, and milk. Yet they have plenty of all, though we agreed that we had not tasted either good butter or good milk since we left Holland, nor had we observed a single cow all the way up the Rhine from Cologne to Mayence. The few that are kept must be confined to the shed, and fare very poorly. We observed along the road side, and subsequently along the whole of the Netherlands, women with large knives, bent like a reaping-hook, cutting the grass in the ditches and on the banks, and carrying it off in sacks as food for the cows; and in the vineyards of Hockheim they were taking off the purulent shoots, and the superabundant leaves, of the vines, binding them in little bundles, and sticking them to dry on the tops of the stakes or espaliers to which the vines are bound; and this, we understood, was meant as winter food for the cows.

FRANKFORT.

Frankfort may be called a city of palaces. The houses of the merchants and the hotels are on a magnificent scale. Some that have been recently erected on a terrace, along the bank of the Maine, are particularly elegant, but not on so large a scale as some of the old hotels at which formerly the German princes used to reside, and many of which are still inhabited by the plenipotentiaries of the states of Germany who attend the diet. At the extremity of the terrace is the new public library, a chaste and handsome building, with a portico of the Corinthian order.

The library appeared to be well arranged, and particularly rich in ancient and modern history. It contained a few Roman and Egyptian antiquities, and some hieroglyphics of no great value. The view, from this terrace, of the river and its banks, and the stone bridge of fourteen arches, with the shipping lying below it, is lively and animating. The great street called Zeil, in which most of the hotels are situated, is, perhaps, one of the finest in Europe. We put up at the Weidenbusch, kept by Mr. May, a civil, obliging, and intelligent man. The eating and the wines were excellent, and the charge reasonable—three francs each at the table d'hôte and four in private—and some twenty or thirty different dishes are generally served up. It was in vain here, and indeed every where, when we wished to dine alone, that we entreated to sit down to three or four dishes at most; there seemed to be a feeling that the house would think itself disgraced if a complete dinner was not served up. The dining room of this hotel appeared, by pacing, to be one hundred feet by forty-five; and the number of bed rooms in the house is ninety-one, most, if not all of them, double bedded. Mr. May has a cellar of wines, that few if any, of the London wine merchants would be able to purchase. The Swan, directly opposite, is another hotel apparently as large; but that of the Russians, for splendour and magnificence in the fitting up and furniture, outdoes all the others.

In Frankfort every thing wears the appearance of ease and prosperity; and none of its forty thousand inhabitants, that fell under our observation, wore the marks of poverty. The whole town is surrounded by the most delightful walks, in the midst of groves of trees, shrubby plants, and flowers, excepting the third side, which is terminated by a terrace along the river: and all these walks are attended, morning and evening, by large groups of well-dressed people of both sexes. The security of this free town is no longer trusted to redoubts, and ramparts, and glacis; all of them beyond the ditch, which might also be filled up and added to them with advantage, are converted into extensive gardens, open to all the world. Part of the walls and gates, however, are still preserved. Its little territory does not exceed twenty miles in its largest diameter. In this city, about ten thousand Jews are said to be locked up every night in a particular quarter of the town specially appropriated to this persecuted race.

We all regretted the necessity of an immediate return from a place that possessed so many sources of rational amusement; but we received here a piece of intelligence that made it necessary we should hasten our departure. By this we were prevented from visiting the old Dom church, and the several collections of pictures and marbles in the hands of individuals, and particularly the celebrated statue of the Ariadne, by Danneker, which is spoken of as rivaling any thing of a similar kind executed by Canova.

On returning to Mayence we took places in the steam vessel, which was to depart next morning for Cologne, where we arrived about five in the evening of the following day, having started at six in the morning. In descending the Rhine we were detained one hour at Coblenz, to have the baggage examined, which was done by the Prussian dominions in the most gentlemanly manner possible, without the smallest expectation of receiving any thing, which, indeed, we were told, if offered, they would indignantly reject.

Nothing can be more delightful, in fine weather, than this passage down the grandest and most romantic part of the Rhine; and one only regrets the great speed at which the steamer descends, which, in the present case, could not be less than ten miles an hour. Hence we perceive, in quick succession, the ever-varying features of the romantic and picturesque mountains, at one time appearing with naked and pinnacled summits, under every fantastic shape, at another clothed with orchards, vineyards, and forests, and every now and then surmounted by an ancient castle or convent in ruins. This great variety of objects keeps the eye and the imagination continually on the stretch, while the margins of the smooth and silvery Rhine, forming a chain of lakes, exhibit to the view cities, towns, and villages, interspersed with the varied scenery of corn-fields, groves, and orchards, and render it impossible to quit the deck for a moment.

In ascending the Rhine by land, along the fine road that skirts its left bank, the traveller has the opportunity of visiting these towns, and entering into all the detail of enquiry that leisure will allow; but from the high and overhanging mountains, under which he is conveyed, he is unable to comprehend within one grasp the whole of the scenery around him; whereas, in gliding down the middle of the river, every object on both sides is fully brought within the scope of simultaneous vision. It is, therefore, the best plan for those who may wish to visit this delightful country, to take the line which we did; that is, to say, to ascend by land and descend by water.

Having hired a calèche at Cologne as far as Aix-la-Chapelle for sixty francs, we left this at eleven o'clock in the morning of the 23d; and at six in the evening arrived at Juliers, a small, clean, fortified town, garrisoned by about six hundred veteran soldiers of Prussia. Here we dined and slept at the Prince Eugene, where we had excellent fare, good beds, and the charge very reasonable. The road was an ill-paved causeway in the middle, for a considerable part of the way, and deep sand in other parts.

The next morning we left Juliers and arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle in four hours; the road still pretty much the same, and the face of the country flat, cold, and uninteresting. A few patches of wood appeared here and there, but generally the culture of grain prevailed, chiefly oats, among which was interspersed a good deal of green crops, such as clover, mangel-wurzel, potatoes, and a few patches of turnips. Buck-wheat and poppy were also common.

CHAPTER IX.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

This ancient town is situated in a valley nearly surrounded by hills, the most prominent of which is Louisburg on the north, and Salvatersberg in the same direction nearly, the latter of which is crowned with an ancient church. The pretty village of Borette and its wooded hills are to the south. These northern elevations are composed of friable sandstone and loose sand, among which are found different shells and the remains of several species of marine productions. It is probable that from these hills proceed those numerous springs of warm water for which Aix-la-Chapelle was once particularly celebrated, and from which it derives its Germanic name Aachen, the City of Waters, the Civitas Aquisensis of the Romans. The "Chapelle" was added to the name by the French from the church or chapel built, or supposed to have been built, by Charlemagne, and perhaps also to distinguish it from Aix in Provence and Aix in Savoy.

The old walls of the city enclose a very considerable extent of ground, which is not built upon, but laid out in gardens and walks. On the outside of the walls, the old ditches have been filled up and converted into walks and shrubberies, for the use of the inhabitants; a practice which of late years has become common in many of the Germanic and Belgic cities, and a very commendable one, which may be the means of saving them from the horrors of a siege in any future wars. The boulevards within the walls, which surround the town, have undergone the same conversion, and afford a pleasant walk. But the principal promenade appears to be that to the Louisburg, the slope of which descends to the very walls of the town, and a convenient carriage road, as well as a handsome footwalk, leads up to the summit; and here there is exhibited a most magnificent view round the whole horizon. On the highest point stands an obelisk, which is said to have been originally erected by the French, with an inscription in praise of Napoleon, who was never in want of flatterers; but which the Prussians, at the conclusion of the war, threw down. The king of Prussia, however, ordered it to be re-erected, graciously, as one of those gentlemen who write "Guides" tells us, on the part of his majesty; but to cause the original inscription to be erased, and another substituted to record the rapid downfall of that extraordinary person, was not so very generous. We could find nothing however of the kind. The column, from the fractures and fissures in the stones, bore evident marks of having been thrown down and set up again, but the only inscription which appeared on one of its faces consists of the latitudes and longitudes of certain places at which the French had their stations, in carrying on the survey of the country.

The streets of the old part of the town are very narrow, and the houses high, as is usual in most German towns; and the architecture full of picturesque points and projections, and singularly interesting to the painter and the antiquarian. It would be endless to attempt a minute description of the various churches, convents, and other buildings of a public nature that meet the eye in strolling through the streets, but there are two edifices on which no traveller should omit bestowing his attention. The one is the Hotel de Ville, the other is the old cathedral or Dom church. The old Hotel de Ville is in the market place, conspicuous enough by its two towers, one of which, or at least the lower part of it, is evidently, and is so recorded, of Roman structure.

In the centre of the market place, and before this town hall, is a splendid fountain: the water is received into a magnificent vase of bronze, about twice the diameter, so at least we supposed it to be, of that which is placed in the conservatory of Warwick castle; from this it is poured through the mouths of two dolphins, swimming in an inferior basin of stone, enclosed within an iron railing, but accessible on two sides to the public. The bronze vase, finely sculptured, is supported on a pedestal rising out of this basin, and from the centre of the vase is another pedestal surmounted by a bronze statue of Charlemagne about six feet high, holding in one hand a sceptre, and in the other the imperial globe surmounted by a cross. At a little distance, on each side of the fountain, is a large bronze eagle, mounted on a marble pedestal. This fountain, which has been carefully kept in repair from time to time, was erected in 1533, at the same time that the Hotel de Ville was finished, and under the auspices of the same burgomaster, Charus.

In the town hall of this ancient city, two several treaties of peace were signed, that of 1668, and that of 1748; and in the ancient chapel of Charlemagne, the ceremony of coronation of many emperors has been held. This old cathedral or Dom church had the honour, for so it was considered, of receiving a visit from Napoleon and Josephine; and after their fall in 1818, a congress of sovereigns was held in Aix-la-Chapelle, at which, among other important matters, it was determined to withdraw the allied armies from the occupation of France. On this occasion the late Sir Thomas Lawrence was commissioned by his late majesty George IV. to paint the portraits of the sovereigns of Europe, and other distinguished personages there assembled. He had a room allotted to him for this purpose in the town hall, which is carefully pointed out to strangers, and considered as a great honour that was done to the town.

The Dom church or cathedral, or, at least, the central part of it, was built by Charlemagne, under the direction of Eginhard, his biographer, in honour of Notre Dame. There is a legend concerning its dedication by Pope Leo III., in 804, the truth of which in those days was not called in question, though we of later times may be disposed to feel incredulous. It is merely this, that three hundred and sixty-five bishops, one for every day in the year, were summoned to assist at the consecration; but as two were wanting to complete that number, their places were supplied by two others, who had the complaisance to leave their tombs on so solemn an occasion, and returned to their earthly abode as soon as the ceremony had been duly performed.

The ancient part of this remarkable church is an octagonal form, surmounted by a cupola. Two corridors, of a more modern date, one above the other, of the width of about thirty feet, open by a succession of arches into this octagon, which they surround, with the exception of one side, opening into the more modern choir, which is of the form of a quadrangle. From the corridors, particularly the upper one, or gallery, issue as many chapels as there are arches, each arch being opposite its chapel. These chapels, however, are still more modern, having at different times been added by different persons. The vaulted ceilings of the upper corridor are decorated with paintings of scriptural subjects by an Italian of the name of Bernardino, of clear and fresh colouring, and by no means ill executed.

In each arcade of the gallery, and between the massy pillars that divide them, are said to have been placed four beautiful and highly polished columns of granite and porphyry, which, among other robberies of the churches by the French, were torn away and sent to Paris; and four only of these have been returned.

In the seventh arcade of the upper corridor is placed the organ; and that opposite to it is occupied by the chair of Charlemagne, which, being undoubtedly genuine, is an interesting relic of antiquity, and of course highly valued, as it deserves to be, by the inhabitants of Aix. It consists of four slabs of white marble, rudely fastened together by iron clamps, and is ascended by several steps of the same material. Indeed there can be no question as to its identity with the real throne on which this monarch sat.

The tomb of Charlemagne, which is immediately under the centre of the dome of the octagon, was opened in the presence of the Emperor Otto III. The body, covered with the insignia of the empire, and decorated with the imperial jewels, was found seated on the chair in question, and placed on his knees was an illuminated copy of the Gospels, which is said still to exist. Otto carried away the insignia, which were afterwards used at the coronation of the emperors of Germany; and having satisfied his curiosity and his avarice at the same time, closed up the tomb. After this, in the year 1165, Frederic Barbarossa I. caused the tomb again to be opened, in presence of the bishops of Liege and Cologne, who had the body removed and placed in a magnificent sarcophagus, on the cover of which was engraven the Rape of Proserpine, and which is also said still to exist; but our enquiries did not tend to confirm the report.

The Swiss of the church, a shrewd and intelligent man, informed us, that when Bonaparte remained a short time at Aix-la-Chapelle, he, with Josephine, paid a visit to the cathedral, attended by the bishop, who, on opening the wooden case that contains the chair of Charlemagne, invited Napoleon to seat himself on the chair of the man whom he wished the world to suppose he resembled—but Napoleon turned away. Whether it was a feeling of pride that told him he was superior to such a barbarian, and wished to show the by-standers that he did not consider it any honour to be thus associated with him, or whether he was apprehensive that the bishop might take the advantage while in it to press for some privilege, which, when so seated, he could not well refuse, were points that had not been settled by the real cause of his refusal, from the following circumstance, for the truth of which the same Swiss who attended us vouched of his own personal knowledge. He said that the good bishop, having failed with Napoleon, next invited Josephine to ascend the steps, which she, with her usual good nature, immediately condescended to do; and having seated herself on the throne of Charlemagne, the cunning prelate took the opportunity of preferring a request, which he hoped she would condescend to grant. It was a petition, ready drawn up, that she would use her good offices with Napoleon to present the church with a new organ, to replace the one which the French soldiers had destroyed when they made a barrack of the church. She did not hesitate a moment in asking and obtaining the boon; and the organ now in use is, therefore, and very properly, considered as a present of Josephine.

When Frederic caused the tomb of Charlemagne to be opened, he presented to the cathedral a magnificent chandelier of bronze gilt, about thirteen feet in diameter, which is still suspended over the large blue slab which covers the vault where the remains of Charlemagne are supposed to rest, and on which is engraved this simple inscription:—

Carolo Magno.

This stone is modern. The tomb of black marble which occupied its place was torn away by the French soldiers, and destroyed.

The choir, which communicates with the octagon by one of the lower arcades, is surrounded by windows of lofty dimensions. The ceiling is said to be one hundred and twenty-four feet high. Its walls are decorated with eight pictures on scriptural subjects, by Bernardino, and also by several pieces of Gobelin tapestry, the largest of which is uncommonly fine; the figures bold and spirited, the colours fresh and brilliant, and the tone of colouring equal to that of a picture of Rubens; the subject is the destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea. These Gobelins are held in such high estimation, and preserved with so much care, that they are only exhibited on each side of the high altar on festival days; but the Swiss produced them for our inspection.

In the choir, and facing the altar, is a well executed bronze eagle, mounted on a pedestal, which was given to the church by the Emperor Otto III., whose bones are preserved in a sarcophagus of white marble, immediately under the high altar. Above this the statue of the Virgin Mary is placed, who wears a crown of silver gilt, which, it is said, was presented, as a sacred gift, by her unfortunate namesake of Scotland.

The paintings in the several chapels of the cathedral are not such generally as to deserve much notice; but in that of St. Michael there is a small collection that well demands the attention of those who visit this church: and what stranger, it may be asked, will fail to do so?

Having gone round the various chapels, and enquired of the Swiss if there was any thing more to be seen, he replied that if we had any taste for relics he would desire a priest to show us a very large and splendid collection of these interesting objects; but our taste did not lead us that way. On asking him, however, what sort of relics he spoke of, he said they possessed among other things the real swaddling clothes of Jesus, a gown of the Virgin Mary, some hair of her eyebrows, the shoes or sandals of Joseph, with which he walked all the way into Egypt, and a thousand other little curiosities, which were only exhibited to the people once in seven years. As none of us had any great relish for these, we declined the attendance of a priest.

In the church of St. Peter we saw a relic of another description,—the complete body or skeleton of a certain Florina, a saint of course, wrapped up in silk clothes, and placed at full length in a glass case. The head only was visible, and it was a mere skeleton; the teeth were quite perfect.—If the French had carried off these relics and left the pictures, the people of Aix would not have had much occasion to complain or lament their loss. The priests, however, had a higher notion of their value, and hurried them away into the interior of Germany, lest they should be deprived for ever of such valuable treasures. The Emperor of Germany, it is pretended, took little for their safe keeping, and retained among other things the sword of Charlemagne.

There are several churches in Aix-la-Chapelle besides the cathedral, that, from their antiquity and various ornaments, deserve to be visited, particularly that of St. Nicholas, which is a spacious and beautiful church.

Aix-la-Chapelle appears to be a very dull town. The baths once so celebrated are nearly deserted, Spa, and the neighbouring village of Borette, having drawn away the company, though they too, it is said, have given way, of late years, to Wiesbaden and other baths of Germany. It can boast but of little trade and few manufactures; the chief of which are woollen cloths, pins and needles—the latter article, when made up into packets, are marked as Whitechapel needles. The inhabitants are neither Dutch, Brabanters, nor Germans, but a mixture of all three, and speak a language which partakes of all and belongs to none. They have the character of being unkind to strangers, but in our short intercourse we certainly did not find them to be so.

CHAPTER X.

BELGIUM.

Leaving Aix-la-Chapelle on the morning of the 25th, it took us eight hours to reach Liege. The road was still paved, but kept in somewhat better order than we had found it on the other side of Aix.

Several tough hills, however, contributed to make the journey tedious, though we were amply recompensed by viewing at more leisure the diversified face of the country, broken as it was into hill and dale, with now and then a rich and well wooded valley, whose verdant meadows, enclosed with hedges, were enlivened with numerous herds of beautiful cattle.

At the distance of twelve miles from Aix-la-Chapelle we came to a small town or rather village called Henrich-Chapelle, the approach to which on the summit of a hill is announced by a Dutch custom house, this being the frontier station between the Prussian and the Netherlands territory. Here our passport was visé, and we were asked if we had any merchandise or other articles that required to be declared? On answering in the negative, we were permitted to pass on without any examination of our baggage.

LIEGE.

From a steep hill the road winds down into the valley or plain on which Liege stands. This city is situated at the junction of the Ourt with the Meuse, where their united streams form a fine broad river, which flows through the heart of the town, and is crossed by a handsome stone bridge, of six circular arches, three of them being of very considerable elevation. A convenient quay for commercial purposes extends the whole length of the town, both above and below the bridge; and symptoms of a considerable traffic were apparent, from the degree of bustle on the quay in the shipping and landing of goods.

In the lower part of the town the streets as usual are narrow and the houses lofty, not much unlike some of the gloomy streets of Paris. Those of the upper part, on the side of the hill, are also narrow and inconveniently steep, being ascended in many places by flights of steps. There are two tolerably spacious squares, in one of which stands the town hall, and in the other the theatre. The latter is a handsome modern building, surrounded by an arcade; the former is an imposing old edifice, though somewhat heavy.

Liege has long been the principal place in the Netherlands for the smelting of iron and for the various manufactures of that and other metals, which, of late years, have been greatly extended. The hills which enclose the valley of the Meuse abound in coal, limestone, and iron, and capital only is wanting to carry on the works to a very great extent.

An Englishman of the name of Cockerell has established manufactories of several kinds, more particularly for the smelting and working of iron; and in some of them cannon is cast of the largest calibre, and steam engines of the highest power, and various other kinds of machinery, are here executed. The great bronze lion that surmounts the conical mound of earth, recently raised on the plain of Waterloo, was cast by Cockerell.

Commerce and manufactures rarely fail to draw in their train the means of promoting the sciences and liberal arts. King William, in his abundant kindness to his new subjects, has established at Liege a royal university for students in theology, law, and physic, which the advancing prosperity of the place now made it necessary to be enlarged, for the better accommodation of the increasing number of students; and there has also been recently added to it a botanical garden. Societies have also been formed for the encouragement of the arts and sciences, belles lettres and general literature. In short, every thing in and about the town appeared to us to be in a progressive state of improvement.

We left Liege on the morning of the 26th, along a smooth and level mountain road, sometimes running close under a rocky hill, and equally close to the margin of the river, and sometimes having a fine cultivated plain between us and the river. The hills on both sides were finely diversified with wood, and interspersed masses of rock, giving a picturesque appearance to the scenery. New buildings, with tall chimneys, sending out volumes of smoke, were seen in every direction, and announced the very common and extensive application of steam in their several manufactures; and numerous rail roads, from the hills to the river side, and heaps of coal rubbish and slag, were the certain indications of active industry and a manufacturing population.

The enterprising Cockerell has turned the ancient Chateau de Sereign, once the Archbishop's palace of Liege, into an iron foundry, where, it was said, upwards of two thousand workmen were employed, and iron goods manufactured from the largest steam engine to a pen-knife. Here, too, the good King William had contributed a considerable capital for the encouragement of his Belgic subjects, by giving them an opportunity of making themselves acquainted with every branch of the art. A nursery had also been converted into a paper mill, constructed on the principle of those invented some time since in France, and now used in Scotland, by which sheets of paper a mile long, if the rollers can be made large enough to receive them, are capable of being manufactured in one continued piece. Cockerell's father is said to have been a cotton spinner in Manchester; one of those bold spirits who, if it was not himself, was one of the same kind, that made a boast that he would construct a machine, into one end of which a piece of cotton wool inserted should come out at the other end a ruffled shirt; to which another observed, that this shirt, put into one end of a machine of his contrivance, should come out a printed Bible at the other. Ridiculous as these boastings may appear, such a process would not be much more wonderful than that extraordinary piece of mechanism, constructed by Babbage, which not only calculates logarithms, but arranges the types in the frame ready for printing, without the possibility of an error.* Such are the extraordinary results of the "march of intellect," which does not by any means appear to have yet slackened its pace; nor will any one venture to predict where it will end.

HUY.

The usual indications of manufacturing industry and activity continued uninterrupted as far as the town of Huy, at which place a stone bridge of seven arches crosses the Meuse. We found but little here deserving of attention, but were amused with a pleasing set of carillons, which played sweetly and correctly the Huntsman's Chorus in Freyschutz.

Nine miles beyond Huy is the town of Salayen; and here the valley of the Meuse becomes still more romantic and picturesque than farther down.

NAMUR.

Directly on a line with the river, we suddenly open out, but at a considerable distance, the city of Namur with its domes, and its turrets and spires, all of them overtopped by a lofty mass of rock, surmounted with castles and batteries, and round towers, that, seen even at this distance, satisfy the spectator as to their vast dimensions. On a nearer approach to the town, these formidable fortifications are the first objects that arrest the eye.

The entrance into Namur, from this side, is through an avenue of trees, and over a bridge of blue stone of nine arches.

We had often occasion to admire the vast superiority, in discipline and appearance, of the Prussian soldiers over those of the king of the Netherlands. Among the former are scarcely ever observed, in a whole regiment, a man above thirty years of age; they are all stout, handsome, well-made young men, generally between the ages of twenty and thirty, well clothed and well trained. It was quite beautiful to see them on the parade going through the several movements; and it was impossible not to be struck with their firm and upright carriage, and with the perfect accuracy with which they performed a simultaneous movement. The Dutch troops, on the contrary, exhibited a very remarkable contrast. Their clothing was generally put on in so slovenly a manner, as evidently not made to fit the wearer; their exercise was gone through in a careless and indifferent style; there was no firmness of step, and in marching it was laughable to see them frequently kicking each other's heels. They were, however, as well as the Prussians, mostly young men, and being natives of the same country, it is obviously the fault of their officers that they are so badly drilled.

Like the streets of most of the Belgic towns, those of Namur are generally narrow, and the houses lofty, but they appear to be kept in clean and good order, and some few have a tolerable width and bordered by good comfortable houses. The numerous work-shops, chiefly in the various branches of iron and brass ware, gave an appearance of active industry, which was not contradicted by the equally numerous shops which exhibited those articles of home-made manufacture. There was besides a good deal of traffic and bustle on the river.

We paid a visit to the cathedral, which is a very handsome specimen of modern architecture, of the Corinthian order, not more than seventy years old; but it experienced, like all the other churches, the bad usage of the French soldiery, who converted it into a barrack and a hospital.

It is now, however, kept in a state of good repair and perfect neatness. The interior of the dome is particularly light and elegant, and the whole floor, the steps and the altars, are entirely of marble of different kinds and colours. There are four pictures in this church, said to be by Rubens,—"The Salvation,"—"Christ healing the lame man at the Port of Bethesda,"—"Showing himself to the Apostles,"—and "The Crucifixion."

As we had before us a long journey the following day to Brussels, and should probably spend some time on the field of Waterloo, we desired the servant girl to be careful not to omit knocking at our door at four o'clock; on which she significantly said, there was very little danger of any of us being asleep at that hour. On enquiring what she meant, she said the bell of the town hall, just by, would be sure to waken us; and she was quite right, for such a toll of about ten minutes, or a quarter of an hour, was certainly never before heard; it was just as if one of the most sonorous Chinese gongs was beating in the adjoining apartment.

WATERLOO.

On leaving Namur for Brussels, we took leave of the valley of the Meuse, and proceeded northerly by the small town of Jenappe, and by Quatre Bras, to the ever memorable and ever interesting plain of Waterloo, which no Englishman thinks of passing without making himself acquainted with the topographical detail, on the spot, of that tremendous conflict, which terminated in giving place to long-aflicted Europe.

The original features, however, of the ground, where the centre of the English line had its position, at the last desperate effort made by the enemy, are entirely obliterated; and the ridge which formed a part of Mount St. Jean is now levelled down with the rest of the plain. This was done for the purpose of obtaining a sufficient quantity of earth to form the great conical mound, on which the colossal bronze lion, which may serve either as the British or Belgic lion, is supported, the pedestal of which bears the simple inscription "JUNE 18, 1815." The mound and the lion have equally been the subjects of ill-natured censure; but the one containing the bones of friends and foes, who fell in that dreadful day, and the other composed of cannon taken from the enemy, would appear to be aptly enough appropriated, as being at once a memorial, a trophy, and a tomb. The mound is intended to be placed on the spot where the Prince of Orange received his wound. We first observed this conical mound from the heights of Quatre Bras, from whence it appeared in the horizon just like one of the pyramids of Egypt.

There have been so many plans and descriptions of the battle and of the neighbouring country, that it would be a waste of time and paper to repeat them. At the foot of the mound may be had plans of all sizes, both of the country and the battle, prints of the monuments that have been erected within and without the church, and every possible information that a visitor could wish for; and if these should not be considered sufficient, there are a dozen or two of clever and intelligent young fellows, who have found it worth their while to loiter about the ground in the expectation of visitors, and who have made themselves acquainted with the details of the battle, speaking English with tolerable correctness and fluency. In fact we were quite unprepared for these laqueys, the number of huts, sheds, and cottages, and the population which we met with on the plain of Waterloo. Even on the summit of the mound, which is about one hundred and fifty feet high, and ascended by two hundred and thirty-two rude steps of wood, placed by an individual up one of its sides, we found two women offering for sale cakes and wine, gin, and all manner of cordials.

The village of Waterloo is in the rear of the field of battle, and close to the forest of Soigny, which we passed through in the evening, over an indifferent kind of paved causeway. The trees are principally of beech, and some of them very fine, but the wood is fit for nothing but firewood, and is used solely for that purpose. The trees are so close together as to exclude every ray of the sun, and to impede the action of the atmosphere; and the consequence is that, when a log of beech wood is brought out of the forest into the open air, it rises and splits in a most extraordinary manner. This, indeed, is the case with most other woods, and it explains why hedge oaks, or trees that have grown singly and been thoroughly exposed to the air, are less liable to split, and therefore preferable in ship-building to those which have grown in a wood.

BRUSSELS.

Brussels is in all respects worthy to be considered as the capital of the Netherlands. The streets in the lower or more ancient parts of the town, about the gate where it is entered near the river Senne, maintain the usual character of a Belgic town, being narrow and the houses high, but on the upper or hill part of the city, the streets are spacious and the buildings magnificent. The ascent from the lower to the upper or court end of the town, is about as steep as, and the streets not unlike, those which run through Guilford or Lewes. Two palaces, one for the king, and another contiguous to it for the young prince, face the planted piece of ground called the park, which may be about the size of Lincoln's Inn Fields; it is laid out in the continental style of gardens, being intersected by straight walks shaded by trees, and embellished with statues, in praise of which much cannot be said. Directly facing the king's palace, and on the opposite side of the park, is the house of the Conseil de Brabant, now the Chamber of Deputies. All the houses in the four streets or rows that surround the four sides of the park are truly magnificent, and in general appearance equal, or nearly so, in point of architecture though not in size; and the houses in the adjoining square or Place Royale, with the church in the centre of one of its sides, and the two hotels of Belvue and de Flandres, are all splendid buildings. The former hotel makes up more than a hundred beds; and we sat down to a table d'hôte, at which were sixty-six persons, more than one half of them English.

In fact Brussels, next to Paris, is the most populous English colony in all Europe; and to judge our countrymen comfortably and in the English taste, whole streets or rows of houses are building for their reception towards the outskirts of the town; and for their amusement, the old walls and ramparts have been demolished, and converted into a charming boulevard for a promenade; and along the Allée verte, beside the Antwerp canal, they were busily employed in laying out an extensive botanical garden, and in levelling the old fortifications in that quarter. No wonder that so many English families flock to this great city; many of whom, however, carry, with their money, their depraved habits and vicious propensities, and not a few a great deal of the latter without much of the former, imposing for a time on the inhabitants, who, however, had now become more cautious in trusting them.

See Brewster's Letters on Natural Magic, republished in New York, for an account of this wonderful mechanical contrivance. Also Babbage's own account in his book on the Economy of Manufactures, republished in Philadelphia, books which should be in the hands of every enquiring mind. The latter contains a popular account, which can be understood by all. Brewster does not hesitate to call it the most wonderful machine ever contrived. The small trial machine has fully answered the expectations of the inventor, who is now constructing one on a large scale.—Ed.

All kinds of provisions, education in all its branches, public amusements, and the luxury of a carriage, may all be had here for about one half of what they cost in England; and there is no restraint, but what the law, mildly administered, imposes. Books of all kinds, particularly French and English, are carefully reprinted here, and sold for much less than the editions of our most popular works printed by Galignani at Paris. We have yet seen no place in the course of our tour, not even Frankfort, that wears the appearance of so much ease and prosperity as in the inhabitants of Brussels. There are, however, many dissatisfied spirits among them, especially the catholic priests, who hate the government of protestants, and the Jacobins, who hate all governments; but the mild and equitable rule of the king restrains to a certain degree if it cannot subdue their hatred.

We went through the king's palace, which had been newly furnished, and is one of the most habitable and comfortable houses of that denomination, perhaps, in Europe. The ball-room is the only large apartment, and is splendidly fitted up and furnished. It may be some eighty feet by forty, and very lofty. There is another room, perhaps somewhat smaller, which is called the picture gallery, but is as unworthy the name as the pictures are unworthy to be placed in it.

The palace is built round a large quadrangular courtyard, and contains the immense number of forty-four rooms, en suite, through all of which we passed. Behind the quadrangle is a garden, which had neither taste, nor neatness, nor rare plants, to recommend it to notice.

From the palace we crossed the park to the house of the Conseil de Brabant. The vestibule is very fine. Two wide staircases, one on each side, lead to the two chambers of peers and the deputies. The steps are of marble, and each of a single slab, the produce, as we understood, of the hills which enclose the Meuse. The chamber of peers on the right is merely a long room or gallery. On one side of it were two large pictures, painted by Oudever, the king's painter. One was the "Battle of Nicopoli," the other, the "Battle of Waterloo."

The chamber of deputies on the left is on the same plan as that of the deputies in Paris; but it has no tribune, each member speaking from his place,—those who represent the provinces of Holland using the Dutch, and those of the Netherlands generally the French language.

At the further extremity of the quadrangular court, in which the collection of pictures is placed, occupying one wing, is a suite of rooms, appropriated to subjects in the several departments of natural history, among which is a collection of very superb specimens of Russian minerals, presented by the present empress. The birds are beautifully set up, but not very numerous, and the whole collection of animals well arranged and preserved with great care: what is of essential use to visitors, they are placed at a convenient height for the eye, and are properly labelled.

Another wing of the quadrangle is appropriated to the sittings of the royal academy of sciences and literature; and there is also a library under the same roof, and behind the building is a large garden, which was now closed, and in preparation, as we were told, for a botanical garden.

The church of Gudule, standing on the brow of the hill, is a magnificent specimen of the old Gothic style. It contains some very fine monuments; and the twelve apostles, at full length, and rather above the common size, are placed against twelve columns of the nave. The pulpit, by Quesnoy, is beautifully executed, and is probably not inferior to any piece of carving in wood throughout the Netherlands, which is saying a great deal, as this is the country, of all others, where carving in wood was carried to the greatest perfection. The subject of the Gudule pulpit is the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise. The pulpit itself is supported by the figures of our first parents and the angel, who is driving them out with a flaming sword. The face of Adam is concealed by his two hands placed before it, and his flowing hair; but the whole figure, by the attitude into which it is thrown, exhibits the strongest representation of grief and despondency that can well be imagined; while Eve turns round her piteous face, and looks at the angel in the most affecting expression of countenance, and a look "more in sorrow than in anger," convincing at the same time something not exactly of complaint, but as if she would say "Our punishment exceeds our crime." The tree of knowledge, with its spreading branches, gives support to the canopy over the pulpit; and the huge snake, having succeeded in destroying the happiness of our first parents, is in the act of sucking away from its victims, and entwining itself round the back part of the pulpit, on which side its head is seen to have reached the top of the canopy. Here, however, on the highest summit, stands erect the figure of the Virgin Mary, beaming a long cryer, with the point of which she pierces the head of the snake. On either side, on the railing of the steps, are a number of birds and quadrupeds enjoying themselves, as it were, in paradise; those on the side of Adam being mostly of the larger species, and such as are endued with masculine strength, and those on the side of Eve, chiefly peacocks, parrots, and monkeys, which some may, perhaps, be disposed to think was intended as rather a malicious satire on the part of the sculptor, in having chosen such chattering for the accompaniments of mother Eve.

The Town-house of Brussels, and more particularly its beautiful spire, are scarcely, perhaps, to be equalled for elegance and lightness. This spire rises proudly eminent, to the height, it is said, of three hundred and sixty-four feet, exclusive of sixteen or eighteen feet of an iron rod which supports the full length figure of St. Michael, who, it must be confessed, has been treated rather lightly by converting him into a weathercock. Standing in the centre nearly of the city, this light and airy spire of exquisite workmanship is seen from every part of its outskirts, and forms a beautiful object from the park and its vicinity.

On the side opposite to that which the Town-hall occupies in the Grand Place, or market-square, is the ancient palace, of curious Gothic architecture, now converted into shops; but its gilding, its decorations, inscriptions, and other remains of its former splendour, are still visible, and may be made out by those who have time and patience for the task.

There are no towns on the continent that, like London, enjoy the inappreciable advantage and luxury of having a copious supply of pure water, brought up into all the floors of the houses if desired; but there are also few towns which, next to this advantage, have not the enjoyment of public fountains and public pumps; and in the decoration and embellishments of these structures, no expense appears to have been spared; and very often we find a great share of good taste displayed in them. To say nothing of the fountains, of which some are really splendid, the common pumps even of Frankfort, Mayence, and Cologne, and many of the towns of the Netherlands, are ornamental to the streets and squares in which they are erected. They are of various forms, but most commonly that of an obelisk, or the section of a pyramid, curiously carved with fretwork of different devices, and surmounted with statues of men or women, figures of lions, eagles, and other animals, and sometimes with a gilt crown, or armorial bearings.

Brussels has its share of both pumps and fountains; and among others, there is one of the latter in the corner of a street, of a singular kind, well known by the name of the Mannikin. It is the statue of a little boy, beautifully sculptured in black marble, by Quesnoy, who sends forth night and day, without intermission, a copious stream of pure water. It is said that Louis XIV., when in Brussels, was so shocked at the indelicacy of this exhibition, that he ordered a suit of gold-laced clothes to be made for the manikin; and report says he is actually clothed in them, with a cocked hat and sword, on certain festival days, for the amusement of the inhabitants. If the fact be so, Louis must have intended to play off a joke on the good people of Brussels.

On the 26th of August, we left Brussels in a caleche and pair of horses, which we hired as far as Ghent—thirty-six miles, for two and a half Napoleons, or some-—It is exceedingly to be regretted that Philadelphia with her ample supply of water, is entirely without the decoration of fountains. Nothing could be added in the way of ornament which would at the same cost be so effective. Rome in her days of prosperity boasted of one hundred thousand fountains; some of them were probably of little more exterior elegance than our hydrants, but we know from those which remain that many were very superb. The first cost of fountains in this city would be the only expense nearly so. We appeal to every traveller in Europe to confirm our opinion when we say, a really tasteful fountain adds as much to the beauty of a city as a splendid building. The councils who should lead the way in their introduction to our public squares will merit the thanks of the community, and the names of the prominent actors in it will be transmitted to posterity along with those who conferred the great benefit on the city of plenty of wholesome water. We put it on record in 1833, that at present we have not a single public fountain in the inhabited part of this great city. There is one at Fair Mount and another in progress.—Ed.

what less than two guineas. About half way is the town of Alost, or, as the word signifies "to the east," it being the frontier town of old Flanders in that direction. It is not a very large but a neat town; and in its cathedral there is a picture of Rubens, which travellers generally go to see. The subject is Christ empowering Saint Roch to heal the sick; it is a well painted, but by no means a pleasant picture.

From Alost to Ghent, which is eighteen miles, an avenue of tall beech trees is continued almost the whole way without interruption. The causeway generally was well paved, and a very considerable number of men were employed in keeping it in good order; the surface of the country perfectly flat the whole way, and the uninterrupted tillage as neat and clean as a kitchen garden.

The number of women employed in the various operations of agriculture appeared to be at least equal to that of the other sex, and some of their employments were laborious enough, and to us appeared disgusting and degrading; for instance, we observed a young woman harnessed with a man in the painful labour of dragging a harrow over a surface of rough clods. Very few horses appeared to be employed, a single horse being frequently observed to draw a light plough through the loose and mellow soil.

We may here observe that, since we left Liege, the condition of the agricultural labourers, if we might judge from the appearance of the farm-houses and cottages, and villages, was somewhat superior to that of the same class further to the eastward. There was more neatness about the farm-yards, and more care taken in the preservation of every ingredient for the compost heap, so essential for keeping up the prolific quality of the soil. Their grain was carefully stacked, and their dwellings were white-washed, and kept clean before the doors, and these and the windows and the wood work generally were painted green; this contrast, however, does not apply so much to the state of agriculture of the country between the eastern and western portions of Brabant, as to the general appearance of the houses and the people; for nothing could exceed the neatness in which the land was cultivated the whole way along the banks of the Rhine and as far as Aix-la-Chapelle; the care and the labour bestowed on every part of it were little, if any thing, inferior to that of the Dutch Netherlands. But this neatness in the cultivation had no correspondence with the dress and appearance of the peasantry, whose extreme slovenliness and the filthy state of their dwellings were quite disgusting. All kinds of dirt were suffered to remain undisturbed before the doors, and it was not unusual to see a parcel of children nearly naked, paddling in pools of water—the drains from some neighbouring dunghill; but nothing of this kind is seen in Belgium.

GHEENT.

Ghent is situated on the united stream of the Scheldt, the Lis and the Lieve. It is a fine old city, but, like all we have yet seen, the height of the houses and the narrowness of many of the streets give it a dull and sombre appearance. The cathedral is a fine old structure, at least equal to the church of St. Gudule at Brussels. It is said to have been built in the eleventh century, and finished as it now appears. If we clearly understood the Suisse de l'Église, the pillars and arcades which we went to see under the ground floor of the church, were the foundations of one still older, on which they rebuilt the present edifice. They correspond exactly, so that this vaulted under ground story is called a church under the cathedral. Almost the whole interior of this fine old building is of marble of various kinds and colours; the lower parts of the walls are lined almost wholly with black marble. Its two and twenty chapels are mostly of marble, with doors of brass. The altar-pieces and all the monuments are also of black and white marble, the former serving as pedestals or bases, on which the whole length figures of white marble, from the quarries of Genoa, rest. One of these, a bishop of Ghent, by Quesnoy, and another, a German bishop, by Paoli, are exquisitely fine. The pulpit is a finished piece of carving, supported by two statues of Time and Truth, under the figures of an angel holding open the "Book of Life" before the face of an old man; and on each flight of steps is the figure of an angel—the whole by Laurent de Veana.

Ghent is almost as much intersected by canals as if it were a town of Holland; and they talk of its twenty-seven islands and three hundred bridges, which are probably about three times the actual number. In the architecture of the churches we observed nothing very remarkable, but the stepped gables of the houses give a peculiar character to the town. It has some good streets and open squares that are lighted with gas; and we could not but notice that a great many more well dressed people, both ladies and gentlemen, appeared abroad in the streets, than we had observed elsewhere; it appeared, however, that the greater part of them were English, who have congregated here in numbers as considerable, perhaps, as at Brussels. There are, no doubt, many inducements held out at Ghent for English families in moderate circumstances, to fix their abode there. All the necessities of life are abundant and cheap. There is an excellent college, at which the pupils are instructed in every branch of literature on the most reasonable terms; and no distinction made between protestant and catholic. There is an academy for the fine arts, which possesses a good collection of pictures, a public library, and a very good botanical garden, which was founded under the republican government of France, out of the gardens and grounds of a suppressed convent.

The distance from Ghent to Bruges is about thirty miles; and as the country is here one continued flat, we resolved to travel, by way of variety, in the trekschuyt, or, as they call it, the barge—a very commodious vessel, with good apartments and a canopy over the quarter deck. She is drawn by four horses, which proceed at a gentle trot of about four miles an hour, and they are changed at half way. The fare for this passage is five and a half pence, or four shillings and seven pence each person, a tolerably good dinner and beer into the bargain. For those who are not in haste, or for invalids, there is no mode of travelling to be compared to this for ease and comfort, and, at the same time, it enables the passenger to occupy himself in any kind of employment he may choose to engage in; and in the greater part of this particular passage there is nothing to distract his attention, the banks being so high as to intercept the view of the country. We could see enough, however, to satisfy us that the whole surface was in an admirable state of tillage. It is said, indeed, that in no part of the Netherlands are finer crops produced than in the district between this line of country and Antwerp, called the Waesland, which centuries ago was a continued waste of barren heath, naked sand, and splashes of water.

BRUGES.

It took us about eight hours to reach Bruges, a clean, quiet, flat town. Once the central mart for almost all the commerce of the Low Countries, it still exhibits the remains of former grandeur. With its commerce and its opulence, its population gradually fell to nearly one half of what it was. It is now said to contain about seven thousand houses, and thirty-eight thousand inhabitants. One portion of the population, and no inconsiderable one, ought not perhaps to be deemed as any very great loss,—that which peopled some dozen convents and abbeys, with their extensive establishments and large tracts of ground within the city walls, most of them now suppressed.

One of these, which still remains near the western extremity of the town, is the Beguine, an establishment for the support of old nuns. It is a large enclosure containing a handsome chapel, a number of very good and neat houses round a spacious square planted with trees, and gardens behind them. These elderly ladies are in the enjoyment of every comfort. There is a similar establishment at Ghent, the chapel of which we attended during service time, but were not much enraptured by the voices of these ancient virgins; indeed the whole of that institution was much inferior to this at Bruges.

Here we also visited an English nunnery which had been founded ninety-nine years ago. The old lay sister, notwithstanding her well trimmed beard, and a pair of mustaches, was a very intelligent and agreeable person, exceedingly communicative, and much pleased to see her country people, and lamented that she could not indulge us with admission to the cloisters, and the interior, but their regulations, she said, were strict and positive to allow no person to see any of the professed nuns, except their relations or their acquaintances at the parlor. Even the chapel, she said, had recently been closed against the public by an order from the government, but she would venture to show it to us, and indeed urged us to see it. This chapel is certainly the most perfect model of the kind that can be imagined. It is fitted up with good taste and elegance, and devoid of all trumpery decorations. Indeed there was nothing within it, with the exception of the altar, and scarcely that, to indicate that it was a place for catholic worship.

The number of professed nuns is forty, all from England and Ireland. The whole sisterhood were expelled from this convent on the irruption of the French, and made their way to England; where they were received, and a convent fitted up for them, by Sir Thomas Gage. While there, the old lady said they were all very unhappy, though well treated; and though there were among them several young ladies unprofessed, and in frequent communication with their friends, there was not, while in England, a single case of desertion—such is the influence that is exercised over the minds of these young creatures, when once entered within the pale of monastic life.

Observing a large concourse of people not far from the convent, and proceeding towards that quarter, we saw in an enclosed piece of ground a number of persons dressed in green jackets, with bows and arrows, shooting at a small wooden figure of a bird, apparently not larger than a sparrow, perched at the top of a sort of maypole, about one hundred and fifty feet high. These archers, or toxophilites, for they were of that society, of ancient standing in Holland and the Netherlands, shot their arrows in turn; and in the course of about a quarter of an hour the bird was hit twice, which was the more deliciously done, as the wind was blowing strong.

This kind of pole may be observed in almost every village of the Netherlands, and for the double purpose of exercising the toxophilites at the mark on its summit, and also of decorating with garlands on fairs and festivals, when it is a common practice to grease or soap the lower part, and hang up a prize for him who has the skill, and can endure the fatigue, of ascending this slippery pole, so as to reach it.

The streets of Bruges are kept as clean as those of a Dutch town. The houses and shops are not elegant, but neat, and the people generally appear to be in decent circumstances. The shops and the markets are well supplied with every necessity of life; the fruit and vegetables are good in quality, and abundant. The great drawback is the want of good fresh water, which can only be had from a considerable distance. The cheapness of provisions, of house-rent, and of education, has induced many English families to repair to Bruges, as well as to Ghent and Brussels. Besides the very small expense of private teachers, they have the advantage of public libraries, reading rooms, collections of pictures, public and private, and an academy of painting.

We rambled through the northern side of the town, which consists of whole streets of cottages, mostly built on one plan, and kept neat and clean by whitewashing. All the women belonging to these cottages were busily employed in weaving lace before the doors, and in many places whole groups of them gossiping while fingering their bobbins with as much rapidity, and seemingly with as much ease and pleasure, as a young lady runs her fingers over the keys of a piano-forte. We understood that from seven to eight thousand women are employed on this species of manufacture.

The dress of the people of the Netherlands is not the most becoming, particularly that of the women. Except those who move in the higher sphere of life, and who imitate French and English fashions, the generality of citizens' wives and daughters wear, even in the warmest weather, long black cloaks, reaching to their heels, with deep hoods, which the old ladies generally draw over the head, but the young ones mostly turn down, in order to exhibit a neat cap, bordered with lace, always clean and as white as snow.

Finding that the departure of the steampacket from Ostend had been put off from the 2d to the 3d of September, we resolved to spend the day at Bruges rather than Ostend, which gave us an opportunity of seeing the churches of Notre Dame, or the cathedral, and St. Salvator. Notre Dame is a heavy mass of building, with a tower and spire, that belong to no specific class of architecture. The nave is divided from the side aisles by massive columns. The pulpit is one of those curiously carved fabrics, common to almost every church in the Netherlands. It is supported by the figure of the Virgin sitting on a globe. There are two pieces of sculpture in white marble, representing the Virgin and Child, that are extremely beautiful. The one near the high altar is esteemed the best, and, indeed, has been claimed as the work of Michael Angelo. It was found in a Genoese vessel, that had been taken by a Dutch privateer belonging to Bruges, and lodged in this church. Sir Joshua Reynolds is of opinion that it is of the school of Michael Angelo.

While looking with admiration at this beautiful specimen of sculpture, a gentleman of very respectable appearance went down before it on both knees, and with outstretched arms remained motionless for at least ten minutes, looking intensely at the Virgin, after which he arose, made a profound reverence, and walked out of the church. This is the only act of devotion, or rather of idolatrous worship, that we had witnessed on the part of any male individual of a decent appearance in our whole route, and we never once observed a man to go into the confessional box, while women were entering them constantly.

Having heard much of the church or chapel of Jerusalem, we paid a visit to it, but were grievously disappointed. We found it a miserable little chapel that would with difficulty hold a hundred persons; but in one corner of it there is a sort of cave, to enter which it is necessary to stoop; and in this cave is the sepulchre of Christ, the same, we are told, as it is seen at Jerusalem. On entering, we perceived, by a glimmering light, an old woman kneeling before the recumbent figure of a man, with a pale face and a disgusting black beard, and the body covered up by a white sheet.

The old town house of Bruges well deserves to be noticed, forming one side of the great square or market place. The building itself has no pretensions to taste or elegance, having something of the appearance of large barracks. One of its largest sides, on the ground floor, is appropriated as a flesh market, which has the merit of being quite concealed from public view, like that under the town hall of Leyden; and the side next the square is the cloth market. The tower is rather remarkable and very lofty; it consists of three parts; the lower part is a heavy square Gothic structure, corresponding with the body of the building, and pinnacled at the four corners. Out of this rises a second square, of smaller dimensions; and the third stage, still more contracted, is an octagon. The height cannot be far short of three hundred feet.

We had frequent occasion to remark, in the course of our tour, that certain component parts of buildings, not very important in themselves, when common or oft repeated, will sometimes give a character to a town. Thus the lofty broad windows and large squares of glass distinguished the houses of Amsterdam and Rotterdam, and the high steps and stoops, as they are called, before the doors, are characteristic of all Dutch towns. The painted wooden houses, the overhanging upper stories, and the plain corniced gables, are the common features of a Rhinish town; and the tall ornamented gable of many stories, with its fantastic scrolls and fretwork, is characteristic of Antwerp, while those of Ghent are generally a series of steps. The arched chimney of semicircular tiles, gives a marked feature to Bruges, as the forked chimney does to Amsterdam, where it sometimes appears with three arms.

We had frequent occasions to notice the contrast in appearance between the Prussian and the Dutch, or rather Belgian, soldiers when on the parade. One of these regiments, or several companies of one stationed here, attended divine service at Notre Dame, where all the music and singing were performed by the band and the soldiers. To us it had an odd appearance to observe three grenadiers, with their caps on, supporting the priest on each side of the altar, and the men remaining covered during the service. In marching to church, we could not but remark how loose and slovenly they were in their dress, and more loose in their step, and so careless in marching as constantly to be kicking and trampling on each other's heels. When contrasted with the soldier-like appearance, the close buttoned up coat, the upright carriage and firm step of the Prussians, the difference of the two bodies of men, composed of the same people, was very remarkable. The fault, as we have before observed, must lie with the officers, for the men, though generally small, were young, and, by proper training, would easily be brought into a state of better order and discipline. It is just possible, as the clite of the Dutch army were assembling in the neighbourhood of Utrecht, to be reviewed by the king, the regiment in question might be chiefly composed of recruits.

On the 1st of September, about four in the afternoon, we embarked on the trekschuyt, not quite so commodious as the former one, and were landed in the evening on the quay of Ostend. The fare was one franc and one stiver, about eleven pence each person. The canal that connects these two towns is broad and deep, and nearly on a level with the surface of the country the whole way, which has much the appearance of Holland. In the best parts, where any thing like cultivation appears, the soil is heaped up in rounded ridges, and the deep furrows, we observed, were mostly filled with water. As we approached Ostend, the surface, particularly on the northern side of the canal, becomes more swampy, and the country puts on a more dreary appearance.

Here, on the 1st of September, they were busily con-played in the very midst of haymaking, the uncult grass having much the appearance of being recently freed from immersion in water; yet at a short distance were villages, with their accompanying trees and their church spire, seen in every direction.

On landing, we found there was a considerable degree of alarm in Ostend on account of a fever that had broken out in the garrison; and to allay the fears of the inhabitants, a public notice was given out, stating the few deaths that had happened,—but which were so great, that if they had taken place in the same proportion in London, they would have given cause for apprehension that either the plague or the yellow fever or the cholera had got among us.

Little can be said in praise of Ostend. The town is neat enough, and looks lively, with its painted houses of green, blue, and yellow, which are the prevailing colours. The interior basin for shipping is large and commodious, and is bordered by a broad quay, which, by the grass springing up between the stones, indicated no overflow of trade. The entrance to the basin through the outer channel and harbour is difficult, and next to impossible when the wind blows strong off the shore. It is defended by a strong and regular fort, in which is the citadel. Great precautions have been taken to keep out the sea, by breakwaters of wood and stone, but chiefly by a sloping glacis of stonework, on the top of which is a pleasant promenade, having the sea beach and the sands close beneath it.

We embarked in the common steamer, and in sixteen hours were landed on Tower Hill.

While these sheets were passing through the press, information has been received from Holland, that King William had refused to sanction Baron Chasse's capitulation, so far as it concerned other forts than that of Antwerp, and the general remained a prisoner of war in the hands of the French. By the terms of intervention agreed upon, the French had no right to proceed further; and having, moreover, agreed to evacuate Belgium, they had already commenced the retrograde march. Thus, though Antwerp has fallen, Holland yet retains the navigation of the Scheldt, and the dispute is probably no nearer an adjustment, than when France and England entered upon the shameful aggression. The prisoners of war were on their march to Danikir, to be kept as hostages for peace, in columns of 1000 men, each column escorted by a brigade of French troops. Their number amounts to between 7000 and 8000. In the mean time, England and France have undertaken to renew the war of protocols with Holland, and another negotiation may lead to a second warlike expedition against the Dutch.

THE LIVES AND EXPLOITS OF BANDITTI AND ROBBERS.

By C. MAC FARLANE, ESQ.

From the London Monthly Magazine.

Under this somewhat astounding and formidable title, the ingenious author of "Constantinople in 1829," and "Romance of Italian History" has contrived to give us what is far more romantic and terrible, if we except, perhaps, the exploits on a larger scale of their illustrious cotemporaries—the robber kings and conquerors. Viewing them with an impartial eye, we can see between them too little distance, whether in act or spirit, to show any cause, why these brave though less legitimate claimants to renown should not aspire to the honours of historical companionship, and a place upon the same page with pontiffs, kings, and tyrants of every age or nation. * * * He has made his narrative, with some exceptions, by one of the most entertaining, and much overlooked, personal anecdote and adventure. * * * Take it for all in all, Mr. M. has made a pleasant work, out of different and not unauthenticated materials; and if he have coloured a little too highly in such ground, the amiable error may be forgiven him.

* * * The postage on this periodical now is but one and a half cent for one hundred miles, and two and a half for a greater distance, as it is uniformly printed on one sheet.

LIVES AND EXPLOITS OF Banditti and Robbers.

BY C. MAC FARLANE, ESQ.

Author of "Constantinople in 1829," and "The Romance of Italian History."

In presenting to our readers the first American edition of the following work, it may not be irrelevant to remark, that the narratives are of very unequal merit. A part of both volumes having apparently been inserted with a view to increasing them to a required number of pages, without much reference to the amusement or information of the purchaser, and some of the tales being collated from books already before the public and well known, we have omitted a small portion, retaining, however, every thing likely to be read with zest, or in fact that is at all worth perusing.

In taking up Mr. Mac Farlane's work, considerable hesitation was felt as to the propriety of inserting it in the "Library"—its value would of course depend upon the manner in which the subjects were treated. We have no wish to supply a morbid appetite with tales of terror—nor should we have finally decided on printing it, had we not found, on a careful perusal, that the author had taken care to procure only authentic materials; and, as a chapter of the human heart, the histories are curious and affecting, while as stirring incidents they will fix and interest the reader's attention.—Ed.

GENERAL VIEW OF BANDITTI AND ROBBERS.

There are few subjects that interest us more generally, than the adventures of robbers and banditti. In our infancy they awaken and rivet our attention as much as the best fairy tales, and when our happy credulity in all things is wofully abated, and our faith in the supernatural fled, we still retain our taste for the adventurous deeds and wild lives of brigands. Neither the fulness of years nor the maturity of experience and worldly wisdom can render us insensible to tales of terror such as fascinated our childhood, nor preserve us from a "creeping of the flesh" as we read or listen to the narrative containing the daring exploits of some robber-chief, his wonderful address, his narrow escapes, and his prolonged crimes, seated by our own peaceful hearth. It is another thing when we hear of these doings on the spots where they have just occurred, and may occur again: for in that case the idea that we may adorn a future tale, instead of telling it, is apt to make attention too painful, and the effect produced will be too intense, and will exceed that certain degree of dread and horror which gives us pleasure in romances, tragedies, and other efforts of the imagination. If we happen to be well protected at the time, and have a tolerable consciousness of security, then indeed we may doubly enjoy these tales on the spots—the solitary heath, the mountain-pass, or the forest—where the facts they relate occurred; but under general circumstances the exploits of a Pope Mastriello or a Mazzaroni will not be agreeable entertainment across the Pontine marshes or through the defiles of the Neapolitan frontier. I remember one dark night, in which, with much difficulty, we found our way from the Neapolitan town of San Germano to the village of Sant'Elia, in the bosom of the Apennines; that when a friend (my own companion) suddenly stopped and pointed out a place, and told the story of a robbery, and of a priest's having been murdered there a short time before, I could not help wishing he had kept his anecdote until we were ourselves in a place of safety—nor indeed help feeling rather uncomfortable until a white-faced chapel on the top of a little detached hill gleaming through the obscurity, showed us we were near the village we had been so long in search of.

But, to return to robber stories and their effects generally, it may be said that no species of narrative, except, perhaps, that of shipwrecks, produces a deeper impression on people of all ages and conditions. This conviction, and the circumstances of my having passed a number of years in the south of Italy—the land of brigandism par excellence—and of having repeatedly visited the wildest parts of that country, and possessed myself there of some curious details, induce me to collect my own materials, and by uniting them to the authentic statements of others, to produce, for a winter evening amusement, a sort of history of banditti.

Before the reader proceeds further, I will warn him, that he will not find my robbers such romantic, generous characters, as those that occasionally figure in the fields of fiction. He will meet with men strangers to that virtuous violence of robbing the rich to give to the poor. They give to the poor indeed, but it is as spies and instruments of their own crimes, or at least in order to induce the poor to remain passive while they carry on their work of depredation against the rich. It could scarcely be deemed great liberality in men, who, fresh from the easy plunder of a treasure, should scatter a few dollars among the needy peasantry, but even these few dollars are given from motives directly selfish. Among Italian banditti I never could hear of a Robin Hood, and still less of a refined metaphysical "Robber Moor," that high-minded, romantic hero of Schiller, who is driven to bold villany by the paltry, covert views of society.

The effect Schiller's tragedy of "The Robbers" produced on the romantic youths of Germany is well remembered; they became enamoured of a brigand's life, and thought the loftier and more generous virtues incompatible with a life of dull honesty and submission to the laws of society. But the beau idéal that deluded them was only ideal, and in reality robbers no more deliver touching monologues to the setting sun, than they unite elegance and virtue with violence and guilt; and when they took to the forest and the wild, and levied contributions (as several raw students actually did), they must soon have found they could qualify themselves for the gallows, without reaching the sublimities of poetry and sentiment elicited by the fervid imagination of the poet—who, be it recollected, was a strippling like themselves when he wrote "The Robbers."

The sober minds of British youth were never led by play, poem, or romance, to such a dangerous imitation; but I can well recall the time, when, with others of my own age, I fancied it one of the most romantic things possible to be a captain of bold banditti, with a forest more leafy than Arden for my haunt, and a ruined abbey or castle, or inaccessible cave for my home—with followers so true that they would rather die piecemeal than betray their captain or a comrade, and with the enviable finale to every day's perils and adventures—the jovial banquet, the song, the chorus, and the wild legendary tale, or recital of my own daring deeds. This was the dream of a boy; but even when I was emancipated from the pleasant enthrallments of "The Bandit's Bride," and similar productions, it was long ere I could divest brigandism of its cloak of romance, and see it in its own horrible nakedness. In my own particular case, which I dare say is not a singular one, the charm of banditti romance was strengthened and prolonged by the pictures of Salvatore Rosa and the prints from that great master and from our own Mortimer; and though I never went quite the length of a young friend, who, on seeing for the first time a savage, rugged mountain pass, with a torrent brawling through it, on the confines of Calabria, expressed a hurried regret that there were not a few of such figures as Salvatore depicted, to make it complete; still I rarely could see such a scene without fancying such figures, and as, between Spain and Italy, I wandered a good deal in my youth, in romantic scenery, I wandered a good deal in my mind, in romantic scenery, the brigands by frequent association ideas became familiar to me, and were invested with all the picturesqueness of nature and of the painters. In this manner they were still somewhat ennobled in my eyes.

But even this minor degree of illusion had considerably given way to time and experience, and the stories of the vulgar atrocities of the banditti, which I had heard in Apulia, the Calabrias, the Abruzzi, and the Roman states, when chance brought me in contact and in safe colloquy with an ex-brigand, whose account of his own calling was well calculated to remove the slight degree of romantic feeling with which I could still reflect on the banditti.

It may be remarked here, that priests and monks have not done half the mischief which has been perpetrated by ballad-mongers, and story-tellers, and popular traditions, that have made the adventures of famous outlaws one of their favourite and principal subjects, and have described them rather with an eye to effect, than to truth or morality. Throughout Italy these ballads and stories are almost as numerous as accounts of miracles and legends of saints. They are among the first things learned in childhood; their continual repetition familiarises the mind with lawless deeds, whilst their spirit of adventure has a strong fascination for a very sensitive and very ignorant people.

"Let who will make the laws of the country," says the Scotch patriot, Fletcher of Saltoun, "let me make the ballads, and I will form the people." A little reflection will show how much is contained in this remark. Were a proof required to support it, I would point to the nature of the general run of Italian ballads and to the character of the Italian people. And were I a despot as potent as a Chinese emperor, I would decree the destruction of all their ballads relating to brigandage, and would punish every teller of a story or a tradition on that subject—at least until the country were civilised, when they might be "said and sung" with no more evil consequences than attend the singing or recital of "Johnnie Armstrong," or "The bold Robin Hood," among us.

The great civilisers of countries are your road-makers. A MacAdam in Calabria would do more in suppressing banditti than twenty sanguinary governors, such as the French General Manhes, whose proceedings I shall have occasion to detail. Wherever good communications have been opened, the brigands have gradually withdrawn. This I have seen myself in Calabria, in Apulia, and in the Abruzzi. That this indeed should be the case will strike every body, but it is so in a degree which can hardly be understood by those who have not seen it. The sight of a new broad road seems to produce the same bewildering, terrifying impression on an Italian robber, that the magical mirror of Ruggiero did on the eyes of his enemies.

I remember once having to pass a district (not far from Taranto, the ancient Tarentum) which had long borne an infamous reputation. On speaking to a gentleman of the country, he assured me there was now no grounds for apprehension—that the government had finished a strada nuova three months before, and that not a single robbery had been heard of since. Indeed, I almost invariably observed in travelling in the provinces of the kingdom of Naples, that the spirits of my guides or multeters revived as we came to a bit of new road, and that they spoke of it as a haven of safety.

Hoping these brief general observations may not have fatigued the reader's patience, I shall now proceed to the most amusing and authentic narratives of banditti I can collect, begging him to bear in mind that robbers, like the heroes before the time of Homer, are frequently lost in obscurity—that history has disdained to record their exploits, which are only to be collected in the scenes which witnessed them, and from the occasional accounts of travellers.

THE ROBBER OF THE ABRUZZI.

"Of no avail," says the excellent Neapolitan historian Giannone, "was the horrid spectacle of the tortures and death of the chief Mangione; for very shortly after the kingdom was disturbed by the incursions of the famous Marco Sciarra, who, imitating Marcone of Calabria, called himself 'Re della Campagna,' or 'King of the open country,' and asserted his royal prerogative at the head of six hundred robbers."

Favoured by his position in the mountains of the Abruzzi, and on the confines of another government—the papal states, which for many years have been the promised land of brigandage—this extraordinary robber attained the highest eminence in his profession. His band, so formidable in itself, always acted in concert with other bands of banditti in the Roman states; they aided each other by arms and council; and in case of the Romans being pressed on their side, they could always retreat across the frontier line to their allies in the Abruzzi, while, in the same predicament, the Abruzzese could claim the hospitality of the worthy subjects of the pope.

The same circumstances have strengthened the banditti in our own days, and rendered the country between Terracina and Fondi, or the frontiers of the papal states, and the kingdom of Naples, the most notorious district of all Italy for robbers.

But Marco Sciarra was moreover favoured by other circumstances, and he had the grasp of mind to comprehend their importance, to avail himself of them, and to raise himself to the grade of a political partisan—perhaps he aimed at that of a patriot. His native country was in the hands of foreigners, and most despotically governed by viceroys from Spain, who were generally detested by the people, and frequently plotted against by the nobility, who, instead of assisting to put down the fuorusciti, would afford them countenance and protection, when required, in their vast and remote estates. A great part of the rest of Italy was almost as badly governed as the kingdom, and consequently full of malcontents, of men of desperate fortunes, who, in many instances, forwarded the operations of the robbers, and not infrequently joined their hands. An accession like theirs added intelligence, military skill, and political knowledge, to the cause of the rude mountaineers of the Abruzzi.

In the course of a few months after the death of Benedetto Mangione, Marco Sciarra had committed such ravages, and made himself so formidable, that the whole care of the government was absorbed by him, and every means in its power employed for his destruction.

In the spring of 1588, he had retreated with his band, before a force of government troops, into the States of the Church, which the vice-royalists could not invade without the permission of the pope. In the month of April the viceroys, Don Giovan di Zunica Conte de Miranda, applied to the Holy See for an immediate renewal of an old concordato, by which the commissaries and the troops of either government were authorised to have free ingress and egress in the Neapolitan kingdom and the papal states, to pursue robbers, crossing the respective frontiers as often as might be necessary, and by which the two states were pledged reciprocally to aid each other in the laudable duty of suppressing all bandits. Sixtus VI. complied with this reasonable request, by granting a breve for three months. Immediately the troops of the Viceroys Miranda crossed the frontiers in pursuit of Sciarra, who, being properly informed by numerous friends and spies of all that passed, turned back into the kingdom about the same time that his enemies quitted it; and avoiding the pass of Antrodoro, where the Spaniards were in force, he was soon safe in the mountain.

The robber had the sympathies of all the peasantry on his side, and found friends and guides every where. Not so the Spanish commander in pursuit of him, who did not learn whereabouts he was for several days, when some fugitive soldiers brought him word that Marco Sciarra was in the kingdom, and had just sacked the town of Celano, cutting to pieces a detachment of troops that had arrived there. The Spaniard then recrossed the frontier, but nearly a whole day before he reached the country about Celano, Sciarra was again beyond the borders.

He had now, however, considerable difficulties to encounter. The officer had left a body of bold men behind him in the papal states, and these had been joined by several commissaries of the pope, who each led a number of soldiers, and carried with him his holiness's command to the faithful, not to harbour, but to assist to take the Neapolitan banditti wherever they might be. Sciarra had not expected so formidable an array on the side of Rome against him: he was several times hard pressed by the troops, but the peasantry, spite of the injunctions of the successor of Saint Peter, still continued his faithful friends. The historians who relate these events, especially record that, wherever he went, the robber was kind in conversation and generous in action with the poor, giving, but never taking from them; and paying for whatever his band took with much more regularity than did the officers of the Spanish troops. Consequently he was advised by some peasant or other of the approach of every foe, of every ambuscade of the troops, of every movement they made; and he finally escaped them all, keeping two forces, which might almost be called armies, at bay, the one on the Roman confine, the other on the Neapolitan, for more than a week.

He then threw himself back on the mountains of Abruzzi, where, by keeping himself in the most inaccessible places, with his men scattered in the most opportune spots, and regular sentinels stationed and guards distributed, he had invariably the advantage over the enemy. Indeed, whenever the troops mustered courage to approach his strong holds, which he was in the habit of changing frequently, they were sure to return considerably diminished in number, and without the satisfaction, not only of killing, but even of seeing one of the robbers, whose ambushes from behind rocks, or the shelter of forests and thickets, had so sure an aim.

Six months passed—the soldiers were worn out. The Spanish officer, who first led them on the useless hunt, was dead in consequence of a wound received from the robbers. Winter approached, which is felt in all its rigour on the lofty bleak mountains of the Abruzzi; the commissaries with their men, on the other side, had long since returned to their homes at Rome; and the viceroys' people now went to theirs at Naples.

After these transactions, Marco Sciarra was deemed all but invincible: his fame sung in some dozen of ballads, strengthened his prestige in the eyes of the people; his band was reinforced, and he was left to reign a king, at least of the Abruzzi, and undisturbed for many months.

It was about this time that the robber chief's life was ornamented with its brightest episode. Marco and his merry men had come suddenly on a company of travellers on the road between Rome and Naples. The robbers had begun to plunder, and had cut the saddle-girths of the mules and horses of the travellers, who had speedily obeyed the robbers' order, and lay flat on the earth, all save one, a man of a striking and elegant appearance.

"Faccia in terra!" cried several of the robbers in the same breath, but the bold man, heedless of their menaces, still stepped up to Marco their chief, and said, "I am Torquato Tasso." "The poet!" said the robber, and he dropped on his knee, and kissed his hand; and not only was Tasso saved from being plundered by the mere mention of his name, but all those who were travelling with him were permitted to mount their horses and continue their journey without sustaining the loss of a single scudo. A very curious proof this, that a captain of banditti could form a juster and more generous notion of what was due to the immortal, but then unfortunate poet, than could princes of royal or imperial lineage.

The viceroys was stung to the quick by the failure of his expedition, of whose success he had been so certain, that the court of Spain was given to understand their kingdom of Naples had nothing more to fear from the incursions of banditti; that the head of Marco Sciarra would soon decorate one of the niches in the Capuan gate. But Miranda was a man of energy, and in 1590 he renewed his attempt to exterminate the robbers. Four thousand men, between infantry and cavalry, marched this time into the Abruzzi, under the command of Don Carlo Spinelli. As the Abruzzese peasantry saw this formidable army enter their pastoral districts by Castel di Sangro, and traverse the mountain flat, "the plain of five miles," they whispered "The will of God be done! but now it is all over with King Marco!"

Marco Sciarro, however, had no such fears; but came boldly on to an open battle. With his increased forces he threw himself upon Spinelli in the midst of the viceroys' troops, which were presently disordered; he wounded with his own hand the proud Don, who turned and fled, but so severely wounded that he was well nigh leaving his life in the mountains whither he had gone to take that of Sciarra. The soldiers followed their commander as best they could, leaving the robbers the full triumph of the field.

Marco Sciarra's courage and audacity were now increased a hundred-fold. He fancied he could conquer a kingdom; he invaded other provinces, and marching across the mountains of the Abruzzi, he traversed those of the Capitanata, sacking, without meeting with opposition, the towns of Serra Capriola and Vasto. Nor did he stop here: for he descended into the vast plain of Apulia, and took and pillaged the city of Lucera, a very considerable place, situated near the edge of the plain. The bishop of Lucera, who fled for refuge to one of the church towers, was unfortunately shot, as he presented himself at a window or loop-hole to see what was passing. Without being molested by any attack of the government troops, Marco Sciarra's band leisurely returned from this extensive predatory excursion, loaded with booty, to their Abruzzi mountains, which overlooked Rome, where their enterprising chief renewed his league with the banditti in the states of the pope, and encouraged them by the flattering picture of his splendid successes. But he had allies more important and dignified than these. The politics of states now became mixed up with his fate.

Alfonso Piccolomini, a nobleman by birth, but one of the many desperate revolutionists Italy has been fertile in the production of—a rebel to his sovereign the grand duke of Tuscany—had fled to Venice, where he obtained service as a soldier of fortune in the army with which that republic was then waging war with the Uscocchi. This man was enchanted with the stand Sciarra had made against the pope and the viceroys, neither of whom, at the time, was in good odour at Venice; and he induced the crafty senators to wink at his corresponding with, and favouring the bold Abruzzese, if he did not even do more, and (working on their jealousies of the power of the Spaniards and of the pope in Italy,) persuade them to assist the outlaw themselves with money and arms.

Marco Sciarra was every day gaining importance and strength by these manoeuvres, when a curious change took place. Here I entreat attention to the vindictive feelings, the utter want of principle, of decency, that marked the proceedings of princes and potentates in Italy in those days.

The grand duke of Tuscany, entertaining the most revengeful feelings against his rebel subject, made it a matter of embassy and degrading supplication to the Venetians that they would not only dismise from their service, but drive out from their states, Alfonso Piccolomini. But Piccolomini, it was replied, was a man of talent, and as a soldier they were well satisfied with his services.

Marco Sciarra, the Abruzzese (he did not blush to propose a brigand!) was the better man of the two to carry on their wars against the Uscoeci, rejoined the duke, who did all he could to make them substitute him for Piccolomini. The Venetians, however, turned a deaf ear to these representations, and the Tuscan refugee could defy the wrath of his sovereign as long as he enjoyed their protection. But in an evil hour Piccolomini returned a haughty, if not an insulting answer to the Capi, or heads of that mysterious, sanguinary government. The senators of Venice were almost as vindictive as the duke of Tuscany; they dismissed him from their service, and drove him out of their states—when he fell into the snares laid for him by his own sovereign, who put him to a violent death.

The oligarchy of Venice then thought of Sciarra, and sent to invite him to their service. He was to prosecute the war against the Uscoeci. But Sciarra, for the present, turned as deaf an ear to their proposals as they had at first done to that of the grand duke's, and remained where he was—the lord of the Abruzzi. He was not long, however, in finding that in the death of Piccolomini, who had so materially assisted him, he had sustained a severe loss, and Sciarra's fortunes were still more overcast when Pope Sixtus died and was succeeded by a better or more pious pontiff, Clement VIII. The new pope shared all the feelings of the viceroy of Naples, as far as regarded the banditti, whom he determined to exterminate in his states. To this end he despatched Gianfrancesco Aldobrandini against them, with a permanent commission.

By a simultaneous movement a large body of the viceroy's troops entered the Abruzzi. The command of this, with absolute power, was given to Don Adriano Acquaviva, count of Conversano, a nobleman of courage and very admirable prudence. The first thing he attempted, and without which little indeed could be done in that wild country of mountains and forests, was to conciliate the affections of the peasantry, who had been so troubled and oppressed by all his stupid predecessors in office, and the soldiery, that they could not but wish well to their enemies, the robbers. The count, therefore, abstained from quartering his troops in the villages; he imitated the conduct of Sciarra, and made them pay for whatever they consumed; he listened to the complaints of the aggrieved, and at last he so gained on the affections and better principles of the peasants, that they conspired with him for the extermination of the very banditti whom they had so often guided and concealed. With them, as guides, the soldiery had now a key to the mysteries and recesses of the mountains and forests.

Thus deprived of the protection of Piccolomini, pressed by Aldobrandini on the one side and by Conversano on the other, Marco Sciarra was fain to reflect on the tender made to him by the Venetian senators, and finally to accept the rank and service they offered him. They must still have thought him and those he could bring with him well worth having, for they despatched two galleys of the republic for their conveyance. In these ships Marco Sciarra embarked with sixty of his bravest and most attached followers, and, turning his back on his native mountains, sailed up the Adriatic to Venice. As soon as the Count of Conversano was informed of the robber chief's departure, he blessed his stars that the kingdom was quit of so dangerous a subject, and thinking now his business was over, returned to Rome, where the viceroy received him in triumph.

But the expatriating bandit left a brother behind him in the mountains of the Abruzzi; and Luca Sciarra, in due time gathered together the scattered bands, and commenced operations anew with considerable vigour. Meanwhile Marco and his men, who in their quality of subsidiaries served the Venetian republic very much to its satisfaction, corresponded with their former comrades at home. Marco's glory could not be forgotten! The soul of their body was at Venice—every thing of importance was fomented by him, and he frequently employed his "leaves of absence" in visiting them, and leading them, as of yore, in the more hazardous of their enterprises.

He had now been heard of so long—his deeds had been so desperate but successful, he had escaped so many dangers, that people concluded he must bear "a charmed life." His long impunity might almost have made him think so himself, when, landing one day in the marches of Ancona, between the mountains of the Abruzzi and that town, where the pope's commissary Aldobrandini still remained, he was met by a certain Battinello, to whom, as to an old follower, his heart warmed—with open arms he rushed to embrace him—and received a traitor's dagger in his heart.

Battinello had sold himself to Aldobrandini, and received for himself and thirteen of his friends, a free pardon from the Papal government for his treachery. For some years after the death of Marco Sciarra, there was a pause in his profession, whose spirit had expired with him. Other times brought other robbers, but his fame has scarcely ever been equalled—never surpassed.

THE BRIGANDS OF CALABRIA.

Such was the indomitable spirit of the Calabrians, that when King Murat was at the extremity of their peninsula with a formidable French and Neapolitan army, with which he was to beat the English and take Sicily, they again revolted and rose in his rear. His communication with the capital was continually intercepted, and he was obliged to detach several battalions from his camp to proceed against the brigands, and keep the roads open. The author of the Letters upon Calabria, a French officer, as one who had experience in these matters, was ordered to march back, and he turned his eyes with deep regret from that island of Sicily, of which the French made so sure, but which they were never to get! When he arrived in the district of Castrovinci, which is situated at the entrance into Calabria from the side of the capital, he found the whole country in the hands of the brigands, or insurgents. The inhabitants of the villages bordering on the mountain of Campotenese intercepted all communications, and plundered all the money forwarded to the camp, unless it was protected by a very powerful escort. Our author's battalion set about occupying the mountain passes with intrenched posts. This service presented great difficulties in consequence of the nature of their positions, and the character of the inhabitants, which was still more wild and ferocious than in the other parts of Calabria; and, moreover, the French were not at all acquainted with this part of the peninsula. The first place they halted at was Marmano. Here all seemed quiet; but at night three soldiers having gone out from a chet where they were quartered, were at once poniarded. The syndic, or principal magistrate, and six other leading characters, were arrested, and because they could not, or would not discover the assassins, were detained as prisoners. Leaving behind a body of troops in a convent as a point of retreat in case of need, the author of the Letters and the rest of the French set forward to scour the insurgent villages. They traversed some frightful mountains and yawning gorges. The continual dread of ambuscade made their march very slow. The old, the sick, and helpless alone were found in the miserable villages through which they passed; all the rest fled at their approach. It was necessary to know where these were assembling; and to this end the advanced guard seized two ferocious looking beings employed in tending flocks, real savages, whose mountain jargon it was almost impossible to comprehend. After threatening these fellows with death, the French contrived to learn from them that a gathering of several thousand men waited their approach in a defile which they must necessarily pass. The French advanced with rapidity, and by making a detour, forcing their way through almost impervious woods, they came, unexpected, on a multitude of peasants who were lying on the ground, most of them fast asleep, and all without order or preparation for defence. A volley set them to flight, killing and wounding, however, some of them. The French pursued them at the bayonet's point to a deep dell, at the extremity of which stands the village of Orsomarzo.

"It would be extremely difficult," says the author of the Letters, whom I leave to narrate this last and most desperate of his adventures in Calabria, "to meet with any situation more sublimely terrific and extraordinary than the spot where this village lies engulfed. Surrounded on all sides by gigantic mountains, terminating in conical points, it seems, as it were, placed at the bottom of a vast well. The descent is by a steep flight of steps, following the windings of a torrent, which rushes down with a loud roaring, and forms grand cascades. This torrent runs through the village, whence, finding vent in the narrow cleft of a rock, it fertilises a fine well cultivated country, which presents a most striking contrast with the horror inspired by this hideous abyss. It appears inconceivable how any human beings could ever have thought of fixing their abode in such a place. The path which follows the course of this torrent is cut through the rock; and it is impossible to engage in any conflict there with safety, unless the heights are entirely commanded at the same time. After having guarded the principal entrance of this savage retreat, by a detachment placed on the top of the only mountain on which a body of troops could be stationed, we went down the defile, was rather too far distant, but which, unfortunately, was Orsomarzo, to look for provisions, never once imagining that the peasants, whom we had so lately routed, would venture to show themselves again, during that day. We found the village quite deserted: every thing in it indicated the precipitation with which the inhabitants had fled from their homes. The doors of the greater part of the habitations were wide open, and we found in the houses provisions of every kind. While we were employed in collecting a stock, which should serve us for several days, we heard some shots fired, and at the same instant the surrounding mountains were occupied by a multitude of armed men. The detachment stationed at the entrance of the defile had just been attacked, and obliged to abandon its position, after having many men killed and wounded; at the moment we were advancing to its assistance, it was obliged to turn towards the village with the utmost precipitation. The peasants, who were in close pursuit, had nearly established themselves before us, so as to cut off all escape from this cut-throat abyss, where we were all now crowded together without any hope of being able to open a passage on that side. The detachment then hastened to the other outlet, where it was received with a shower of stones, and enormous pieces of rock hurled down from the top of the mountain. The latter crushed before my eyes two sappers and a drummer. Seeing that we could not encounter our murderous assailants in this passage, without the risk of utter destruction, we came to the resolution of hazarding every thing else to rescue ourselves from so dreadful a situation. Balls were showered upon us on all sides, and the piercing screams of women sounded horribly in our ears—screams which appeared to us those of the Furies implacably waiting the moment when they were to feast upon our blood. The drummers beat the charge, and we rushed towards this fatal spot with the energy of despair. The light company, having crossed the torrent under a shower of balls, had with extreme difficulty climbed up the steep side of a mountain, whence the incessant fire of the brigands caused us considerable loss; and at length these brave men succeeded in opening a passage for us, which nothing but the most desperate necessity could render practicable. The moment we gained the heights, our soldiers, absolutely furious, rushed after the Calabrians with all the impetuosity of rage. The greater part of them escaped, but a numerous group assembled on the point of a rock were massed on the spot, or perished by flinging themselves down the precipices. This unfortunate check has cost us upwards of sixty men; and, moreover, many of us have wounds and contusions, and balls that are not yet extracted. We marched during a part of the night on our return to the convent at Marmano, before these peasants (the most determined of any we had yet encountered in Calabria) could have time to intercept us. We entered the town to the beat of drum."

The French always make the best of their reverses, and never acknowledge a defeat; but here, according to the officer's own showing, they were soundly beaten; and if credit is to be given to some people of the country I have heard speak on the subject, the affair at Orsomarzo was still more serious than he has represented it. This was shown, indeed, by the effect produced. The insurrection spread, and the commander of the battalion was obliged to beg for reinforcements.

But shortly after this, Murat, returning humbled from his vain-glorious, futile attempt on Sicily, having embarked at the little port of Pizzo, to creep along shore towards Naples, was driven by the British cruisers under the battery of Cirella, which place, only a few days before, had been attacked and nearly taken by the Calabrians. Here he communicated with the commandant of the station, our author's superior officer, and having praised the conduct of his troops, said that, after three years' hard service in such a country as Calabria, it was high time they should change quarters. He made a characteristic remark on the unfortunate business of Orsomarzo—"Why did you go down into that cut-throat place?—However, you came up again like brave fellows!" and then, as soon as the English frigates let him, he continued his voyage along shore. The author of the Letters and his comrades soon went after Murat, following the movement of the army which returned to Naples by land; and he expresses his natural delight to be at last released from a wretched exile, and from a species of warfare which offered neither glory nor promotion, and left nothing in the end save disastrous chances.

* It was at this place that Joachim Murat was taken and shot when he made his last attempt to regain his kingdom. Never was madness equal to his in this instance, where, of all parts of the kingdom, the French was most thoroughly detested. Poor fellow! he had been the bravest of the brave; a man, too, with many kind and amiable qualities, and if he at all merited the death of a dog, he met with in the filthy courtyard of the gaol of Pizzo, (where, little more than a year after the event, I stood on the spot where he fell), it was by his having presided over the last execution of the Duke d'Enghien.

On turning his back on the mountains and brigands of Calabria, of which, it must be confessed, he has given us some interesting details, he informs us of the French plans for future proceedings there. "Extraordinary measures of severity are now to be resorted to—measures unfortunately rendered necessary by the deplorable situation of the country, but the execution of which will always be repugnant to Frenchmen. It has been clearly proved, that notwithstanding all our courage, activity, and perseverance, still we contend with great disadvantage against men born in the country, lightly armed, supported by a part of the population, and accustomed from their infancy to shoot with a deadly aim. These considerations have induced the government to resolve upon adopting a new system, according to which the troops are only to be employed in compelling the inhabitants to extirpate the brigands of themselves, under penalty of being regarded as their accomplices and abettors. For this purpose, ten thousand men are to be spread over the two provinces," &c.

And this new system was, indeed, soon set at work, and these extraordinary measures of severity soon deluged Calabria anew with blood. In the French General Manhes, Joachim Murat found the very man to superintend or direct these massacres en masse, and the Calabrians the most ruthless enemy that had ever been let loose upon them. I have heard stories in the country that would make humanity shudder—for the sake of that officer, (he is still living,) I hope these were untrue or immensely exaggerated. Yet it remains undisputed, and has even been admitted by those who served under him or with him, that Manhes was a cruel, pitiless man to the Calabrians, the people of the Abruzzi, &c. and acted up to a system of blood without once relenting. No mercy was ever extended to the outlaws who fell into his hands. Villages, whole towns, through which the inhabitants had allowed the brigands a passage, felt his tremendous vengeance. Any peasant, without distinction of sex or age, who was found going out to labour in the country, with more than a small flask of wine and a morsel of bread, calculated to be just sufficient to support life for one day, was taken and shot; for Manhes, having made pretty sure of the towns and villages, whence the brigands could no longer supply themselves, thought, if he could prevent the peasantry from smuggling out provisions to them, that they must either surrender themselves, or die of want in the mountain fastnesses to which he had driven them. If an honest man concealed, or corresponded with, or aided the escape of an outlaw—no matter, were it his own father, or son, or brother, he was forthwith executed. On one occasion, when a condemned brigand had escaped from the capella, or chapel, where it is usual to place criminals the night before their execution, he shot the priest who had been with him, alleging that he must have aided the robber in his flight.

By unusual severity like this, Manhes thought he put down brigandism in Calabria. The boast was partly made out by fact.

THE VARDARELLI.

Three brothers of this very respectable name enjoyed a higher and a longer celebrity than any, even of the Calabrian banditti, and may, perhaps, be entitled to the rank of the first brigands in modern times, of Naples—i. e. of Europe.

Hitherto their deeds have not met with regular historians; but the following are among the stories regarding them, which I picked up in the country. They may be considered as contemporary records, for when I collected them, the brigand brothers were alive, and pursuing their vocation with admirable activity.

The Vardarelli were of the superior class of peasantry—good Catholics, and faithful subjects of his Majesty Ferdinand IV.—at least, so they styled themselves, when, during the French occupation of the kingdom, irritated, some say, by the oppression of the foreigners, they took to the road, and levied contributions, after the manner of their loyal countrymen in Calabria. They did not, it is true, confine their operations to the despoiling of the French and the officers of government—but then the mass of the Neapolitan nation became infected with Gallic principles, and untrue to the legitimate king—consequently amenable to the vengeance of the Vardarelli, as long as they had any thing to lose.

The birth place of these heroes was said to be some where in the mountains of the Abruzzi; but the spot where they first made themselves known as public characters, and which their exploits rendered famous for so many years, was the valley of the Bridge of Bovino—a long, narrow pass, through which runs the only road from Naples to the vast plains of Apulia, the province of Bari, Lecce, &c. I passed by the Ponte di Bovino early in the year 1816, when the mere mention of its name caused fear and trembling. I have been there several times since; the last time in 1824, when the vigilance and severity of General del Carretto had decorated it with the heads and mangled quarters of some half-dozen of more modern, but less conspicuous brigands. It always struck me as being an admirable place for robbers—circumstance equally perceptible to the people of the country; for though they have ceased since the days of the Vardarelli to form organized bands there, they have never failed de tems en tems to lie in ambuscade,* and commit robberies. The pass is in general steep, and in some points very narrow; a deep ravine, through which froths and roars a mountain stream in the winter season, is on one side of the road—hills covered with trees or underwood lie on the other. In its whole length, which may be about fifteen miles, there are no habitations, save some curious caves cut in the face of the rock, a post-house, and a most villainous-looking tavern, where, as I shall presently show, I once passed a night—and that, too, when my head was full of Mrs. Radcliffe, and banditti, and I quite new in the country. In some places the hill and the wood, or concealing thicket, is so close on the road on the one hand, and the ravine on the other, that it is really quite enticing. A shot from the one, and the man's business is done—and there yawns a dark, capacious grave, to receive his body when deprived of what it is worth. And then, as regards security, who would follow the experienced robber through the mountain wood, or down the ravine, or be able to trace him to the hiding places and holes in the rocks that abound there? Across the mountains he has a wide range of savage country, without roads—without a path: on the other side of the chasm the localities are equally favourable; here he can, if hard-pressed and long, throw himself into the impenetrable forests of Mount Garganus, there into the not less remote and safe recesses of Monte Voltur.

Over the narrowest part of the valley, situated on the summit of a lofty and abrupt mountain, from the dark walls of the town of Bovino, like the castle of a feudal chief—the more honoured robber of earlier times.

In this valley, then, the Vardarelli remained for many years, and many years will yet pass ere the traveller shall traverse it without hearing stories about them. During the short reign at Naples of Joseph Bonaparte, these robbers were so formidable, they so entirely commanded the valley of Bovino, that rarely could a company of travellers pass without being stopped; a government officer, a government mail, or the revenue from the provinces, never without a little army for an escort. And all these troops were at times unable to afford protection, but were themselves beaten off, or slaughtered by the brigands. A journey to the capital from the Apulian provinces, was then to the peaceful inhabitants (always, be it said, rather timid travellers) an undertaking of solemn importance and peril; before embarking on which, not only were tapers burned under every saint of the calendar, and every Madonna that could show a portrait, but wills were made, and such tearful adieus, that one might have thought the Val di Bovino the real valley of death, or that the wayfarers were a forlorn hope going to storm a fortress, whose walls were cannon-ball and grape-shot, with gunpowder for their cement and their base.

Joseph Bonaparte once went through this pass to visit the provinces of his kingdom, situated beyond them. An immense force went with him, yet the robbers were heard to say afterwards, that had they known of the movement in time, they would have reinforced their troop with some other bands from the mountains of Basilicata and Calabria; pounced upon the king, and, God willing, carried him off, through the provinces just named, to Sicily, to King Ferdinand and the English. This might have been a mere bravado. The execution of such a plan would have been a splendid episode in the annals of brigandism.

It is to be remarked, that at this time the French confidently asserted, that the brigands here, as well as in Calabria, were protected and subsidised by the British government, and that the robber chiefs at the Ponte di Bovino were in possession of commissions signed by George III.

Joachim Murat, who succeeded his brother-in-law, whom Napoleon chose to transfer to Spain, was a man of more energy than Joseph, and with infinitely less talent contrived to render his government more popular, and indeed better than his immediate predecessor's. He set to work vigorously against the robbers, whose party was weakened as his gained strength, and as the nation at large gradually believed that the dominion of the French was this time to be an enduring one, and began to forget old Ferdinand.

The excursions of the robbers were checked, or limited; they could no longer range whole provinces, but at the Ponte di Bovino they were almost inexhaustible; and such were the advantages of the position, and the talents of the leaders of the band, that they continued to levy occasional contributions, and to elude all the vigilance of the numerous gens d'armes and police scattered over the country. At times, when they had not been heard of for weeks—for months—they would suddenly intercept the government proccacio, or carry off a party of travellers (known by them to be people of substance,) to their recesses in the mountains, where they would detain them until ransomed.

An event of the latter kind I had described to me at the not distant town of Foggia, by the Marchesa —, a native of the place, and one of the heroines of her own tale.

A marriage in the family was to take place—an important marriage, which, it was determined, from various considerations, should be celebrated at the capital. Accordingly, after due preparation, every thing was ready for departure:—bride and bridegroom, fathers and mothers, compares and commarcs, brothers and sisters, cousins of both genders, relations of all degrees, and friends—a formidable caravan (numerically speaking) of itself, set off one fine morning from Foggia, with a valorous escort of Neapolitan gens d'armes. They crossed the open plain, they reached the Ponte di Bovino—the robbers had not been heard of for a long time—all was quiet! The people at the post-house, near the bridge, at the mouth of the valley, gave the most satisfactory accounts—and on the party went. They went as far as the most convenient spot for a robber's attack, but no farther; for there the cries of "ferma assassani," "l'faccia in terra," were heard; the mounted gens d'armes turned their horses' heads, and galloped off, and in the next minute the whole line of carriages was surrounded by the brigands, with their long guns in their hands, and their knives in their belts.

The general practice of these robbers, when no more than personal spoliation is contemplated, is to make their patients lie down on the ground, and then, while one set keep watch over them, with their guns double cocked and aimed at them, another set proceed to rifle them. But now the sufferers were surrounded by a portion of the robbers, and marched up the hill's side into the woods, where they waited until the "other gentlemen" had unpacked the carriages, and brought up the valuables. They then all set off together, and after a march, very fatiguing to the Foggia gentry—particularly to the poor ladies, they halted at a large, low hut, in the middle of a thick wood. They were forced into the hut, where they found a group of women and children, and a rogue in the dress of a Capuchin friar, playing at cards with an old bedlam. There were two or three long benches in the hut, and on these, trembling and exhausted, the party sat down. Their apprehensions were of a very horrid nature. They expected something worse than robbery and captivity; for many of the banditti began to drink wine, and to honour the ladies of the party with their very particular attention. My friend the Marchesa — was a younger woman than when I had the honour of her acquaintance; the bride was very handsome, and more than one of the bride's maids were, at least, young. Just, however, as their alarm was reaching its most exquisite point, a noise was heard without the hut, and to the sounds of Don Gactano, Don Ignazio,

* The postillions here have always a dog with them, that is taught to run about a hundred yards a-head of the horses, and to bark if he see or scent anybody lurking near the road. These dogs are said to be remarkably sure and sagacious. If the postillions hear their bark, they turn their horses' heads and gallop back. I once underwent a retrograde motion of this sort, and I never travelled so fast in my life, as the last time I returned through the Val di Bovino, with the Prince DI —, in the middle of the night. Spite of the ascent, the postillion, who seemed to be in a fever of affright, galloped his horse nearly all the way.

two men, better attired, and of superior mien to the rest of the robbers, entered the hut—and all was silent! They were two of the chiefs. Encouraged by the more humane aspect of these men, the husband of mine informant approached them, and begged for protection for himself and party—the ladies joined in his entreaties.

"You have nothing to fear, Signor Marchese," said one of the chiefs, "you are in the hands of gentlemen, the faithful subjects of his Majesty Ferdinand IV. The Marchese expressed his satisfaction at the assurance, but begged he might be allowed to get out of such company, and continue his journey.

"We know you, Signor Marchese," said the chief, "and that you can afford a good ransom. We must detain you here until one of your servants goes to Foggia, and returns with it to a place we shall appoint."

This, to say the least of it, was a very uncomfortable prospect. The day was declining—it was impossible that the operations required by the robbers could be performed until the morrow, and there was no appearance of a single bed; the hut smoked, and smelt unpleasantly of mutton, for the women had commenced roasting a whole sheep, wool and all; in short, putting danger out of the question, and without calculating the number of ducats to be disbursed, it was a very uncomfortable prospect for the Marchese. He was feeling all this, when suddenly he was struck by the bronzed visage of a man he thought he had seen before somewhere. The Marchese thought so too, when told to look at him. As she looked, something like a tear came to the fellow's eyes; he threw his long gun in a corner, and, crossing the room, took the Marchese's hand, and respectfully kissed it. It was Gaetano, once their servant, a man to whom they had behaved with great kindness, years before, at Foggia.

After a proper recognition, this robber took the captains aside, and talked to them with great earnestness. His eloquence was effective. A minute or two after, the chiefs told the Marchese that he and his companions might continue their journey, after leaving, in addition to what had been taken from the carriage, the property they had about them. There was a little murmuring among the robbers; but it was the will of the chiefs that so it should be! Their voices soon imposed silence. The gentlemen and ladies, glad to be off instantly at any cost, began emptying their pockets, and unburdening themselves of every thing, save essential clothing, under the eyes of the banditti, who contented themselves by passing their hands over their persons, to feel if nothing were concealed—just as a custom-house officer may do. The young bride, however, with all her fears, was very tenacious of a pretty pair of drop ear-rings. An impatient, brutal robber, stretched out his brawny hand, and pulled at them, until she shrieked with pain. On seeing this indecorous deed, one of the chiefs, without saying a word, raised the butt-end of his musket. It descended with tremendous force on the ruffian's arm, which instantly fell helplessly by his side. It seemed broken by the blow.

The fellow uttered a cry and a horrid oath, laid his other hand to the knife in his girdle; but he merely touched it, and slunk away to the farther end of the hut, feeling, perhaps, how injudicious it would be to attempt avenging himself on a chief, and in such a place as that, where he was surrounded by men devoted to him.

The travellers then descended the hill, in matter and spirits much lighter than they ascended it. Their carriages were found where they had left them on the road, along which two or three peasants alone were riding on asses, secure in their own poverty, and indifferent to the scene of the empty carozze, and broken boxes, and scattered packing-cases, they had just passed, and perfectly well understood, for such things were common in those days at the Ponte Bovino.

The postillions and drivers were for the most part collected, after a little delay; the chiefs assured the company that, from the reputation of "brava gente," given to them by Gaetano, they were safe for the rest of their journey, and their return from Naples even; and La Signora Marchesa and spouse, bride, bridegroom, and all, set off as merrily as could be expected, up the pass, towards Ariana.

During the remainder of the reign of Murat, who was destined himself to be put to death like a brigand in Calabria, were his officers have committed such cruelties for the extirpation of banditti, this band presented themselves calling with greater or less activity, according to circumstances.

Many were the robberies they committed, but their acts of cruelty were few. Their favourite prize continued to be the proaccio, a kind of wagon, which travels night and day to the capital, with remittances from the receivers of the different provinces; it also carries merchandise, goods, parcels, and even passengers, and is generally escorted by an armed force.

"A famous captain of banditti," says K. Craven in his Tour, "who, during the latter part of the occupation of the kingdom of Murat, had successively gained possession of the contents of fourteen of these proaccio, is said to have brought them all to the legitimate Sovereign (Ferdinand), on his restoration, and to have obtained his pardon in consequence."

The same gentleman gives the following amusing incidents.

"Some years back, a gang, or, as it is called in the language of the country, a comitiva, of robbers, having seized the proaccio going from Naples to the principal town in the province of Basilicata, with all the paraphernalia appertaining to the court of justice, newly established there, thought it a very excellent joke to put on the judges' robes and wigs, and go through the mock ceremony of a trial; the judicial forms of which most of them were but too well acquainted with. This self-elected tribunal pronounced sentence of death on the very first traveller who might fall in their hands; and the day did not pass without an opportunity of carrying it into execution."

"At Orsara, a small village between Bovino and Troja, the usual amusement of the boys on a feast-day is to divide themselves into two bands, one of which guards a little wooden cart, filled with rubbish, representing the proaccio, while the other performs the more glorious part of the comitiva, which attacks it, and which, it is needless to add, always gains the victory." Bring up a child in the way he should go, &c.

When the political revolutions in Europe of 1814 and 1815 proved again the dictum of Ariosto, that the lily of France is destined never to take root in Italy, and Murat was hurled from his throne, the Vardarelli, as faithful subjects of his restored majesty Ferdinand, are said to have imitated the example of sundry of their co-laborateurs, and to have proposed renouncing their calling on conditions. But it is also said that the conditions were not agreed to by the government; and the more notorious fact is, that even when there were no more Frenchmen in the kingdom, the robbers of the Ponte di Bovino continued their depredations, paying no more respect to the revenue of Ferdinand, than they had done to Joachim's.

The first time I went through the valley of Bovino, was in the year 1816, not nine months after the happy restoration alluded to, and the Vardarelli were then in high feature. God knows I heard enough of them from my fellow-travellers long before I approached the spot; and for my further edification, when, crawling over the Apulian plain, which I thought was to have no end, we came in sight of the high mountains and the town of Bovino, and the dark looking gap beneath it, they recapitulated every horror. It was evening when we reached the post house by the famous bridge at the mouth of the valley. Here four miserable looking gens d'armes d' pied, with their carbines slung over their shoulders, got up in front of our still more miserable looking vettura, for our protection. I could not help thinking that our poverty was our best protection, as related to such a respectable band as the Vardarelli. The living part of the cargo consisted of a fat mendicant friar, a student, an old Greek woman from Corfu, who seemed to be the grandmother of all the Greek priests in the city of Lecce, where I had embarked with her; a pretty parasana, who was going to see a brother at Naples, who had been promoted to the rank of sergeant in the royal guards; myself, and a run-a-way English sailor I had picked up starving at Barletta, and was carrying on to the capital. Of one thing I was quite sure—that the soldiers, in case the robbers condescended to assault us, would be the first to run away, and I would about as soon have given my three carlins to the robbers as to the gens d'armes, which I was obliged to do at the end of their ride. My companions, however, were sorely afraid. The wild scene, and the time, and their whispering voices, (for the open-mouthed sonorous tones of the south had dropped into a general whisper as we went up the gloomy valley), did at last affect me, and I was glad when we reached our station for the night, the solitary taverna, though a more desolate, cut-throat looking place, can hardly be conceived.

The Rev. T. S. Hughes, one of the few English travellers that have gone through the valley of Bovino, and who must have passed somewhat more than a year before my first visit, gives this anecdote. "An occurrence had taken place connected with the very last journey of this vehicle (the proaccio) which threw all the country into alarm, and made every one advise us to proceed by sea to Naples. At a celebrated pass in the Apennines, called the Ponte di Bovino, a large corps of brigands, collected behind the rocks, had fired a volley upon the carriage, killed the horses and postilion, burned all the letters, taken out an unfortunate officer, whom they shot on the spot, and carried away a still more unfortunate female to their haunts in the mountains. Traces of this outrage presented themselves to our eyes in numerous musket-balls at this time sticking in the body of the machine; but we judged it expedient to proceed immediately after, the commission of such an act, since it was not very likely that it would be soon repeated. The terrors of our Italian companions amused us during the journey; but at the fatal pass their reason seemed almost overcome by their fears, which were not a little increased by a terrific thunder storm, whose echoes were fiercely reverberated among the rocks and valleys. We stayed at the post-house two hours before the storm abated, and when we arrived at the spot where the late attack had been made, we observed one of the horses lying by the road side, and its flesh already half stripped from the carcass by birds of prey. As for the banditti, we saw none of them, except a few wretches bound with cords, in custody of the peasants, who, after this last outrage, had collected together in large bodies, headed by their priests, dispersed the villains from their haunts, and rescued the captive lady, much to the credit of Italian gallantry."

It was about a year after this that I was wandering in the same country, but in a different manner, for I had had enough of vetturini and their passengers. I had come on horseback from Lecce to Bari with the courier or post carrier, travelling the whole of one dark cold night and one day without stopping, except to change horses, and take a hurried morsel of food. This hasty way of proceeding would not suit for the rest of the country I wished to traverse, which was very interesting, and which I had never yet examined. So at Bari I determined to hire horses by the day, and from place to place, taking a man with the second horse with me, to return the beasts, and to act as my guide. I rode in one short delightful day from Bari to Barletta. Here again my ears were filled with tales of my old friends the Vardarelli, who had become naughtier than ever. Several people persuaded me not to continue my journey as I was doing, for I was now approaching their range of country, and I had some difficulty in hiring a man and horses. The next day, however, I struck over the plain of Apulia, visited the site of ancient Canne, and arrived in the afternoon at the town of Canosa, just in time to see a fight between some Carbonari and Caldairi, in which two men of the place were nearly killed, and one killed outright. What with factions and robbers this part of the kingdom of Naples was then in a pretty state!

I made Canosa my head-quarters for more than a week, exploring the country thence every day, and returning to sleep at night. Whilst staying here, the following news was received one morning, and disconnected a courting match I had engaged in with some gentleman of the town.

A Major ———, a Swiss officer of talent and well-known courage in the service of King Ferdinand, had been sent down to Barletta with a force of light horse and light infantry, to keep the robbers in check, and if possible to destroy them. In consequence of some concerted plan, or of some hints given him, he marched from Barletta to Cerignola, a small town on the opposite side of the wild plain, a day or two after I quitted the former place. Lying quiet and perdu at Cerignola, he had received information in the night of the day before the news reached us at Canosa, that the Vardarelli had advanced again into the open country, and had taken possession of a masseria, or farm house, not far off. He instantly put his men in motion, but it was daylight before he reached the masseria. The robbers were on the alert; they had not, however, time to saddle and mount before the place was surrounded by the troops, who might be about ten times their number. Major ——— thought he had them in a trap, and sent forward a non-commissioned officer to summon them to surrender. The answer of the Vardarelli was pronounced by a musket, which wounded the soldier, and sent him groaning to the rear. The Swiss then determined to storm the masseria, but the walls that surrounded it were high and strong, he had no artillery, and when his men approached the heavy entrance gate, the robbers within fired at them through loop-holes, resting their long guns in the little embrasures, with so deadly an aim, that two were left dead, three or four wounded; the rest ran back as fast as their legs could carry them. The bold Swiss then encouraged his troops as best he could, and headed a number of them in a fresh attack on the gate; but his men were Neapolitans, the greater part of them slunk behind, and he himself was soon forced to fall back out of the robber's range of fire with a wound in the hand.

While storming from the pain he suffered, and at the pusillanimity of those he commanded, to his no small surprise Major Craven saw the gate a few minutes after thrown open, and the robbers issue forth well mounted and armed. Almost before he could give the word of command to concentrate, the Vardarelli dashed through the line of the beleaguers, who made way for them, and galloped across the plain. He put his cavalry in motion after them; but the men, protesting that their horses were no match for the fresh ones of the robbers, soon drew rein. The Vardarelli then halted, and after a shout of insulting triumph, calmly trotted off towards the mountains.

This event naturally made a great noise "all over the country," and as in prosecution of my journey I had to go through the valley of Bovino again, or into the very den of the robbers, innumerable were the warnings I received. A young lady of the house where I had been staying at Canosa, thought my peril so imminent, that in bidding me farewell, and recommending me to the Madonna's protection, and pronouncing in her patois, "God send you well through it!" absolutely shed tears. But I was eighteen years of age then, and tolerably adventurous; and, not to put my courage in too prominent a light, pretty confident that the Vardarelli would not notice a whimsical traveller with nothing but a little portmanteau and a sketch-book at his back, and a few ducats in his pocket. (As for the steeds I procured, two such wretched lasses were never seen since Bolingbroke mounted King Richard.) Not to be too fool-hardy, however, as my friends flattered me by saying I looked troppo distinto (too distinguished a personage) as I was, I procured a rough brown peasant's cloak, which I wore over my English garments, and substituted the high conical hat of the country for my travelling cap. This travestimento was very complete. My own mother would hardly have known me, and as I rode down the hill on which Canosa stands, I nearly tumbled over my horse's ears, by laughing at the figure I was cutting.

That evening I stopped at Castelluccio, a little village very near the Ponte di Bovino, with a reputation little superior to Bovino itself. As I rode into the village after my guide, a lazy cooper of Canosa, I met three fellows with long guns walking leisurely out of it. They stared at us, but did nothing but interchange the "buona sera" (good evening!) with us. My man of the butts and casks would have it they were robbers. It might have been so, for they were ill-visaged dogs, but they never troubled me, though the bugs at my hostel at Castelluccio did most cruelly.

On starting the next morning very early, my companion regretted that no chapel was open in the village where he could refresh his soul with a mass, and when we entered into the mouth of the valley, there was no end to his crossing himself. I rode through the Val di Bovino, however, just as safely as I had done the year before, and reached the lofty town of Ariana, where all danger from robbers was supposed to cease, just as the sun was setting on one of the most extensive and lovely scenes it has been my lot to observe.

Shortly after my arrival at Naples, I learned that King Ferdinand, whose reign had been marked by two flights from his capital and continental dominions, and numerous other humiliations, had set the final signet to his debasement, by treating with and finally signing an act of capitulation with the Vardarelli, who were therewith admitted to his service and pay. The whole band was allowed to form a regular corps, still commanded by the same leaders, who received a monthly salary, and engaged to secure the valley of Bovino and the provinces which they had so long ravaged, from all similar attacks for the future. People in the capital stared at each other when this news was announced, and they reflected on the qualities of the contracting parties—a Bourbon prince, the king of the Two Sicilies, and an Abruzzese peasant, a brigand chief. But so it was! and even so weak was this despotic government.

"The most celebrated troop of robbers in our days," says R. K. Craven, "was that of the Vardarelli, who invested the provinces of Apulia and the borders of Basilicata and Abruzzi, and were supposed to have collected immense wealth. To trace the progress of a life like theirs, would be a difficult but not uninteresting task: by turns, soldiers, deserters, partisans, and traitors—by turns, imprisoned, punished, penitent, restored to society, or relapsed into guilt—exhibiting traits of singular personal bravery, united to instances of the most extraordinary cunning—and occasional proofs of disinterestedness, contrasted with rapacity the most unbridled;—the recital of their adventures would by far surpass the legends of our most illustrious highwaymen, footpads, or smugglers.

"This band selected Apulia as the theatre best adapted to their system of depredations: its vast, unenclosed plains, occasionally interspersed with patches of underwood, but in no part offering obstacles to the rapidity of their movements; the rare occurrence of large towns; the magnitude of the farms or masserias, where they were sure to find provisions, forage, and booty united; all these circumstances combining with their local knowledge of the country, and the terror which they had impressed on its inhabitants, had rendered their power sufficiently formidable to resist, or at least elude, the means pursued by government for their destruction. Well armed and accoutred, and excellently mounted, their troop was also trained to the most rigid discipline; and Don Gaetano, the elder of the brothers Vardarelli, as well as commander of the band, displayed an activity and skill worthy of a nobler profession. It should be observed that they seldom, if ever, attacked travellers; and their outrages were generally unsullied by cruelty, except in some cases of revenge for breach of promise; but this false glare of generosity and forbearance, as well as the ample rewards which they bestowed upon their spies and abettors, and the acts of charity by which they endeavoured to propitiate the feelings of the poorer class, rendered them only a more destructive scourge to the community at large. A person who had been a severe sufferer by their misdeeds very justly observed to me, that it was very easy to give a hundred dollars to the poor out of the thousands stolen from the rich; and as their generosity could be estimated by this rule only, the motives of it may be duly appreciated.

"The Apulian farms consist of several buildings appropriated to the different branches of rural economy, which the nature of the soil admits of; and the number of individuals employed in the various departments of labour is sometimes very great, especially during the winter season, when the cattle are all collected in the masseria for the sake of a milder abode. All these attendants and their superiors, including the agente, or what we should call the steward, reside within the walls which always enclose these establishments. The reader may easily form some idea of the panic spread by the appearance of the Vardarelli in one of these colonies, composed chiefly of timid shepherds and their families, or labourers, as unused to the exercise as they are unprovided with the means of resistance.

"The robbers' marches, generally performed in the night-time, were so incredibly rapid, that the terror they inspired was equalled only by the astonishment created by operations apparently supernatural; and they have been known to have remained two or three days in one of these farms, before the inmates of those adjoining have been aware of their proximity. During this time they usually feasted on whatever the premises afforded, always obliging their inhabitants to partake of the fare prepared for them, through fear of poison. On an occasion of this nature, when the principal agents of the farm excused themselves from eating meat because it was a fast-day, Don Gaetano approved their abstinence, which, he assured them, quite agreed with his practice in war; only, he alleged his mode of life, and the uncertainty of his dinner hour, as an apology for the infraction of it. On removing from the scene of action, they always took with them what money could be collected, and as much grain as their horses could carry.

"Sometimes the demand, or rather command for forage, cash, provisions, and even clothes, was not made personally, but imposed through the medium of a letter to the superintendent of the farm. Neglect, or even delay, in complying with the summons, or the most distant appearance of treachery, was followed by the destruction of the cattle, and the confiscation of the peasants. In these cases the mandate was confided to a peasant or labourer, whom the troop might meet accidentally. Frequently they would stop passengers, and exact the exchange of good fresh horses against their own jaded ones; while more than once they have merely bartered their silver against an equivalent sum in gold, which might be found upon the person of the traveller."

For some time after their treaty with King Ferdinand, the Vardarelli very correctly kept their part of the engagement, and no robberies were heard of at the Ponte di Bovino, or in that neighbourhood. There was, however, a long accumulated account of vengeance scored against them in the hearts of many individuals who had suffered from their rapacity or violence; the government, moreover, was said both to fear that by some sudden revulsion they would adopt their old modes of life, and to nourish a vindictive feeling against the men who had foiled them so often. Indeed, it was currently reported in the capital at the time, that the quarrel in which the daring brothers fell, was excited by the treacherous emissaries of government, who thus hoped to rid themselves of the Vardarelli without the open odium of treachery and cruelty to men they had honoured with a capitulation. Either of these causes might have produced the effect, or it might very well have been produced by a union of the two. Mr. Craven only alludes to the more apparent one.

"But it was not to be expected that so lawless a confederation should long continue faithful to their engagements, or that the inhabitants, snatching under the infliction of outrages so recent, should ever look upon the authors of them with any feelings but those of mistrust or revenge: in fact, about a month previous to my quitting Naples, they had been engaged in a serious contest with the natives of an Albanian village, called Ururi, on the borders of the Abruzzi; and these last, rising in superior numbers, killed the three brothers with nine of the troop, and compelled the remainder to seek their safety in flight. It was said that the principal promoter of this affray had lost his father by the hands of the Vardarelli. From that period the remnant of the band had retired to the neighbouring mountains, and had, under various pretences, eluded the order which they received, to unite, and present themselves at a stated spot, where the affair should be investigated. Aware, probably, of having been the aggressors in the conflict which terminated so fatally to their leaders, or, distrustful of the intentions of government, they had delayed obeying its commands; and I had purposely retarded my departure from the capital, to avoid the risk of falling in with them on their way to the headquarters of the district, where it was expected that by this time they might in all probability have arrived. At Troja, indeed, I was induced to look upon this event as certain, for that portion of their corps, which was dismounted, consisting of about thirteen, had assembled there a short time before."

We are now come to "the last scene of all, which ends this strange eventful history," and here Mr. Craven's narrative possesses the interest that only an eye-witness can give.

"At last I arrived at Foggia, the capital of the Capitanata, which has gates, but no walls, the houses being so irregularly scattered about, that it is difficult to fix precisely where the town begins. I could find no lodgings at the numerous inns which displayed their signs on either side of me, but were already filled by the arrivals for the ensuing fair, so that I had penetrated some way into the city before there appeared any chance of being accommodated at all; when, just as I had turned out of a street, or rather square, in which I had observed some troops drawn out as for a parade, a sudden volley of musketry, which I took for the crash of a building falling, followed by a general flight of the inhabitants, uttering cries of terror and dismay, arrested my attention: soon after, a gentleman hurrying by, desired me to alight, which I did, though utterly unable to guess the motive of this advice; while a second as strenuously recommended my remounting my horse and galloping away. The first idea that darted across my mind was that of an earthquake, and a number of persons rushing at once out of an adjoining house tended to confirm it. I walked on, in vain addressing the fugitives who passed me in every direction, till a boy took my horse's bridle, and led him through some obscure by-roads to an inn at the skirts of the town, where we took refuge in a room on the ground-floor, into which my servants and guide, together with all the horses and myself, entered as if by one common instinct, but still in total ignorance of the cause of alarm. The cries of several women, tearing their hair, and the incoherent exclamations they uttered, among which I could only distinguish the word brigands, at last led me to conjecture that a party of banditti had forced their way into the town, and were engaged with the regular troops. The door had been carefully barricaded at the moment of our entrance; but through the small windows several soldiers were observable lurking about in parties, with their muskets ready, and at times a dragoon passed at full gallop, apparently engaged in pursuit. These circumstances, and occasional musket-shots, confirmed my suspicions; but that a gang of robbers, however daring and desperate, should have made an attack at mid-day on a large city respectably garrisoned, seemed so improbable that I continued in a state of doubt, till the son of my hostess made his appearance; and after being repeatedly kissed and wept upon by his mother and her dishevelled companions, he gave me a clearer insight into the affair, by relating, in an imperfect manner, the details, which were subsequently made known to me from a source more authentic, and which are as follow.

"The remainder of the Vardarelli band had presented themselves that morning at Foggia; they formed, in fact, part of the troops I had seen, and were at the moment I passed engaged in a war of words, which soon was waged with more deadly weapons. It seems that the general, who had received intimation of their arrival, gave orders for them to be inspected the instant it took place. After they had dismounted and given a satisfactory account of their late proceedings, they received directions to repair to Lucera, and there await further commands. This mandate they positively refused to obey, and a long altercation took place between them and an officer sent from the commander's house, before which they were ranged, to remonstrate on the imprudence, not to say temerity of their behaviour. The general finally commanded the two leaders to repair to his own apartment to speak to them: this they objected to do without their arms, which they declared they would never part from; and it is supposed that the language they made use of in the course of their argument so exasperated the officer, that he roughly pushed one of them back, who was using threatening gestures; on which the other fired his musket at him, but having missed his mark, was shot dead on the spot by the sentry at the gate. This was the signal of an attack from his companions, that was immediately answered by a round of musketry from the troops who were drawn out close to them, which killed several, and spread consternation among the crowds of townspeople who had assembled on the spot. Four of the band, who had presence of mind to spring upon their horses, escaped in different directions out of the town, though followed by cavalry, and fired at as they fled. Another portion were made prisoners; but a third division sought security in a cellar, the first place of refuge which offered itself, and which having only one very low entrance, afforded them a defensible asylum for some time: the depth and darkness of this receptacle made it difficult to attack them with success, for they killed a soldier, and wounded several others who had ventured too near the aperture. Of this last desperate set, four, however, gave themselves up, and made known the number that remained. In order to bring as speedily a termination as possible to the dismay and agitation which this event had spread throughout the city, two of those who had been last taken were sent in to their companions with their hands tied to persuade them to surrender, and to inform them, if they persevered in a resistance, which, from the local nature of their retreat, must be unavailing, a straw fire would be lighted at the orifice, as the only means of hastening their compliance or destruction. The unfortunate men never returned, and no answer being given, this threat was put into actual execution, and the aperture blocked up with stones. Imagination pictures their situation as most horrible; but its terrors were eluded by the last resource of despair. Two hours afterwards the cellar was entered without opposition, and their lifeless bodies, covered with wounds, indicated the death they had received at each other's hands.

"In about five hours some degree of tranquillity was restored to the city; and it was evident that the feelings of alarm occasioned by this singular event, and even those of aversion and universal reprobation which the excesses of the banditti had excited, now yielded to emotions of compassion, called forth by so terrific and untimely a death. Even the policy which prompted this severe punishment met with comments and constructions by no means favourable to those whose duty it was to inflict it.

"In the evening the shops were re-opened, and I ventured to send my letters of recommendation to the general commandant of the division, and the intendant, who both showed me every attention and civility during my stay. But I had with me a document of similar import addressed to a very different character.

"On my leaving Benevento, one of its most respectable inhabitants, fearing I might encounter the Vardarelli troop on their way to head-quarters, gave me a letter of introduction to one of them, which he assured me would be the means of securing me from all such danger, as the existing uncertainty of their projects and movements might render possible if not probable. The robber to whom it was addressed had been employed on a farm of the writer, and retained a friendly and even respectful feeling towards his former master, which had shown itself on several occasions since they had parted. Curiosity led me to enquire whether this person was among the survivors of the dreadful catastrophe of the morning; and having sent to the prison where they were confined, for the purpose of ascertaining the fact, I was answered in the affirmative, and conducted, as I imagined, to the cell which contained the object of my enquiries. It seems that the substance of my message having been conveyed from mouth to mouth, had undergone a material change in its purport; and before I was rendered aware of the misunderstanding, I found myself in a low vaulted room, at the back of the public prisons, and standing opposite to several naked bodies exposed on some straw. One of these was pointed out to me as that of the individual whom I sought.

"The infliction of a sudden and violent death on a robust and active frame is far from producing those effects which the repeated attacks of disease, or the gradual decay of the vital powers, leave impressed in characters so awful or offensive on the human countenance. The setting rays of the same sun which had cast its morning radiance on beings moving in the full energy of existence, now shone on their lifeless but not inexpressive features. The turmoil of passions which had agitated the last dreadful moments of their existence was visibly, though variously, depicted in every face, nor could the expression be mistaken; the sullen brow strongly contracted over the glaring eyeball, the pallid lip curled to a sardonic smile, each bespoke the final agonies of desperate bravery, ineffectual revenge, or the hopeless struggles of expiring crime.

"The colour of the cheeks was fixed, but not extinct, and nought but the attitude was that of death. They had been stripped of every article, save the reliquaries, or consecrated images, which the lower classes in Italy invariably wear round their neck, and which now rested on the ghastly wounds that disfigured their bodies, some of which were also blackened by smoke. None of these men were above the age of forty, while most of them were considerably younger. It was said that individuals of every nation were to be found in their ranks; but I believe that a Frenchman and a Hungarian were the only two who were not natives of Italy."

Thus ended the famous Vardarelli. The following amusing particulars are also from the pen of the gentleman who so vividly represented the scenes of their destruction. Mr. Craven went from Foggia to Cerignola, another town in the plain of Apulia.

"A letter, which I had brought from Foggia to the syndic, procured me a visit from that gentleman, and an apology for some delay in making it, occasioned by the return of his brother from the adjoining province of Basilicata, where, only a few days before, he had been carried by a party of fourteen brigands. This had happened on the very evening of that day which witnessed the destruction of the Vardarelli, and though the parties had no connection with each other, the coincidence was remarkable. It seems that this comitiva was but lately organized, and had hitherto confined its practices within the boundaries of Basilicata, to which it belonged; but tempted by the reputed wealth of the syndic of Cerignola, the banditti had lain in ambush for a whole night, near a house and farm which he possessed, three miles from the town, and after waiting all the next day, which his brother had spent there, in the act of superintending the rural concerns of the family, they seized upon him and an attendant at dusk, just as they were preparing to go home; and, crossing the Ofanto, which, at no great distance from the spot, divides the two provinces, they forced him to walk thirty miles in the course of that night, to reach the mountain of Melfi. Here they halted among the woody recesses, which afforded them a secure retreat, and detained him, while they sent back his servant with the terms they fixed for his ransom, and powers to negotiate for its payment. The demand which they at first advanced was so exorbitant, that the wretched prisoner, aware of the inability of his relatives to raise a sum so considerable, assured them that they might as well kill him at once as require it. To this they very indignantly replied, that they were not wretches capable of committing murder, and assured him that he need fear no personal injury; although they had, for the sake of expedition and safety, urged the speed of his nocturnal progress by occasional blows, and followed his person with slight but frequent applications of the well sharpened points of their stilettes. They lowered, however, their demands; and, after a few days' negotiations, agreed to liberate him for the sum of twelve hundred ducats, a hundred yards of velvet for pantaloons, and several dozen of silver buttons and buckles for the same. The difficulty of purchasing these articles, without incurring suspicion, will account for their insertion as part of the ransom. If the reader asks how these treaties are carried into effect, and who the individuals are that act as negotiators, I can only say, that the principal sufferers are anxious to conceal the details of transactions forbidden by a law, which humanity and compassion always transgress. It is to be observed, that, except in revenge for treachery and evident breach of faith in the fulfilment of these agreements, the banditti have generally been found true to their word, while few among the unhappy objects of their rapacity have fallen victims to a spirit of wanton ferocity, and they are always restored for much less than the sum originally required. It is scarcely necessary to add, that I allude to this, not in extenuation of so abominable a practice, but merely as a custom which they probably adhere to so punctually, for the sake of inspiring greater confidence in their promises."

DON CIRO, OR THE PRIEST-ROBBER.

This extraordinary man, whose atrocities far exceed those of his contemporaries (and sometimes his friends) the Vardarelli, was born in the little Neapolitan town of Grottaglie. His parents, who were in easy circumstances, destined him for the ecclesiastical profession, which he entered very young. Having gone through the routine of a priest's education at the seminario and collegio, he was in due course of time ordained by the bishop of the diocese, and received the mass. The brothers of Don Cirò, most respectable farmers, and his uncle the Canon l'attaro, neither of whom ever took any part in his crimes, were alive and in the enjoyment of unblemished reputation a very few years ago, and are probably still living.

Don Cirò, even at an early period of life, showed very great talents—qualities indeed that might almost claim the high epithet of genius; but unfortunately he possessed also what so frequently accompanies genius, a most ardent and passionate temperament. With a disposition—a resistless impulse to love ever working within him, he was forbidden the indulgence of that most natural and potent of all passions by his sacred profession and his vows. Cirò Anicchiario unfortunately became enamoured of a lady, his own townsman. This was the key to all his crimes. His passion was too impetuous to be concealed, and his townfolk talked lightly of him: a young man of the place, a schoolfellow, and once a friend, met with more favour in the eyes of the lady than the priest could hope for. Cirò saw evidences of this one day. He rushed out of the house, and providing himself with a gun, lurked behind a wall until his rival should approach. The young man came, but never went from the fatal spot. Cirò, who was even then a good marksman, shot him dead, and slunk away fancying to escape discovery. Some rumours, however, were soon raised by the Motelsi, the family of the priest's victim. Cirò's thirst for vengeance was not satisfied with one murder; he had vowed to exterminate the whole family of the Motelsi. Their murmured suspicions perhaps hastened their fate; and one after the other every individual of that house, save one, had disappeared from the little town of Grottaglie. (The individual who escaped lived shut up in his house for several years, without ever daring to go out, and the unhappy being, even fifteen years after the murder of his kindred, thought that a snare was laid for him when people came to tell him of the imprisonment, and shortly after, of the death of his remorseless enemy; and it was with great difficulty that he was induced to quit his retreat.)

When he had gratified his revenge, and found that the tardy justice of his country was about to proceed against him, he fled from his native town. Whether he became a brigand then, does not appear; but he shortly after played the part of a hero, for on learning that the government, ever injudicious and tyrannical, had thrown his innocent brothers into prison, "he flew," he said, "on the wings of fraternal love" to effect their release, and presented himself to the extraordinary judiciary commission of Apulia sitting at Trani. The innocence of his brothers was made evident, and they were released, but all the ingenuity and eloquence of the abbe (for he had attained that sacerdotal grade) could not save himself. Capital punishment, however, was then rare in the kingdom of Naples, and convicted and manifold murderer as he was, he was only sentenced to the galleys for fifteen years. For four years he was confined in the most horrid dungeons, never being sent to the place appointed for his transportation, though he several times petitioned for that removal, which would have enabled him to breathe fresh air at least for a certain number of hours each day. It would be too horrible to reflect on the workings of a mind like his, in darkness and utter solitude—in a very hell! from which, as might be expected, he came out a fiend indeed!

At the expiration of the fourth year of his dreadful confinement he contrived to escape. But whither could he go without friends or money? The government of his country had now passed into the hands of the French, who exercised it with more energy than the old Bourbons. But the provinces, as I have already explained, were overrun by desperate men, in whom, for a long time, were confounded the characters of brigands and political partisans. The Abate Ciro, therefore, went and joined one of the most notorious of these bands, which soon acknowledged him as their chief, and grew in numbers and prospered under his guidance and fostering talents. Under other circumstances he might have been an excellent soldier—he turned out a most accomplished bandit. Not one of the band could fire his rifle with so sure an aim, or mount his horse like the priest Don Ciro. In the course of his vagabond and hard life, being obliged to hide for seasons in the most horrible holes of the rocks or depths of the forest, and not infrequently suffering the want of the merest necessities for human sustenance, he acquired a strength of constitution, a resoluteness of purpose, and an adroitness and cunning the most remarkable, even among men whose modes of life, of necessity, confirmed and strengthened the same qualities.

One of his first exploits, after escaping from the dungeons of Lecce, was to penetrate with his satellites into one of the first houses of the little town of Martano, where, after having offered violence to the person of its mistress, he murdered her, and all her people, and decamped with a large sum of ready money. This deed was followed up by numerous crimes of the like nature, until what with truth, and a little natural exaggeration, the amount of delinquencies was most fearful, and nothing was heard of but Ciro Anacchiario. This was so much the case, that some years after, when he thought it expedient to send in a justification of his conduct, he said that, "whatever robbery, whatever murder, whatever assassination was committed on the face of the earth, was instantly attributed to the Abate Anacchiario."

The extent of this reputation could not but be dangerous to him—yet he continued, year after year, to elude every pursuit, and to baffle the many hundreds of soldiers that were occasionally sent against him. He was always well mounted. A retreat of thirty or forty miles in a day, was as nothing to him—and even when confidential spies had revealed the place of his concealment but a few hours before, and his pursuers came upon him with the full confidence that they should take him at last, his skill and activity always served him at need, and he escaped. This singular good fortune, or rather talent, of being able to extricate himself from the most imminent dangers, acquired for him, among the people, the valuable reputation of a necromancer, upon whom ordinary means of attack had no power; and Ciro, becoming aware of this, neglected nothing which could confirm the idea, and increase the sort of spell it produced upon the ignorant, superstitious peasants. The country people, indeed, soon carried their fears so far, that they dared not excrete, or even blame Don Ciro in his absence, so firmly were they persuaded that his demon would immediately inform him of it and render them obnoxious to his bloody revenge.

Meanwhile, a robber by profession—an unholy wizard in the imagination of other men—a devil in reality, Don Ciro never wholly relinquished his sacerdotal character; on the contrary, he would frequently perform its functions, celebrating the mass and other solemn rites to the banditti—who are generally found in Italy to have a strong relish for religion, such as it is, and who will send a knife into your bosom while a crucifix and a reliquary repose upon their own. Further to strengthen the anomaly of his position as a priest, he was accustomed to declare the whole catholic priesthood regents without faith; and he affected himself a very libertine character, addicting himself in a particular manner to the perusal of indecent French songs, a whole collection of which was once found in his portfolio. Moreover, his passion for one woman generalised itself; and besides its accidental gratification, he had, at the period of his power, mistresses in all the towns of the province.

The other bands of banditti, compared with this priest-robber's, were angels of mercy. Yet in the course of perpetrating the most ruthless crimes, Don Ciro would sometimes indulge in whims to which he tried to give an air of generosity. General D'Ottavio, a Corsican in the service of Murat, had long been pursuing him with a thousand men. One day Ciro, whose audacity was frequently quite romantic, armed at all points, surprised the general, unarmed and alone, walking in his own garden. He discovered himself—pronounced his dreaded name, and remarked, that the life of the general, who sought his life, was in his hands. "But," said he, "I will pardon you this time, although I shall cease to be so indulgent if you continue to hunt me about with so much fury!" Thus saying he leaped over the garden wall and disappeared.

When King Ferdinand was restored to his states on the continental side of the Faro by the great political game of Europe, in which he had been about as neutral as a marker in whist, he recalled, as I have already mentioned, such as had been fauvisti for political opinions. There were many robbers in this number, but Ciro Anacchiario's crimes were of too deep a die. Yet this bold villain did not fear to present himself to the public authorities at Lecce, claiming his majesty's amnesty. The magistrates gave him a safe conduct to the city of Bari, where he was to reside, under the eye of the police, for the present. He pretended afterwards that he felt remorse and repentance at this time, and even entertained a serious idea of shutting himself up in the college of the missionaries, and passing the rest of his days in fasting and prayers. "I was on the point," said he in his justification, "of following up my noble resolution, when the thunderbolt burst upon my head (allorché intesi lo scroscio del violentissimo fulmine, che si scagliava sul mio capo). I have not force enough to express to you, how my heart was rent, or the deplorable state which I miserably sank into, when I was secretly informed by a faithful friend, that my arrest was ordered on the cruel accusation of having infringed the royal mandate. I vanished like lightning from Bari; I went to the capital to obtain redress, and to discover once more the black conspiracy against me. All was vain. The hopes I had cherished disappeared; and while perplexed as to the steps I ought to take, the power of my relentless persecutors prevailed. At last I left the capital, and guided only by that fortitude and constancy so necessary in my misfortunes, I betook myself to my old haunts in the solitude of the forests, and recommenced a savage and wretched life."

This was at the end of 1815: towards the termination of the following year, Don Ciro, having well employed the intervening time, and now taking the alarm at the adoption of vigorous measures by the government to put down the brigands, conceived the bold idea of uniting all the various bands of robbers and outlaws, of whatever faction or denomination, to oppose the march of the king's troops with all the forces they could muster, and otherwise to assert henceforward one common cause.

The Vardarelli, the most conspicuous of the robbers, were then enjoying the honours of their royal capitulation and were in the king's pay; but Ciro knew there were grounds of fear and dissatisfaction existing among them, and hoped to induce them "to turn out" again. He therefore invited them, with the chiefs of other bands, to a personal conference, in order, in the first place, to treat of the measures to be pursued against the General Church, who was coming into their provinces at the head of the king's troops; and these worthies had, accordingly, two different interviews, the first at the end of 1816, in a little deserted chapel, where Don Ciro celebrated mass before he began the conference, and the second in the month of March or April 1817, in a farm between S. Eramo and Gioja. Gaetano Vardarelli differed as to the propriety of a junction. He represented that it would be well to act in concert, but still separately, and that they ought by all means to avoid a general insurrection, of which they might easily become the victims. "As long," said he, "as our bands are not numerous, government will be deceived, and make war upon us feebly, as it does now; but as soon as we form ourselves into a more important body, it will be forced to send an army against us." It appeared, that the Vardarelli, though dissatisfied, were inclined to wait events; and their advice, or non-adhesion, overset Don Ciro's grand plan.

But still bolder and more comprehensive was the next project of this extraordinary man. Seeing the country overrun by sects and secret societies, which, under the names of Carbonari, &c. aimed at political changes, differing in quality, but all equal in absurdity, and some of which exercised vengeance too horrible and rites too disgusting or ridiculous to mention,—he fancied that, by placing himself at the head of one of these, he could not only gratify his passion for plunder and revenge, but ultimately erect himself into the chief of a wonderful republic, whose influences were to be felt, not over Naples or Italy alone, but over the whole extent of Europe, whose monarchs, whether constitutional or absolute, were all to sink under the dagger of his votaries. Ciro Anacchiario does not appear to have created either, but to have united two of these mysterious societies of cut-throats, who had assumed the names, the one of "I Patrioti Europei," (The European Patriots), the other of "I Decisi," (The Decided or Resolute). If the affiliation I have heard traced be correct, these sects both rose out of the Carbonari; and the moderate and respectable men—and there were many and many thousands such—of that secret society, ought to have paused and shuddered when they saw how easily their conduct might be imitated and perverted, and to what horrors secret societies might be turned. These associations of the "Patriots" and the "Decided" increased rapidly, from the weakness of the government in neglecting, at first, to punish the guilty, and from the notorious corruption of the inferior government officers and lower clergy. It was found that priests were attached to all their camps and ramifications. Besides our robber-priest, Don Ciro, whose superior talent and remorseless mode of proceeding soon put him at the head of the whole, the arch-priest Cirino Cicillo, of Cucamola, Vergine, of Coregliano, and Leggeri, filled important situations in the sect. The arch-priest Zurlo, of Valsano, particularly distinguished himself, and in his native town, and on Christmas eve, he renewed a scene of the middle ages,—he celebrated the midnight mass, armed from head to foot!

As soon as these bands (compared to whom the avowed brigands had hitherto been moderate and decorous associations) had acquired some strength, they sent detachments into nearly every town and village in Apulia. Supported by a larger troop in the neighbourhood, they soon became the despotic masters of solitary or insulated places. A horde of twenty or thirty of these ruffians, who pretended a more peculiar inspiration of republicanism and secret societyship, overran the country, disguised and masked as punchinello, committing atrocities, in more ways than one, too unnatural and loathsome to bear repeating.

The most horrid crime perpetrated by the priest Don Ciro was under this disguise of the national buffoon. There was a beautiful woman in a remote village, of whom he had become passionately enamoured (after his fashion), but whom neither his presents, his promises, nor his threats, could seduce. It was carnival time, and on a certain evening she and her relations and friends were enjoying the pleasures of a dance and a feast. Don Ciro and several of his more desperate adherents came to the house, disguised as Punchinello. At that season of madness, every house, where an entertainment is going on, is open, and as all the neighbourhood are masking and mumming, it is of course not easy, nor is it attempted, to distinguish who the thronging guests may be. Don Ciro proved himself an acceptable one by bringing a plentiful supply of excellent wine, in which he and his comrades pledged the company, and drank brindis, or rhymed toasts, of admirable facetiousness.

They then joined the dance, the disguised priest selecting the happy and unsuspecting object of his passion, for his partner. After numerous tarantellas, which, of all the dances I have seen, are the most calculated to irritate voluptuousness, the party sat down to an abundant supper, the puch-robbor-priest still occupying the ear of the beautiful passana, and only detaching his attention from her to make the party drink. As for himself, he merely touched the wine with his lips, and so remained perfectly sober, whilst all the rest of the men were fast approaching intoxication.

At what he considered an opportune moment, he quitted his punctionello squeak, resumed his natural voice, made himself known to the woman, and again pleaded his passion. The poor creature was as averse as ever. He then rose, beckoned to his companions, and wishing the festive party good night, left the house—which, in half an hour, was wrapped in flames. And so well laid were the robber's matches, and so drunk and stupefied the revelling peasants, whose wine had been drugged, that they all perished in the conflagration. Don Ciro himself, when in prison, and in the power of General Church, from which he knew there was no escape, related this atrocious exploit, nor did the near prospect of death induce him to make a single expression of remorse. He dwelt on the beauty of his victim, and his still existing mortification at his not having obtained her love, boasting that he had not often been so disappointed.

In places where open force could not be employed, the most daring disciples were sent in secrecy to watch the moment to execute the sentences of death pronounced in the mysterious society. In this manner, the secretary Perone plunged his knife into the bowels of an old man of seventy—the respectable Dell' Aglio, of Francavilla, and afterwards massacred his wife and servant, having introduced himself into their house, under pretence of delivering a letter; and in the same manner, the Justico of Peace of Luogo Rotondo and his wife were assassinated in their own garden.

These bloody secretaries would not suffer neutrality; it was absolutely necessary to join them, or to live exposed to their vengeance, which appeared to be inevitable. The society would pass a secret sentence of death, and proceed at once to its execution, or, if necessary, an individual would take the office upon himself, and wait days and nights, until he could strike the blow. The old man of the mountains seemed risen from the grave—the Apulian secretaries were as sanguinary and unerring as his tremendous satellites had been.

They did not invite the support of the rich proprietors and persons of distinction, against whom their hostilities were to be directed; but they unhappily found partisans among the less wealthy; and some few of the inferior gentry, who were jealous of the high nobility, also joined them. These men would probably have blushed at the idea of becoming brigands, yet could there be a more detestable species of brigandage, than what was revealed to them by Don Ciro and his associates? Even allowing that parts of his plan were not divulged to the more respectable of his secretaries, (who, in the long run, must have been the victims of the more villainous,) yet what sympathy can be inspired by the political aspirations of men who could ally themselves with known robbers and murderers, like Anicchiario and his gang? The government, instead of summoning the opulent proprietors to its assistance, offended and disgusted them by distrust. A meeting at the fair of Galantina, to deliberate on the mode of checking the disorders, was cried down, and treated at Naples as a revolutionary proceeding. In extenuation, however, of this seeming imprudence of government it must be mentioned, that many of these gentlemen or noblemen, resident on their estates in the provinces, were themselves members of secret societies, which had all a political scope; they were not Patriots European, or Decisi, but they were and after the events under discussion, knew very well—the Neapolitan government also knew it, and they could hardly draw a line between the seats, the objects of all of which, as already mentioned, were revolutionary, and they feared all the secret societies alike. In the winter of 1816-17, I saw, partly accidentally, and partly through circumstances which I did not seek, but which it would be dishonourable to disclose, a re-union of these gentlemen. Some were provincial nobility, some noblemen from Naples, who only occasionally resided on their estates, some were substantial farmers. The hour of rendezvous was midnight—the house selected a solitary one, and the members of the club came singly, or in parties of two or three each, on horseback, and without any attendants. This appearance of mystery and night-plotting, though sufficiently romantic, did not captivate me much, and young as I was, I could not help feeling that the outward and visible showing of these regenerators or reformers was against them. As one of the uninitiated, I was not admitted to their deliberations; but I was informed that they all tended to the establishment of a constitutional government in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

When the Decisi became so formidable, these gentlemen, however, showed the purity of their intentions, by aiding the government to their utmost, as soon as more energy was shown, and by co-operating with General Church, with whom many individuals of this class served both as officers and private volunteers.

But at the same time, General Pastore, commandant of these provinces, and the Marquis Predicattella, Intendant of Lecce, inflamed party spirit by imitating the system of Canosa,* and setting up private societies to work against private societies: the national guard, under their orders, suffered itself to be partly seduced by the Patriots and Decisi secretaries, and a number of soldiers and some officers of the Crown battalion of reserve were similarly corrupted.

The number of these daring secretaries had arrived at its greatest height in the month of December 1817, or of January 1818. At this period they were estimated at 20,000 men! The mass of them lived at home, in apparent tranquillity, on the produce of their professions; but they were not the less active in committing unheard-of crimes, as their detection was the more difficult. Persons have been known, when in the power, and under the daggers of these ruffians, to sign contracts for the sale of their houses or lands, the objects of the cupidity of these desperadoes; the contracts were executed in all the forms of the law, and acknowledgments were given by the unfortunate owners for sums which they had never received.

The sittings of these societies were, at first, in the night, like the more respectable re-union I have mentioned, and were carefully guarded by sentinels; their military exercises took place in solitary houses, or suppressed and deserted convents; but taking courage by degrees, they were afterwards seen performing their evolutions by day, and in the open air. Most of them had fire-arms: all had poniards. They also began to organise a corps of cavalry.

The patent of this society sufficiently explained its objects. It was an oblong, square paper, or parchment. Two of the angles were ornamented with a skull, over one of which was inscribed "Sadness," and the word "Death" over the other. The opposite angles had cross-bones, with the inscriptions "Terror" and "Mourning." On the top of the patent were the fasces and the cap of liberty, planted upon a death's head, and supported by two axes. At the bottom was a thunderbolt darting from a cloud, and shivering the royal crowns and the papal tiara. Stripes of yellow, red, and blue, the tri-colour of the society, surrounded the patent. The words of the patent were these:

"The Salentine Decision.

Health.

Nº. — Grand Masons.

"The Decision of Jupiter the Thunderer hopes to make war against the tyrants of the Universe, &c." (These words of which only the initials were given, were written in blood, as were several other parts of the document.)

"The mortal — is a Brother Decided. Nº. —, belonging to the Decision of Jupiter the Thunderer, spread over the face of the earth, by his decision, has had the pleasure of belonging to this Salentine Republic."

* The life of this mad partisan and plotter, the prince of Canosa, would be as amusing as that of any conspirator or brigand chief. He was the most fanatic of royalists, and fancied he could put down the Carbonari, or ultra-liberals, by means of the society of the Confidance, or ultra-Bourboniens. Blood and plunder were nothing to him, provided they worked for the king and the holy father. Yet he was a conscientious man, thoroughly convinced of the soundness of his calling—a poet with considerable satirical power; ex-ley of Ateliers, very fond of clocks and watches. Among my reminiscences I can count an evening passed in the same confratello room with him, and several meetings with the famous Cardinal fauiste or madman about him. Indeed, I could almost say of him what Lord Byron said of Ali Pasha, of Janina, that he was one of the most amiable, gentlemanly old gentlemen I ever met. Cardinal Ruffo was, however, no more an Ali Pasha than a Canosa. This day the society of ladies, whom, moreover, he seemed to possess the art of pleasing.

lian Decision. We invite, therefore, all philanthropic societies to lend their strong arm to the same, and to assist him in his wants, he having come to the Decision, that he will obtain Liberty or Death. Dated this day, the — of —, &c."

Here followed three signatures written in blood.

1st. Of the Grand Master, with four points after it, which indicated his power of passing sentence of death.*

2d. Of the Second Decided.

3d. Of the Register of the Dead, whose functions did not relate to the deceased members of the society, but to the victims they immolated, and of whom they kept a register apart, on the margin of which were found blasphemies and most infernal projects.

The excesses of such a society, directed by such a man or monster, as Ciro Anicchiario, may be easily conceived. But they were now drawing to their close. General Church, armed with the royal Alter-Ego, or with full and unlimited power, was sent into these distracted provinces, where his energetic and prudent conduct cannot be too much praised. He crossed the river Ofanto in the Apulian plain with 1200 men, chiefly of the foreign regiments in the Neapolitan service, formed by himself; among them were some companies of cavalry. He could depend upon this force, which was for the greater part composed of Germans, Swiss, Moreotes, and Albanians. The soldiery already in the country were only to be depended upon, after they had witnessed the firm determination with which the general set about his duty, and after the factious individuals, contaminated by the secretaries, had been weeded out. The same was the case with the militia.

Encouraged by the example set them by the dukes of San Cesareo and Monte Jasi, and others of the nobility and wealthy proprietors, several individuals even of the lowest class, furnished information concerning Don Ciro and his secretaries, and joined heart and hand in the measures for their extermination. The fear of not being supported had hitherto prevented these honest men from acting; but still the greater part of the inferior order were shy and silent, maintaining a line of conduct which indicated that they would not hesitate to declare for the secretaries, if the latter should succeed against General Church. This was particularly observed in the neighbourhood of Taranto, at Grottaglie, San Marzano, Martina, and Francavilla, the usual haunts of Don Ciro Anicchiario and his friends. When General Church first visited these places, the inhabitants looked on in gloomy silence, and no person saluted him; a poor old monk was the only person who bowed to him. The bandits and the barished were summoned for the last time before the royal commission at Lecce. Don

* They slaughtered with method and solemnity, or at least, the tyrants were enjoined so to do by their institutions. As soon as the secretaries employed on this service found it convenient to effect their purpose, at the signal of the first blast of a trumpet they unsheathed their daggers; they aimed them at the breast of the victim, and at the third they gradually approached their weapons to his breast; and at the fourth, "with real enthusiasm," to use their cannibal language, they plunged them into his body! These four blasts were symbolised by the four dots after the Grand Master's name. When the Decisi wrote to any one, not of the order, to extort contributions, or to command him to do any thing—it was these four points were on the paper, it was known that the person they addressed was condemned to death, in case of disobedience. If the person were not inserted, he was threatened with mortal punishment, such as laying waste his fields, or burning his house.

The execrable excesses of the secret societies had spread in the neighbourhood of Lecce, which is a large and fine city. A number of respectable young men were invaded by the spirit of enthusiasm, and suddenly became fanatic and bloody-minded. The madness that prevailed was almost unaccountable. At Gallipoli, the great port, which is about thirty miles from the city of Lecce, several young men, with nearly all of whom I had been acquainted, surprised a townsman in the olive groves near to the beautiful village of the Picciotto, where the Gallipolitans have their country houses, and murdered him in cold blood, after the fashion of Fratelli Europei and I Decisi. Each of them buried a stilt in the body of the selected victim, whom they left dead and horribly mangled. They repaired by night and burned the body with dry branches and straw, the olive trees, but they were very slow to cut them and nail work, and shortly after arrived at the house of the townsman, who was a very young man—some of them were striplings. One was the son of an old broker and English interpreter, to whom I had had some opportunities of being serviceable, and who in return had frequently sent this very youth to be my guide and companion through the country. I had always found him honest and kind-hearted, very intelligent, and quiet, even to meekness in his manner. A brother of his, who was also a great deal with me, and who was a very good man, was one of the first to be murdered. I was alarmed one day by a ruffian of Gallipoli, a galantuomo, and one in power, thought proper to insult me, for he deliberately offered to take upon himself the office of a Gallian Beg, and to quiet the bully by a thrust in the back. But this was a challenge of gratitude for me!

When his son was in prison, the poor old father, who was the next day eighty-four years of age, came to Naples to beg, if I had any acquaintance or interest with persons about the Court, to make an application in favour of the youthful murderer. I had not, and should Ciro sent in his justification, (a most remarkable composition, with considerable eloquence and ingenuity, and more impudence than can enter our conceptions;) but knowing his pardon to be hopeless, instead of presenting himself in person, he prepared to defend himself by his acrobatics and arms.

General Church then made his military dispositions. He divided his troops into moveable columns, and placed garrisons upon some points where they were absolutely required, either from their commanding the vast plains of the country, or because they were strong enough to serve as places of retreat for the brigands. The moveable columns all operated towards a common centre, by gradually contracting the circle which embraced the towns of Grottaglie, San Marzano, and Francavilla. Other columns of reserve accompanied the general, who proceeded, with the rapidity of lightning, wherever the spies had traces of Ciro Anicelharico.

At first, confident in his resources, material and moral, the brigand-priest set a price on the head of the bold Englishman, but the general's proceedings soon undeceived him, and he was heard to murmur, while lifting his thumb in token of rage and disappointment, "This is a different sort of man from those they have hitherto sent against me! I have fooled many a general—French, Italian, and Neapolitan, but this one will end by making a fool of me!"

He began to perceive that his resources became day by day weaker and weaker; his credit with the people of the country was no longer what it had been; his prestige was eclipsed by their eyes, and he had to dread that those who were still faithful to him, would soon fall from his side. If he could, he would then have escaped from the country which had so long trembled at his name. He privately reached the port of Brindisi, where he attempted to embark; but the captain of the vessel recognised him, and demanded 2000 ducats as the price of his safety; not having them about him to give, he wrote to his friends, who refused to advance the sum.

Pressed and surrounded more and more closely, pent in the arena, tied to the stake, Don Ciro resolved to risk a general rising of such of his allies as continued desperate, and a pitched battle with the royal troops. He fixed the 27th of January 1818 for this purpose, and appointed the place of rendezvous under the walls of San Marzano, but his final catastrophe preceded that date.

Ciro Anicelharico set out from Grottaglie on the 25th of January 1818, with forty horsemen and ten foot. At two o'clock in the afternoon he fell in with a detachment of General Church's cavalry, commanded by Captain Montorj, who charged him, and drove him as far as Neviera, a farm at the foot of the hill of San Marzano. Ciro there made a short stand, and then retreated up to the town itself in tolerably good order.

Captain Montorj followed and attempted to enter by the steep and narrow path which wound up to the town; but Ciro and his adherents of San Marzano repulsed him. The officer then turned the hill in order to scale it on the side of Manduria, but there too he was received by a shower of balls. He observed, however, that these were the same men who had repulsed him in the former attempt and had followed his movements, and hence concluded they were not sufficiently numerous to defend all the points at once, and that he should gain his object by deceiving them. Concealing himself behind one of the garden walls, he drew the robbers' attention by firing a carbine or two in that direction, and then he suddenly appeared in the opposite direction followed by most of his men. The stratagem succeeded: Montorj entered San Marzano, and the panic-struck followers of Ciro dispersed. The great object was to secure Ciro; but he was not to be found: he had made another (perhaps the hundredth) of his wonderful escapes, and was safe in the open country before the infantry of a moveable column arrived, which it did immediately after his flight from the town.

An instant census was taken of San Marzano, the mayor of which suggested to Major Bianchi, the commander of the column, a method of discovering the delinquents. Every house was searched, and the guilty were recognised by the smell or the blackness of their hands, a proof of their having recently handled fire-arms and powder. Vito Serio, the brothers Francesco and Angelo Vito Lecce, Raffaele Zacharia, and Pietro Barbuzzi were arrested, and all executed on the 3d of February at Francavilla. Their heads were placed in front of the church of San Marzano. This church was blown down by a hurricane some months after, and the heads were buried beneath its ruins. Major Bianchi also took the black standard, and the insignia and decorations of Don Ciro, which General Church forwarded to Naples, where they were presented to the king by Prince Nugent, the captain-general.

Major Bianchi, following up his advantages, proceeded the next day to Francavilla. Here he found the inhabitants in the greatest fermentation, determined to break open the prisons and release those confined in them. Having ascertained who were the ringleaders, he lost not a moment in causing them to be seized in their houses. His gens-d'armes patrolled the streets with orders to lay hands on every individual they might meet bearing arms. He thus terrified the towns-people and quelled the tumult.

General Church then arrived in person: the troops concentrated on Francavilla, where a military commission was established to try the outlaws. Don Ciro had now been missing for six or seven days; not a word had been heard of him since his escape from San Marzano, but the general fancying he could not be far off, and that he was still in intimate correspondence with some individuals in that town, threatened it with plunder and destruction, unless its inhabitants enabled him to secure the person of the robber-priest within eight days. Trembling for their houses and property, the militia of San Marzano then undertook to pursue Don Ciro, and on the 6th of February they beset him in the masseria (or farm house) of Scascerba, not above ten miles from General Church's quarters at Francavilla.

The masseria in Apulia and the provinces of Bari, Otranto, and Taranto, are all built on the same plan, and are very capable of defence. The word is not rendered by "farm-house," which gives but an inadequate idea of the masseria. They date from the period when the incursions of the Turks and pirates were apprehended, and when the country people shut themselves up in their strongholds with their cattle and most valuable effects, in order to secure themselves from attack. A square wall of enclosure, sufficiently high and solid, generally surrounds the dwelling-house, built against one side, and containing three or four large habitable rooms, and sometimes a small chapel. The vast stables, granaries, and out-houses, within the walls, form a right angle with this dwelling-house, but without touching it. In the midst of the enclosure, at some distance from the surrounding walls, rises a round or square tower of two stories, standing quite alone. The ascent to the upper story is either by stone steps, inserted in the tower, by a drawbridge, or by a ladder easily drawn up into the tower. This description will enable the reader to understand how Don Ciro could make so long a resistance in the masseria of Scascerba.

He had arrived at this lonely place with some of his comrades worn out with fatigue, and had thought he could venture to repose himself there for a few hours. It was said that he had previously provided Scascerba and many other lonely masseria of the district with arms, ammunition, and some provisions. He was surprised at the sudden and hostile apparition of the militia of San Marzano, but not at all alarmed, making sure he could cut his way through them whenever he chose. Had he rushed out at once, he might have done so. He coolly stayed where he was, and let them form before the gate of the masseria. So strong was his spell on the minds of these men, that for a long time they hesitated to approach within range of his never erring musket—the first that did so, he shot dead from the outer walls. This delay, however, cost him dear.

The militia of San Marzano, though not brave, were this time in earnest, and having sent information to Lieutenant Fonsnorte, stationed at the "Castelli," a position between Grottaglie and Francavilla, that officer hastened to the spot with forty men of regular troops. As this force came in sight on the edge of the plain, Don Ciro bit his thumb until it bled, for he understood that a vigorous attack was to be made, and retreat was now hopeless. He soon, however, recovered his presence of mind, and looking up the poor people of the masseria in the straw-magazine, and putting the key in his pocket, he retired with his desperate followers to the tower. Having ascended to the upper story, they drew in the ladder after them, and proceeded to load all their guns, of which they had a good number.

It was now evening; the darkness of night soon succeeded the brief twilight of the south. That night must have been a sleepless one for Don Ciro, though no attempt was made at storming his stronghold. The morning dawn, however, afforded him no comfort, for Captain Corsi had arrived from Francavilla with a detachment of gens-d'armes, and soon after Major Bianchi came to the field with other reinforcements!

The siege of Scascerba was now formed by one hundred and thirty-two soldiers; the militia, on whom little dependence was placed, being stationed in the second line, and at some distance.

Don Ciro vigorously defended the outer walls and the approaches to his tower from sunrise to sunset. In the night he attempted to escape, but the neighing of horses made him suspect that some cavalry had arrived, whose pursuit it would be impossible to elude, and he saw pickets all around the masseria. He therefore retired, after having killed, with a pistol-shot, a voltigeur stationed under the wall he had attempted to scale. He again shut himself up in his tower, and employed himself all night in making cartridges. An afternoon, two nights, and a whole day had been spent, and Don Ciro was still master of the whole enclosure, and the outer walls of the masseria. At daybreak, the besiegers tried to burst open the strong wooden gate of the outer wall: Ciro and his men creeping from the tower and under the wall by the gate, repulsed the assailants, killing five and wounding fourteen of the soldiers. A barrel of oil was then rolled to the gate, in order to burn it. The first man who set fire to it was shot through the heart. But its flames communicated to the door, which was soon accessible, and Don Ciro was obliged to retreat to his tower. How long he might have kept Major Bianchi at bay, had not a piece of artillery arrived, and had he not forgotten an important part of provision for a siege, is uncertain; but as the day advanced a four-pounder was brought to the spot, and pointed against the roof of the tower. This little piece produced great effect. The tiles and bricks which fell, drove Don Ciro from the upper to the lower story of the tower. The assailants, satisfied with the effects produced by the four-pounder, would not approach the tower; he had nothing to do in the way of firing at them, to keep up his spirits;—at the same time, and in this horrid state of inactivity or passiveness, he was tormented with a burning thirst, for he had forgotten to provide himself with water—and he never could drink wine.

At length, after some deliberations with his companions, he demanded to speak with General Church, who he believed was in the neighbourhood; then to the Duke of Monte Jasi—(he seemed to have had the ancient knights' anxiety to surrender to none save people of distinction);—but that noblemen being also absent, he condescended to capitulate with Major Bianchi. On their approach, he addressed the besiegers, and threw them some bread. Major Bianchi assured him that he should not be maltreated by the soldiery, of whom he had killed and wounded so many. He then lowered the ladder, descended from the tower, and presented himself to the major and his troops, with the words "Eccomi, Don Ciro."—Here am I, Don Ciro!

His comrades then followed him. And how many were these desperate men, who had so long defended themselves against such a force? They were only three—Vito di Cesare, Giovanni Palmieri, and Michele Cuppelli.

Their hands, their faces, their dress, were horribly begrimed by powder and smoke, but there was no appearance of wounds on their persons, and their countenances, particularly that of their daring leader, were firm and resolute in the extreme. The first thing Don Ciro did after surrendering himself to the soldiers was, to beg them to give him water to quench his consuming thirst. He then delivered the key and desired them to liberate the people of the masseria, who had been locked up all this while in the straw-magazine. He declared that they were innocent, and as they came out of their place of confinement he distributed money among them. He patiently suffered himself to be searched and bound. Some poison was found upon him, which he said he would have taken in the tower had not his companions prevented him.

The besiegers and their captives now marched off for Francavilla. Don Ciro conversed quite enough all the way with Major Bianchi, to whom he related the principal circumstances of his most extraordinary life.

In prison he was equally calm. He only appeared to be interested for the fate of some of his partisans, or Decisi: he declared that they had been compelled by his threats and their own fears to do whatever they had done, and he entreated that they might not be persecuted.

On being placed before the council of war, presided by Lieutenant-Colonel Guarini, he addressed a speech to that hardly have used it if I had. They were all condemned to the galley for life, and my former friend was sent to the port of Brindisi, where one of his brothers held a very respectable situation in the customs.

The fire that lies hid in the hearts of these people, under an exterior of indolence and apathy, is astonishing and fearful. As they now are, they may be inflamed for every evil. Were they benefited by education and good government for a few generations, they might become a nation of heroes.

officer, mistaking him for General Church. Among other strong arguments he used, was this—

"On the day that you, general, with the Duke of San Cesareo and only a few horsemen, reconnoitred Grottaglie, I was there, with several of mine, concealed behind a ruined wall, close by the gate where you entered. I covered you with my rifle, and I never missed my aim at ten times that distance! Had not the feelings of mercy prevailed in my bosom, general, instead of being here to judge me, you would have been in your grave. Think of this, signor, general, and let me meet with the mercy I have shown."

On being informed of his mistake, he insisted on seeing General Church; when this was refused him, he quietly resigned himself to his fate, drily saying, "Ho capito," (I understand.) He did not pronounce another word.

After sentence of death was passed, a missionary introduced himself, and offered him the consolations of religion. Don Ciro answered him with a smile, "Let us leave alone all this stuff and prating! we are of the same trade—don't let us laugh at one another!"

On being asked by Captain Montorj, reporter of the military commission which condemned him, how many persons he had killed with his own hand, he carelessly answered, "Who can tell?—they may be between sixty and seventy."

As he was led to execution, he recognised Lieutenant Fonsmorte, the officer who had been the first to arrive at the masseria of Scasorbia with his regular troops. Don Ciro had admired his readiness and courage, and said to him, "If I were king, I would make you a captain."

The streets of Francavilla, through which he passed, were filled with people; even the house-tops were crowded with spectators. They all preserved a gloomy silence.

On his arrival at the place of execution, Don Ciro walked with a firm step to his fatal post. He wished to be shot standing—but they ordered him to kneel. He did so, presenting his breast to the soldiers. He was then told that malefactors, like himself, were always shot with their backs to the soldiers: "It is all the same," he replied, with a smile, and then he turned his back. As he did so, he advised a priest, who persisted in remaining near to him, to withdraw, "for," said he, "these fellows are not all such good shots as I have been—they may hit you!"

He spoke no more—the signal was given—the soldiers fired at the kneeling priest-robber. Twenty-one balls took effect—four in the head! Yet he still breathed and muttered in his throat; it required a twenty-second shot to put an end to him! This fact was confirmed by all the officers and soldiers present at his execution. The people, who had always attributed supernatural powers to him, were confirmed in their belief by this tenaciousness of life, which was, indeed, little short of miraculous. "As soon as we perceived," said one of the soldiers very seriously, "that Don Ciro was enchanted, we loaded his own musket with a silver ball, and this destroyed the spell."

Thus fell in 1818, after fifteen years of a most lawless life, dating from his jealousy and first murder, Don Ciro Anicichiarco, of whom little else remains to be said, save that his countenance had nothing at all repulsive about it, but was, on the contrary, rather mild and agreeable; that he was master of a verbose but most persuasive eloquence, though pedantic in his style and over addicted to classical allusions and inflated phrases—the general defects of his countrymen, the Neapolitans.

The reader who has seen the destruction of their head, may feel some curiosity as to what befel the body of the sanguinary set, the "Decisi."

The day after the death of Don Ciro, ten of the most criminal among them were led through the streets of Francavilla to execution: two or three of them recognised at the windows the fathers, the sons, the widows, or relatives of those they had assassinated by the decision of their horrid secret tribunal, and asked pardon of them. But these were the only men among them who ever expressed the least feeling of repentance. All the others were so hardened and fanatical, that they gloried in, rather than regretted their crimes, and died with a ferocious indifference. Among their number were the grand master, the second Decided, and the registrar of the dead—the three dignitaries of the order.

The military tribunal afterwards brought about two hundred and twenty-seven persons to trial. Nearly half of these, having been guilty of murder and robbery by force of arms, were condemned to capital punishment, and their heads were exposed near the places of their residence, or in the scenes of their crimes.

The death of Don Ciro and his principal accomplices happily put a stop to disturbances, and to that atrocious system which had threatened to take a wider range. In a short time peace was restored to the desolated provinces. General Church used his absolute power with admirable discretion. Even his enemies soon admired, and then loved him. His established principle was, to listen to, or receive no accusations against political opinions, or connections with secret societies; but he punished crimes and deeds of violence with severity. He caused the accused to be tried without delay; hunted out vagrants; and dismissed from their situations all such government officers as could not be depended upon. Instead of seizing the people's arms without an equivalent, he caused their full value to be paid. He threatened with death such artisans as should dare to manufacture prohibited arms. He exhorted the confessors to endeavour to obtain possession of the poniards, or to oblige the penitents to throw them into deep wells. The city of Lecce, grateful for the blessings of restored tranquillity, voted a statue to the king, and a sword of honour to General Church, with the freedom of the city. And finally, in April, 1819, the following consoling circular was issued by the Neapolitan government.

"The reign of the assassins being at an end, and all the provinces tranquillised, it is resolved, in order to extinguish their memory, that the heads of the malefactors executed in pursuance of the sentences of the military commission, and which are exposed under the church towers, and other parts of the towns, shall be taken down and interred, and that the places where they were exposed shall be entirely cleaned and white washed. This letter shall be read by the arch-priests in all the churches."

This narrative is chiefly taken from a very curious, but, I believe, little known volume, on the Carbonari, written by the late Baron Bertholdi, though published anonymously in London.

The portion of his volume which contains the adventures of Ciro Anicichiarco, marvellous as it at times may appear, is perfectly correct, for I was in the country at the time, knew several of the actors in those sanguinary scenes, and heard the stories from their lips. Well might Byron say, "Truth is stranger than fiction!" Where is the writer of romance that would feign such a life as that of this priest-robber?

ROMAN BANDITTI.

It has been my object throughout this work to collect my materials, as far as possible, from eye-witnesses of the deeds of the brigands, or persons who were near their haunts and the scenes of their exploits, and derived their information at the immediate source. To no one can I be more indebted than to our own gentle countrywoman, Maria Graham, from whom the following account is taken; nor can I preface the scenes and adventures to which she has given such animation and reality, better than by the words of her own introduction.

"These notices of the banditti might have been more full and more romantic, but the writer scrupulously rejected all accounts of them upon the truth of which she could not rely, thinking it better to give one authentic fact, than twenty doubtful, though more interesting, tales. The banditti, or fuorusciti of Italy, are what the forest outlaws of England were in the days of Robin Hood. They are not of the poorest or vilest of the inhabitants. They generally possess a little field and a house, whither they retire at certain seasons, and only take the field when the hopes of plunder allure them, or the fear of a stronger arm drives them to the woods and rocks. They live under various chiefs, who, while their reign lasts, are absolute; but as they are freely chosen, they are as freely disposed, or sometimes murdered, if they offend their subjects. To be admitted into the ranks of the regular banditti, a severe apprenticeship of all kinds of hardships is required. The address and energy displayed by these men, under a better government, might conduce to the happiest effects. But here the fire burns not to warm, but to destroy."

The great heat of Rome during the summer of 1819 drove the fair author, her husband, and Mr. Eastlake the distinguished painter, whose admirable pictures of the Italian banditti are so generally known and admired, to seek a cooler retreat in some of the mountains in the neighbourhood of the ancient capital of the world.

"Accident," says the fair author, "determined in favour of the little town of Poli, between Tivoli and Palestrina; and as circumstances occurred while we were there of some interest, a sort of journal was kept of every thing material. During the last few days of our stay at Poli, the interest we had taken in the country people about us, was superseded by one to which a considerable degree of danger was joined. The banditti who had long infested the road between Rome and Naples, having been driven from their towns of Sotino, Frosi, and Ferentino, partly by the Pope's edict, and partly by the march of a body of two thousand of his holiness's troops against them, had fled up the country and taken refuge in the wilds which border that great valley of the Apennines, formed by the course of the Anio, and separating the Mersian hills from those on whose edge Tivoli and Palestrina are situated. The highest point of this last ridge is the rock of Guadagnola, two hours walk from Poli. There one company of the banditti stationed itself, and thence made excursions to our very gates.

"The number of the inhabitants of Poli does not exceed one thousand three hundred; they are a very quiet simple people. The town stands on a narrow ridge of dark rock, between two mountain rivulets. The stone it is built of is so like the rock, that it looks as if it had grown out of it; and embosomed in thick woods, and overtopped by mountains, it shows like a mountain eagle's nest as one approaches it. It was a place of great consequence when the Conti, dukes of Poli, had under their dominion upwards of forty townships, and boasted of the cardinals, the princes, and the popes of their house! Their importance in the civil wars of Italy has given them a place in each of the three divisions of the Divina Commedia of Dante; but the title of the dukes of Poli is extinct, and their large possessions have devolved to other noble families."

The scenery around Poli, which is very accurately and strikingly described by our fair countrywoman, is of the most picturesque or romantic character, and no reader can well follow her, in her delightful excursions, through the wild wood, or the lonely valley, or to the mountain's top, where, as the sun is setting over the wide campagna, she pauses to read from Schiller the "Robber Moor's soliloquy," without wishing to be with her, though real and dreadful banditti were always close at hand.

"We had heard," writes she, a few days after her arrival, "from some peasants bringing their corn to be ground at the mills near Poli, that the robberies lately committed on the road between Rome and Naples, had determined government to raze to the ground the town of Sotino, which had opened its gates to the banditti, and lied, in fact, long been their head-quarters. Indeed, the first report was, that the town had actually been battered down, and all the inhabitants put to death in the night. The peasants who gave this evidently exaggerated account, were of opinion that the men must certainly have been absent from the town, or they would never have suffered it to be so surprised; and, in that case, they foretold the most dreadful consequences to whomsoever should fall into their hands, by way of reprisal for the murder of their wives and children. At any rate, whether Sotino were destroyed or not, whither the brigande, who would certainly leave the towns as soon as they heard the severe proclamation issued against them, would direct their steps, was matter of serious and anxious conjecture. Two years ago, on a similar occasion, the noted Di Cesaris, who was shot in the spring of 1818 near Terracina, led his followers up these hills, and for nearly two months they subsisted on the spoil of the neighbouring townships. On such expeditions the banditti are always aided by the shepherds and goatherds, a race of men apt for their purposes, as their half-savage life, while it gives them enough intercourse with the towns to procure food and intelligence, detaches them so much from all social bonds as to render them indifferent to the crimes of others. The observation that the pastoral manners, which have been adorned with the fairest attributes of peace and innocence, are much better adapted to the force and cruel habits of a military life," is confirmed by the manners of the shepherds of these mountains. Where the townships have land enough to employ the inhabitants in agriculture and gardening, as at Poli, the inhabitants are kind and gentle; and when a robbery or outrage is committed, the first exclamation always is, he who has done the evil must be an idle fellow, who had not patience to wait while his bread was growing. But Capranica and some other mountain towns which have no arable land annexed to them, while they supply their neighbours with shepherds, also furnish their annual quota to the ranks of the banditti."

A band of gipsies, pedlars, rogues, and fortunetellers, as with us, suddenly made their appearance one afternoon at Poli. They seemed to be the forerunners of the brigands, who had been talked of during several days, for the next morning at dawn the gipsies disappeared, and it was ascertained to a certainty that a troop of banditti were at Guadagnola, a mountain peak, about two hours walk above Poli.

* Gibson, Dee, and Fall, chap. xvi.

Early the day before, which was the 12th of August 1819, these robbers had seized two lads, assistants to a surveyor. They were employed measuring in the wood leading to Guadagnola, when two men, armed, came suddenly up to them near the little chapel to the Madonna, and seized the youngest boy, who was going along the road; the other was a few paces within the wood. The robbers called to him by the opprobrious name 'razza di cane,' and presenting their muskets, forced him to come to them; when giving him a blow, they forced him and his companion before them to an open space in the wood, where they found eleven of their companions sitting on the grass, engaged in different occupations; the two who had taken the lads being sentinels, posted to give notice of any approaching danger. Their chief object in seizing the boys appeared to be that of obtaining information as to the principal inhabitants of Poli, and their places of daily resort, in order to capture some of them if possible, and thereby obtain a good sum as ransom. But they had another reason for taking them, and detaining them the whole day; and this was to prevent their giving such information concerning them and their situation in the neighbouring towns, as might enable the townspeople, or the military, to surround them. They, therefore, kept them prisoners till night; treated them very well, and gave them bread and cheese, with some water, which was all they had for themselves, though the lads understood that they expected a provision of meat and some wine at night.

"During the time of their captivity, the lads had full leisure to observe the dresses and the employments of the banditti; the latter were chiefly gaming. As soon as two sentinels were placed, which were frequently changed, the party divided into different sets, one of which played at cards; another at morra, for a louis-d'or per chance; a third party danced, while a fourth listened to a story, or ballad, in all the careless profligacy of an outlaw's life. Their dress was picturesque, yet military.

"Every robber had a silver heart, containing a picture of the Madonna and child, suspended by a red ribbon to his neck, and fastened with another of the same colour to his left side.

"The boys described the robbers as being stout, active, young men, excepting one, who was very short and corpulent, with a bald head; he appeared to be the butt of the rest, and, like Falstaff, to be not only witty himself, but the cause of wit in others: they called him the gourmand, alluding to the gourmandise smoothness of his bald head. After asking about the different inhabitants of Poli by name, the brigands began to question their prisoners about the rarer English who were there; whether they did not go out into the woods to paint, and other questions of the kind. The boys being really ignorant, could give them no information about us, and very little about any one else; and therefore they were dismissed at night-fall, and made the best of their way home, where they were the first to give notice of the vicinity of the brigands, although several shepherds had seen them, and had even made purchases of bread and other provisions for them. The gonfaloniere then sent to Palestrina for the marshal of the district who alone can order out the civic guard."

When their secrecy was no longer of use to the robbers, or dangerous to the inhabitants, the shepherds confessed that the banditti had visited their sheep-cots, near Capranica, on the evening of the 9th of August. "Only the day after we had been on the very same rock," says our author, "to see the sun set from it; and as we listened to the distant sound of a bagpipe among the hills, a young lad who was with us, said, 'That is most likely a shepherd from the Abruzzi, or some of those wild Neapolitan places that harbour the outlaws.' The brigands ate two of the shepherds' sheep, merely skinning them, and roasting them whole, and honoured them with their company for two nights. They sent one of them to Poli for bread, keeping his companions as hostages, and threatening all the shepherds with death, if they revealed having seen them within eight days. These threats, which are usual from the brigands, and the facility of executing them on the poor shepherds, always in the open country and solitary places, would sufficiently account for the silence or collusion of the latter.

"With their hosts the banditti talked very freely, treating of their own private histories and modes of life. They showed them the silver heart and picture of the Madonna, which each had suspended from his neck, saying, 'We know that we are likely to die a violent death; but in our hour of need we have these,' touching their muskets, 'to struggle for our lives with, and this,' kissing the image of the Virgin, 'to make our death easy.' This mixture of ferocity and superstition is one of the most terrific features in the character of the banditti of Italy.

"There was among this troop, which now so immediately interested us, shut up, as we were, at Poli," says Mrs. Graham, "one man from the neighbourhood, a shepherd, whose master had treated him rather cruelly, and who now said that he thought it high time to call upon his master, and thank him for his courtesy. This observation being carried to the master, he was, of course, careful not to go out of the town gates alone, unarmed, or on foot. However, the brigands made him pay for his safety, or that of his flocks, which were exposed in the country; for they sent him an order to provide a number of velvet suits, linen shirts, and drawers, and stout great coats, and to deposit them at a certain spot, by a given time, on pain of losing his flocks on the hills. The proprietor sent a messenger to Rome to enquire of the government, whether his property would be protected or guaranteed to him, if he refused to supply the robbers, or whether he should supply the robbers with the clothing required. The answer was such as to induce him to provide the articles demanded by the appointed day.

"The mareschal having arrived from Palestrina, in consequence of the message of the gonfaloniere of Poli, the civic guard was at last called out, and a singular scene presented itself, as we looked from our windows. The mareschal, with a single horse pistol stuck in his belt, was walking up and down, in consultation with the principal inhabitants of the place; for there was a pretty general expectation that the brigands would collect in greater numbers, and attempt to enter Poli that night. By-and-by, twelve or fourteen young men joined them, armed with muskets and fowling-pieces, of various construction; these formed the civic guard. Some of the guns were their own, others belonged to government, and were lent for the occasion. About ten o'clock, the party went to a little platform just without the principal gate, which usually serves as a play-ground for children, to fire at a mark, and try their powder, regardless of the spot being exactly within sight of the enemy's camp. At length they set out in pursuit of the brigands; but, as we afterwards learned, with little hope or intention of doing more than driving them from their immediate haunt in the neighbourhood, and perhaps alarming them; for many had gone out without powder and shot, and few with more than a second charge. Shortly after their departure, a party of nearly two hundred men, who had been out to collect and drive in the cattle from the hill, entered the town, with such shouts of joy and triumph that we thought that some detachment of the brigands had been met with and routed; but we soon discovered the very unusual sight of a herd of fat oxen, with cows and fine calves, or rather heifers, running down the street, followed by their drivers, and accompanied by all the women and children of the town. Towards night a lieutenant, armed with a very small party of his Holiness's soldiers, entered the town, in consequence of a messenger sent to Tivoli the night before; they were intended to assist the town guard, and created an unusual degree of bustle. The lodging and victualling them did not seem to be a matter very easily adjusted, nor indeed very agreeable. Their gay dresses and trained set formed no small contrast with the rustic air and coarse clothing of our old friends; and the superiority they assumed, seemed by no means pleasing to the Polesi. At length the lanterns, which had been moving up and down the street at least two hours later than they had ever done before, dropped off one by one, the expected attack on the town was forgotten, and the night passed quietly as usual.

"Early the next morning, another party of the towns-men, accompanied by most of the soldiers, set out in search of the brigands, and in the afternoon the party of the day before returned. They had found the lair of the robbers yet warm; the grass was trodden down; fragments of bread and other food, mingled with remnants of clothing, torn and cut packs of cards, and broken ornaments, lay strewn about the ground. The skin of a sheep was hanging on a tree; and every thing bore the marks of a very hasty removal. The guard found a shepherd, with some dressed meat, and employed in making sandals of a kid's skin; this they taxed him with having killed for the brigands; but he asserted that he had taken it from the mouth of a wolf who had been at the flock the night before.

"The direction taken by the banditti, on the two following days, was by no means certain, and we began to hope that they had left the neighbourhood. But on the morning after, some women having reported that they heard a whistling in a deep glen, within a mile of the town, on the road towards Palestrina, the civic guard was ordered out in pursuit, and one of our party determined to accompany it. A soldier and a spy headed the little troop. As soon as they got out of the town, and reached the wood, the soldier directed them to march in Indian file. Though the result of this third expedition was as unsuccessful as that of the two others, the danger, or at least the apprehension of it, was sufficient to show the temper of the people. As they approached the suspected spot, strict silence was kept. A woman, who acted as guide, at length stopped, and the party began to descend into a deep defile, with the utmost caution, and great difficulty. It was a romantic spot, the bed of a river, at this season almost dry; and one of the men, as he looked fearfully round, whispered, 'This is, indeed, a place for banditti.' In the absence of the robbers themselves, the peasants climbing among the loose stones at the bottom, made a picturesque addition to the natural wildness of the scene. Here some of the people were observed to lag, to the great distress of the foremost, who exclaimed, 'By heaven! these fellows are leaving us!' The sides of the ravine, where not rocky, are clothed with large chestnut trees and brushwood, so that the danger of the situation, supposing the brigands to be concealed among the trees, induced the soldier to look for a convenient place to ascend. There was a steep, narrow, sloping field planted with maize, with chestnut trees on each side; the troop climbed up to it in silence, and the soldier directed the men to lower their muskets, that they might not be seen over the top of the brushwood. The spy, who was foremost, advanced towards the trees, half raised his musket, and then stepped back to the soldier, and whispered, which made the people believe they had found the robbers; and one of them said, 'Here they are,' and hesitated.

"The wood was entered, but nothing found there; and the rest of the march was only a repetition of the same cautious walk. The spy, who had left the company to examine a narrow path, was nearly shot by one of the men, who heard a rustling among the leaves. A smoke at a distance, which at first gave some alarm, turned out to be nothing but some chaff which a peasant was burning. At length they arrived at the top of the hill, between Poli and Capranica, a station where they resolved to wait for another division of the towns-men, which had gone round by a different road. At length they appeared, but neither party liked to approach the other, till a certain red jacket was recognised, when they joined, and returned the shortest way home. While the first party had waited under the trees for the other, sentinels had been posted all round, at a hundred yards' distance. The rest amused themselves by climbing for squirrels' nests, and telling stories of one another, from which it appeared that more than one of them had escaped from prison for attempts at assassination. One in particular, who seemed a kind of harlequin among them, had had more than one hair-breadth 'scape when the shirri were in pursuit of him. On one occasion he had escaped by leaping from a high window; and to prove that he had lost none of his agility, he diverted himself with climbing to the extremities of the high chestnut boughs, and dropping off them to the ground.

"Shortly after the return of the guard, we found that the banditti had really been in an opposite direction, on the heights of San Gregorio, whence they had taken a quantity of bread and wine. We therefore went out, and took a short walk without the gates. The near fields were more than usually peopled; for several small flocks and a few heads of cattle had been driven in from the hills, that they might go into the town at night for protection. We observed that the boy who went daily to cut wood for the baker had muffled the bell that hung round his ass's neck, in order to prevent the noise from betraying his master. The farmers who had occasion to go to the threshing-floors, all went well mounted, and with an attendant or two. On going home, we learned that a surgeon, and two or three other persons, had been seized by the brigands, and carried to the mountains, in order to obtain a ransom. They were inhabitants of Castel-Madama, a small town near Tivoli, and so named from Margaret of Austria, daughter of Charles V. This news necessarily increased the consternation of the householders of Poli, who now resolved to make every effort to assemble and arm the young men of the town.

At night a small detachment of Polesi, which had been sent to join the people of Casapa in an attempt to drive the banditti from San Gregorio, where the tocsin had been sounded on the capture of the people from Castellamara, returned. They were sent back without attempting to do any thing, as it was feared that any open measures against the robbers, before the ransom was paid, would endanger the lives of the prisoners."

On the 18th of August, the day of Saint Agapet, when there was a church festival and a fair at the neighbouring town of Palestina, about two hundred and fifty persons ventured out from Poli to go to them. "One party preceded the other about half an hour, and both set off before daybreak. As the sun rose, the rear party were so alarmed that they began to think of returning home, seeing a number of persons through the trees, whom they at first took for robbers, but the sight of the women's white head-clothes satisfied them that they were townsfolk, and the two parties joined, and met with nothing farther to startle them on the road. Shortly after they left Poli, it was known that all the poor prisoners had been dismissed by the banditti; but those from whom they could hope to extort a ransom were detained. About noon a report reached us that one of the captives had been barbarously murdered; and towards night, as it had been ascertained at Tivoli that the surgeon, the only remaining prisoner, was safe, an order came to Poli for all the force it was possible to assemble to keep the pass of Guadagnola towards Poli, as every other avenue by which the brigands could escape was supposed to be already sufficiently guarded. This order arrived about sunset. Most of the men were absent at Palestina, so that the boys and old people were collected in the street to choose out of Their wives, mothers, and grandmothers, came out, each with her lantern, to beg that her husband or child might be left to guard her house, in case the robbers, taking advantage of the absence of the strong men, should attack the town. The families who possessed arms should attend them to the guard, and as it appeared that the night would be wasted in alterations, the magistrates and the officer, who still remained in the town, resolved to enter the houses forcibly, and take what arms they could find. Two or three houses were accordingly entered, but it consumed so much time equally, and the guns were so well concealed, that there was little chance of obtaining enough to form the few men they could provide; therefore they resolved to wait till the morning, when the town would be returned from Palestina. The scene in the streets, where all public business is transacted, was not only quite new to us, but curious in itself. The armed and the unarmed, the willing and the unwilling, were all vociferating at once: the women were going about with their infants in one hand and a lantern in the other; now aggravating, now quieting the disputants. The people from the feast at Palestina came gradually dropping in, laden with their nuts or other fairings, and mostly half intoxicated, all mingling together, and talking of danger from banditti to be apprehended that night or to be provided against next day, without ever considering that, while they were disputing, the ruffians would escape in any direction they chose. Such was the evening of the eighteenth. The morning of the nineteenth was not much more orderly. The men, indeed, sober and in earnest, for this time, had armed themselves well and were leaving the town in greater numbers than we had yet seen assembled. Their wives and children, believing there was now some real danger, were sitting lamenting in groups about the street; but they might have spared themselves the pain. The great mountain pass had been left unguarded for more than twelve hours. Half that time would have sufficed the brigands, with their active habits, to have escaped to a distance far out of the reach of pursuit."

Tired with being pent up, and of seeing a town with twelve hundred inhabitants kept in continual alarm, our courageous countrywoman and her two companions, with an escort, left Poli, on the 21st of August, for Tivoli. On her road she passed the Emperor Hadrian's villa, among whose ruins the robbers had passed the night, and then lay concealed. They must have seen her and her party pass, but as the number of their men was small, they did not risk an attack, and she arrived safely at Tivoli, where she found in a state of still greater consternation than the little town she had left. Her escort joined immediately the people of Tivoli in pursuit of the outlaws, who were seen crossing the hills behind the town.

"Every day while we remained at Tivoli brought some new particulars concerning the march of the banditti. It was ascertained that their entire number amounted to about one hundred and forty, divided into companies not exceeding twenty in each, for the sake of more easy subistence. The head-quarters appeared to be at Rio Freddo, and in the woods of Subiaco. Their spies, and those who bought provisions for them, were lavishly paid, and the instances of any information being given against them were very rare. On one occasion, however, the head-quarters had seized a ploughman belonging to Rio Freddo, and, after beating him, they had sent him to his home to fetch a few dollars, as the price of his future security while at work. On his way the ploughman met the robber-hunters belonging to Subiaco, and gave them notice of the situation of the robbers. They desired him to fetch his money, and go to the appointed place with it, and if he found them still there, to leave a mark at that particular tree. Meantime he went to fetch his money, surrounded by the robbers' spies, and having done so, waited patiently till the poor man had paid his money, and made a mark agreed on; and this they were more careful to do, as had the brigands suspected he had given information, they would certainly have put him to death. As soon as they knew him to be safe, the hunters drew close round the enemy, who were seven in number, and fired: two were killed on the spot, and the five others, of whom one was found dead of his wounds near the place next day, left their fire-arms, and concealed themselves in the thicket of Arcinuzzo, between Rio Freddo and Subiaco."

Every evening the episcopal church bell rang at Tivoli, to set the guards at the different bridges leading to the town, as the people were in nightly expectation that the brigands would enter it in search of provisions, with which the shepherds had become rather shy of supplying them, since two or three of them had been taken up and imprisoned for so doing. On the night of the 21st or 22nd of July, seven robbers had gone to San Vittorino, armed chiefly with bludgeons, and had taken nearly all the bread in the town, but had not carried off any of the inhabitants, who, in fact, are not rich enough to afford much ransom. But the most intrepid gang lingered about Tivoli, where there are a number of rich proprietors, who might have furnished a considerable booty."^s

"The body of a murdered man was found at the gate of San Gregorio, with twenty wounds, inflicted with knives. The brigands, emboldened by success, seem determined to press closer round all the hill-towns. None of the principal inhabitants ventured without the walls, and even the work-people were robbed of their ornaments and their little savings." Such being the dreadful state of this part of the country, the spirited author and her friends abbreviated their villégiatura, and leaving their lovely scenery of Tivoli—its cascade and grottoes, its woods and rocks, its villas and graceful ancient temples—returned to Rome early in September.

During her short stay at Tivoli she became acquainted with Signor Cherubini, the surgeon of Castel-Madama, whose captivity among the robbers she had heard so much at Poli. He was a man of undoubted veracity, and bore a high character, not only as an able surgeon but a good man. He related to her every particular of his capture and liberation, allowing her to write them down, and she was afterwards so fortunate as to procure a circumstantial account written by himself to a friend, which abounds with interest, and striking traits of character.

Signor Cherubini was summoned early in the morning, of the 17th of August to Tivoli, to attend a sick nun and a gentleman of that place, by a factor well known to him, and named Bartolomeo Marasca. They set off on horseback together, the factor being armed with a gun.

"We had scarcely passed the second arch of the arched gateway," writes the poor surgeon, "when two men suddenly rushed out from the thicket and stopped the way, and pointing their long guns at the factor, who was riding a little before me, ordered him to dismount. Meantime two others came out of the wood behind me, so as to have us between them and the formation. Both the factor and myself had dismounted at the first intimation. The two men behind me ordered me to turn back instantly, and to walk before them, not to go to the road to Castel-Madama, but that to San Gregorio. The first question the robbers asked me, was, whether I was the prince of Castel-Madama, meaning, I fancy, the vice-prince who had passed the road a little before me."

"As after we returned to Rucvo, we learned, that the same gang had again the arch-priest of Rucvo, whose nephew, having offered some resistance, was killed on the spot. The ransom demanded for the priest and a friend was so exorbitant that it could not be raised, on which the ruffians sent their cars to their families and afterwards some of their fingers. At length, tired of waiting and perhaps irritated by the complaints of the two prisoners, they murdered them! There is a sort of ferocious jollity among these brigands, more shocking, perhaps, than any cruelty. They are laughing, singing, and dancing, and clerical hat two, the last being stripped of its top. They killed him; one of their number put on the sacerdotal clothing, and substituted for his loun, with his high crown hat, which they forced the poor priest to wear."

To this I answered, that I was not the prince, but a poor surgeon of Castel-Madama; and to convince them that I spoke truth, I showed them my case of lancets, and my bag of surgical instruments; but it was of no use. During our walk towards San Gregorio, I perceived that the number of brigands increased to thirteen. One took my watch from me, another my case of lancets. At the beginning of our march, we met, at short distances, four youths belonging to San Gregorio, and one elderly man, all of whom were obliged to share my captivity ; shortly after we met another man, and an old woman, whose ear-rings were taken, and they were then permitted to continue their journey. In the meadows by the last ruined aqueduct, the horses which the factor Marasca and I had ridden, were left loose. As the factor Marasca and I began to climb the steep part of the mountain, we saw a troop of robbers, as they passed, descend the steep slope, climb the steepest part of the mountain, and descend again, at length, to the plain. As we proceeded, at length, to the summit, we heard the alarm bell ring, and we saw a great number of men, armed with muskets, come running up the mountain. We were allowed to rest, and we sat down on the grass. Marasca then talked a good deal with the brigands ; he showed himself well acquainted with their numbers, and said other things, which my wretched state of mind prevented me from attending to very distinctly ; but seeing him apparently so intimate with the robbers, a suspicion crossed me that I was betrayed by him."

The chief brigand turned to the poor surgeon, and throwing him his lancet case, said he would think about his ransom. The surgeon represented his poverty with tears, but his ransom was fixed as high as two thousand dollars; and pen, ink, and paper being produced, he was obliged to write for that sum, which he did, with all the earnestness that the presence of thirteen assassins, and the fear of death, could inspire. The thing was now to procure a messenger to carry this letter. This was soon done. A man was ploughing on the side of the hill lower down, and another, belonging to Castel-Madama, was seen in the flat below. They were both secured by the robbers, and dispatched with the surgeon's letter to Tivoli.

"The brigands stayed where they were for three hours, when the apparition of an armed force in the country below induced them to decamp. They retired towards the most woody part of a still higher mountain. "After a long and most painful march, finding himself in a place of safety, the brigand chief halted, there to await the return of the messenger; but as that return was still delayed, the chief came up to me angrily, and said, that it might happen to me as it did to a certain inhabitant of Veletri, who had been taken by this very band, who entered his house in disguise, and carried him off to the woods, and because his ransom was long in coming, they killed him, and when the money came, the messenger found his lifeless body. I was much alarmed at this story, and regarded it as a forerunner of my own speedy death."

The terrified surgeon, who certainly in his narrative does not affect the virtue he had not, then told the robbers he might have written another letter to Castel-Madama with orders to sell whatever he possessed, and to send up the money immediately. This pleased them : another letter was written, and one of the prisoners from San Gregorio was sent off with it.

"After he has gone, I saw my companion the factor Marasca walking about carelessly among the brigands, looking at their arms, and making angry gestures; but he did not speak. Shortly after, he came and sat down by me; it was then that the chief, having a large stone in his hand, came up to him, and without saying a single word, gave him a blow on the back of the head just where it joins the neck. It did not kill him, so he rose and cried most piteously, 'I have a wife and children, for God's sake spare my life' and thus saying he defended himself as well as he could with his hands. Other brigands closed round him; a struggle ensued, and they rolled together down a steep precipice. I closed my eyes; my head dropped on my breast, I heard a cry or two, but I seemed to have lost all sensation. I was very short time the brigands rustled about, and I saw the chief thrust his dagger, still bloody, into the ground. In a few minutes he came back, and he announced the death of the factor. He said, 'I have killed him, and I am proud of the factor because he was a sbirro; such as you are not sbirro.' He looked at our arms, and seemed disposed to murmur; and if the force had come up, he might have been dangerous.' And thus they got rid of Marasca. The chief, seeing that the money for me still did not come from Tivoli, and being afraid lest troops should be sent, seemed uncertain what to do, and said to his companions, 'How shall we dispose of our prisoners?'"

We must either kill them, or send them home; but they could not depend on either, and he came and sat down by me. I, remembering that I had a little money about me, which might amount altogether to thirty pauls, (three crowns,) gave them frankly to him to gain his good-will. He took it in good part, and said he would keep it to pay the spy."

It now began to rain very heavily—it was four o'clock in the afternoon, and no messenger returned. At last voices were heard on the hills. The robbers feared they might be soldiers instead of messengers, but they at last said, "come down!" There was an anxious silence, but no one came.

"After another short interval, we heard another voice also from above on the left; and then we said, 'Surely this must be the messenger.' But the brigands would not trust to it, and forced us to go on to a place a good deal higher, and level with that whence the voice proceeded. When we reached it they all presented their muskets, keeping the prisoners behind them; and thus prepared to stand on the defensive, they cried out, 'Come forward!' In a few moments two men appeared among the trees; one of them the peasant of Castel-Madama, who had been sent in the morning to Signor Celestini at Fivoli, the other the ploughman of San Gregorio his companion. As soon as they were recognised, they were ordered to lie down with their faces to the ground, and asked if they came alone. But the man of Castel-Madama answered, 'It would be a fine thing indeed, if I, who am almost dead with fatigue, after climbing these mountains with the weight of five hundred soldi about me, should be obliged to prostrate myself with my face to the earth! Here's your money; it was all that could be got together in the town.' Then the chief took the money, and ordered us to change our station. Having arrived at a convenient place, we stopped, and he asked if there were any letters? Being answered that there were two, he gave them to me to read; and learning from them that the sum sent was five hundred crowns, he counted them, and finding the number exact, said all was well; praised the punctuality of the peasant, and gave him some silver as a reward for his trouble: his companion also received a small present."

The robbers now released the poor peasants from San Gregorio. "I, therefore," says the surgeon, "with the peasant of Castel-Madama, remained the only prisoners; and we were made to march across the mountains. I asked why they did not set me at liberty, as they had received so considerable a sum on my account? The chief answered, that I must await the return of the messenger with the second letter, who had been sent to Castel-Madama. I continued to press him to let me go before night, which was now drawing on apace, saying, that perhaps it had not been possible to procure any money at Castel-Madama, and that if I was to remain out all night on the hill in the cold air, it would have been better to have killed me at once. Then the chief stopped me, and bade me take good care how I said such things, for that to them killing a man was a matter of perfect indifference. The same thing was also said to me by another outlaw, whogave me his arm during our rocky journey. At length we reached the top of a mountain where there was some pools of water formed by the rain; and then they gave me some very hard and black bread that I might eat, and drink some of that water. I drank three times; but I found it impossible to eat the bread."

"They continued walking over these mountain tops till midnight, when they met an ass and a shepherd. They mounted the worn-out surgeon on the ass, and the shepherd led them all to his hut, near which was a threshing-floor, and something much better for them, a sheep-fold, whence a sheep was speedily purloined, skinned, and roasted. It was eaten, too, before the surgeon, who had dropped asleep near the blazing hearth, awoke. But the chief had reserved a few slices for him, which he now spit upon his ramrod, roasted, and gave to him, apologising for the absence of salt. Save the chief and a sentinel or two, gorged with mutton and black bread, all the rest of the banditti were fast asleep on the floor, round the fire. 'I could scarcely force myself,' says the surgeon, 'to swallow a few morsels; but I drank a little wine which had been found in a small barrel at the threshing-floor. This was the only time I saw any of the brigands drink any thing but water. The chief told me they were always afraid when fresh wine came, lest it should be drugged; and that they always made whoever brought it drink a good deal of it; and if in two hours no bad symptoms appeared, then they used the wine."

From the shepherd's hut they went to the sheep-fold, where the robbers possessed themselves of some lumps of boiled meat, a great coat, and some cheeses. Here the chief made the poor surgeon write another letter to Castel-Madama, telling his friends, that, if they did not send eight hundred crowns on the following day, the robbers would put him to death, or carry him to the woods of Fajola, if there was a farthing less than that sum. "I told the countryman, who was about to carry this letter, to tell my friends that if they found no purchasers at Castel-Madama for my effects, which I had ordered them to sell, they might send them to Fivoli and sell them there for whatever they would fetch. The chief of the brigands also begged to have a few shirts sent. One of the brigands proposed, I don't know why, to cut off one of my ears, and send it with the letter to Castel-Madama. It was well for me that the chief did not approve of this civil proposal; so it was not done. The chief, however, wanted the countryman to set out the moment; but the countryman of Castel-Madama said, with his usual coolness, that it was not possible to go down that steep mountain during the night; on which the chief told him he might remain in the sheepcote all night, and set out at daylight. 'But take notice,' said he, 'if you do not return by the twentieth hour to-morrow to the sheepcote with the eight hundred crowns, you may go about your business, but we shall throw Cherubini (the surgeon) into some pit.' The peasant tried to persuade them that perhaps it might not be possible to collect so much money in a small town at so short a notice, and begged to have a little more time: but the chief answered, that they had no time to waste, and that if he had not returned by the twentieth hour, they would kill Cherubini."

The robbers again put themselves in movement. There was an improvement in their road, for instead of the rough thickets, they came to fine tall timber trees, the boles of which were comparatively smooth, save where a fallen tree here and there lay across them. But the surgeon was spent with fatigue, and sore afraid, the threats of death constantly ringing in his ear.

"I therefore recommended myself to God, and was begging him to have compassion on my wretched state, when one of the brigands, a man of great stature, who figured among them as a kind of second chief, came up to me, and taking me by the arm, assisted me to walk, and said, 'Now, Cherubini, that you cannot tell the man of Castel-Madama (whom we had left at the sheepcote waiting for daylight.) I assure you that to-morrow, as soon as he returns, you shall go home free, however small be the sum he brings. Be of good cheer therefore, and do not distress yourself.' At that moment I felt such comfort from the assurances of the outlaw, that he appeared to me to be an angel from heaven; and without thinking why I should not, I kissed his hand, and thanked him fervently for his unexpected kindness."

They next laid themselves down to sleep in a thicket, the robbers spreading sheepskins for the doctor, and the chief wrapping up his legs in his own capote. Two men kept awake as sentinels.

"I know not how long I had rested," continues Signor Cherubini, "when one of the sentinels came, and gave notice of daybreak. 'Come to me when it is lighter,' said the chief; and all was again quiet. I turned my face so as not to see the brigands, and dozed a little, till I was roused by the cry of some wild bird. I am not superstitious; but I had often heard that the shriek of the owl foreboded evil; and, in the state of spirits in which I was, every thing had more than its usual effect on me. I started, and said, 'What bird was that?' They answered, 'A hawk.' 'Thank God!' I said, and lay down again. Among my sufferings I cannot forget the stinging and humming of the gnats, which fastened on my face and throat; but after the death of poor Marasca, I dared not even raise my hand to drive them away, lest it should be taken for a sign of impatience."

Soon after this they all arose, and after an hour's walk halted in another thicket, where they breakfasted. After their meal they lay down to sleep as before, all save one litigate bandit, who amused himself by reading the romance of the Cavalier Meschino. In an hour they awoke, and filed off, one by one, to a higher station, leaving a sentinel to guard the surgeon.

"In another hour," says Signor Cherubini, "the youngest man of the robbers came to relieve the guard, who then went and joined the others. When I saw this, and perceived they were engaged in a kind of council of war, I feared that they had taken some new resolution about my life, and that the new sentinel was come to put their cruel designs in execution; but he very soon said to me, 'Be of good cheer, for to-night you will be at home!' which gave me some comfort; but as I could not entirely trust them, I had still an internal fear, which, however, I endeavoured to hide. Shortly afterwards we were called to join the rest, our station being now on the mountain commonly called Colle Picione, not very far from the ancient sanctuary of Montorella. There we remained the rest of the day, only going out of the way once, on the approach of a flock of goats, that we might not be seen by the goatherds; but we soon returned. Then the second chief, who said he was of Sonnino, and one of the five who went to treat with the president of Frosinone, began to talk of the political nature of their situation. He said that government would never succeed in putting them down by force; that they are not a fortress to batter down with cannon, but rather birds which fly round the tops of the sharpest rocks, without having any fixed home; that if, by any misfortune, seven perished, they were sure of ten recruits to replace their loss; for criminals, who would be glad to take refuge among them, were never wanting; that the number of their present company amounted to a hundred and thirty individuals; and that they had an idea of undertaking some daring exploit, perhaps of threatening Rome itself. He ended by saying, that the only way to put an end to their depredations would be to give them a general pardon without reservation or limitation, that they might all return to their houses, without fear of treachery; but otherwise, they would not trust to, nor treat with any one; and added, that this was the reason for which they had not concluded any thing with the prelate sent to Frosinone to treat with them. As it was, their company was determined to trust nothing but a pardon from the pope's own lips. One of the brigands begged me to endeavour to obtain from government the freedom of his wife, now in the prison of Saint Michael in Rome. Another said to me, 'Have patience, Signor Cherubini; we made a blunder when we took you; we intended to have had the prince, who, according to our information, should have passed by at that very time.' In fact, he was to have travelled that road; and just before I passed, not the prince, but the person commonly called so, the vice-prince, or agent, Signor Filippo Gazoni, had gone by, but, fortunately for him, they did not know him, because, as I understood, he was walking along leisurely, only accompanied by an unarmed boy, who was leading his horse. The banditti bit their fingers with rage when they found they had let him slip, for they said they would not have released him under three thousand crowns. The brigand who said all this had the collar of the Madonna delle Carmine round his neck, and said to me 'Suffer patiently, for the love of God.'

"Then the chief of the robbers came to me, and told me he was not very well, and desired me to prescribe for him, which I did, in writing. Another, the same who had taken my watch from me, told me that the watch did not go, and showed it me. I found that he had broken the glass and the minute hand. He said, if I had any money, he would sell it me; but I gave it him back, saying nothing, but shrugging up my shoulders. Meaning the day was drawing to a close, and the chief, taking out his watch, said it was now 'twenty o'clock.' He called the shepherd to him, and ordered him to go back to the sheepfold which we had left during the night, and see if the countryman was come back with the answer to my second letter to Castel-Madama. In that case he ordered him to accompany him back to the place we were now at; and if he were not come he ordered him to wait three hours, and if he did not come then, to return to us alone. The shepherd obeyed, and, after about an hour and a half, he came back with the countryman and another shepherd who had been sent with him. They brought with them two sealed packets of money, which they said contained six hundred crowns. They also brought a few shirts, of homespun linen, which the chief had begged of me, and some little matter for me to eat, and a little wine to recruit me. But I could take nothing but a pear and a little wine; the rest was eaten by the robbers. They took the money without counting, and gave the messengers some silver for their pains; after which they permitted me to depart. And thus I found myself free from them, after having thanked them for their city and for my life, which they had the goodness to spare. On my way homeward, the two men of Castel-Madama informed me, that the prisoner from San Gregorio, who was sent the day before, with the first letter to Castel-Madama for money, and who had not been seen since, had really been there, and had gone back the same day, at the hour and to the place appointed, with the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven crowns, sent from Castel-Madama; but the robbers having forgotten to send any one to meet him at the place agreed on, because we were a great way from it, the messenger returned to town with the money, after having waited till night, carrying back the intelligence that the factor had been killed, which alarmed all my townsmen, who began to fear for my life. I found that the last six hundred dollars had been furnished, half by Castel-Madama, and half by Tivoli. I went on towards Castel-Madama, where all the people anxiously expected me. In fact, a mile before I reached the town, I found a number of people, of all ranks, who had come out to meet me, and I arrived at home a little before night, in the midst of such public congratulations and acclamations as were never before heard, which presented a most affecting spectacle! I had hardly arrived when the Arch-Priest Giustini ordered the bells to be rung, to call the people to the parish church. On the first sound, all the people flocked thither with me, to render public and devout thanks to the most merciful God and to our protector Saint Michael the archangel, for my deliverance. The priest had done the same when he first heard of my capture, and soon after, when he sent the six hundred crowns. Both times he had assembled his congregation in that very church, to offer up public supplications to the Lord, to grant me that mercy which he deigned afterwards to show. I cannot conclude without saying, that the epoch of this my misfortune will be ever remembered by me. I shall always recollect that the Lord God visited me as a father; for, at the moment when his hand seemed to be heavy upon me, he moved the city of Tivoli, and the whole people of Castel-Madama, even the very poorest, to subscribe their money, and sell their goods, in so short a time, and with such profusion for my sake. The same epoch will also always remind me what gratitude I owe to those persons, who with such openness of heart exerted themselves in my favour. I now pray God that he will preserve me from all the bad consequences which commonly arise out of similar misfortunes."

Such is the narrative of Signor Cherubini, which, while it conveys striking pictures of crime and a lawless life, impresses the mind also with touching traits of punctuality, humanity, and generosity on the part of the peasantry and these poor Italians generally. The contrast of vice and virtue, of ferocity and kind-heartedness, is perhaps no where more evident than in Italy, where the social affections flourish in the midst of the hardest growth of crime and cruelty.

The stories told and believed by the peasantry, of the origin and initiation of most of the principal outlaws, are horrid in the extreme. Mrs. Graham, to whom I am indebted for so many interesting and characteristic details, furnishes the following, as "a pretty fair specimen" of the whole.

"A man who had accidentally committed homicide, being afraid of the consequences, fled from the States of the Church, to Conca, in the kingdom of Naples. There, being unprovided with a passport, he was taken up and imprisoned; but 'by the Grace of the Virgin and Saint John the Baptist,' he escaped to the woods: there, after wandering a month, and being almost starved, he met the banditti, who invited him to join them. To this he, nothing loth, consented, when, to try his manhood, they gave him a piece of human flesh roasted to eat, telling him it was part of a Christian's heart! 'It might have eaten two hearts,' said the ruffian, 'but I would have eaten it!' He had then to perform a noviciate of two years, heaving wood, drawing water, and performing other menial offices; but, a year ago, he figured as the chief of a party among them."

But a prolation infinitely more atrocious than this rests on human hearts, was related to myself in the year 1821, when I was travelling in the Abruzzi near the pass of Tagliacozzi, and not far from the frontier of the Roman states. The story was local, but my narrator, a peasant of the country, and then my guide, referred the event to rather a distant period of time.

A young man, who had been several years an outlaw, on the violent death of the chief of the troop he belonged to, aspired to be Capo-banditto, in his stead. He had gone through his noviciate with honour, he had shown both cunning and courage in his calling as brigand, but the supremacy of the band was disputed with him by others, and the state of the times bade the robbers be specially careful as to whom they elected for their leader. He must be the strongest nerved fellow of the set! The ambitious candidate offered to give any, even the most dreadful proof of his strength of nerve, and a monster among his companions proposed he should go to his native village and murder a young girl to whom he had been formerly attached.

"I will do it," said the ruffian, who at once departed on his infernal mission.

When he reached the village, he dared not present himself, having begun his crimes there by murdering a comrade: he skulked behind an old stone fountain, outside of the village, until near sunset, when the women came forth with their copper vases on their heads to get their supplies of water at the fountain. His mistress came carelessly gossiping with the rest. He could have shot her with his rifle, but he was afraid of pursuit, and wanted, besides, time to secure and carry off a bloody trophy. He therefore remained quiet, only hoping that she might loiter behind the rest. She, however, was one of the first to balance her vessel of water on her head, and to take the path to the village, whither all the gossips soon followed her. What was now to be done? He was determined to go through the ordeal and consummate the hellish crime. A child went by the fountain whistling. He laid down his rifle, so as not to alarm the little villager, and presenting himself to him, gave him the reliquary he had worn round his neck for years, and which was well known to his mistress, and told him to run with it to her, and tell her an old friend desired to speak with her at the fountain. The child took the reliquary, and a piece of silver which the robber gave him on his vowing by the Madonna to say nothing about the matter in the village before one hour of the night, and ran on to the village. The robber then retired behind the old fountain, taking his rifle in his hand, and keeping a sharp look out, lest his mistress should betray him, or not come alone.

But the affectionate girl, who might have loved him still in spite of his guilt, who might have hoped to render him succour on some urgent need, or, perhaps, to hear that he was penitent and anxious to return to society, went alone and met him at the fountain, where, as the bells of the village church were tolling the Ave Maria, her lover met her, and stabbed her to the heart! The monster then cut off her head, and ran away with it to join the brigands, who were obliged to own, that after such a deed and such a proof as he produced, he was worthy to be their chief.

NEAPOLITAN AND ROMAN BRIGANDS.

SUNDRY ANECDOTES, FACETIOUS AND SERIOUS.

Many of the stories of the Roman and Neapolitan banditti are far from being of so tragical a nature as those I have related. On the contrary, a jest book might be filled with very funny stories regarding them. The brigands were often facetious and full of frolicsome tricks, at the not very serious expense of those they waylaid, while at times they were the butts and victims to those who fell in with them.

As Lady B—— was travelling from Rome to Naples, with rather a numerous suite, she "fell among thieves." The robbers had a tolerable good booty, but there was one excellent laugh against them. Her ladyship's medical attendant had a large medicine chest in the carriage; this was immediately broken open by the robbers, who thought the neat and strong mahogany case must contain jewels or other valuables. They were disappointed, and somewhat puzzled, when they found a number of square crystal bottles, &c. Two of the robbers took out each one of these bottles, whose medical contents were liquid and bright—the one like rosolio, the other like maraschina di Zara. The two robbers concluded at once they were nothing else than these favourite liquors, or some foreign cordial of a similar nature and excellence; and anxious for the first draught, each put his bottle to his mouth, and did not withdraw it until he had taken a hearty swig. Then, indeed, the bottles were withdrawn, and dashed, with horrible curses to the earth; and the two rogues, with terror in their countenances, threw themselves on the doctor, in the same breath, threatening to kill him, and begging to know whether they were poisoned, and he could cure them? The worthy practitioner, who was an Irishman, and as such fond of a joke, would have had here a good opportunity of indulging in one, by making the trembling fellows believe for awhile that they had swallowed some infernal poison, worse than the acqua tophana; but under circumstances, and in the presence of armed banditti, he thought it more prudent to tell them that they had only swallowed a little medicine, which could do them no harm, however badly it might taste; and to reserve his laugh at them for taking his physic for sweet waters, till a more convenient opportunity.

In the next little anecdote, another brigand of another band cut a still more ridiculous figure. My friend Mr. W——, a merchant of Naples, was travelling post with a Swiss merchant, and had nearly reached the city of Capua, which is only about fourteen miles from Naples, when his carriage was suddenly stopped. It was night, but a beautiful moon—the moon of Naples, which, as the witty Marchese Caraccioli used to say, was worth a London sun, illuminated the scene, and allowed W—— to see that there were only three or four brigands near the coach, and that they had not yet knocked the position off the horses. W—— took his measures accordingly with great presence of mind and boldness. As the foremost brigand came to the side of the carriage, within reach, bawling and cursing for those within to come out and be robbed, he caught hold of the ruffian by the breasts of his jacket, and called out to the postilion to gallop off for Capua, where he should be well rewarded. The postilion, who had known him before on the road, took W—— at his word, and, with a boldness rarely found in his class, whipped his horses, that went off, (as Neapolitan horses generally will do), "an end." As the postilion's whip touched the withers of his steeds, a bullet whizzed past his head, but missed its aim. Away then went the carriage and the merchants and the robber as swift as the old witches in Goethe's Faustus; W——, who was a robust man, keeping a firm hold of the robber, who dangled—his head and shoulders in, and the rest of his body outside of the vehicle,—like a lamb or a calf over a butcher's cart. W——'s companion occasionally assisted him. After numerous but vain struggles to extricate himself from their grasp, the captured brigand, whose legs were bruised in the cruellest manner, begged the rapid carriage wheels, and his breath almost bumped out of his body, protested it was all a mistake, and begged most piteously to be released. The merchants, however, kept the price they had made in so curious a manner, and soon arrived at Capua. This being a fortified town, most awkwardly for travellers, placed on the high road, they had to wait some time until a letter was sent to the commandant, and permission obtained to admit them. When the drawbridge was lowered, they rolled over it, with the robber still dangling at the coachside, and delivered him at the guard-house.

The next morning the merchants appeared before the justice of peace, and after their depositions had been received, the brigand was given over to the civil authorities, and cast into prison, where he lay for many months, without being brought to judgment. What finally became of him I know not; but I remember very well, that my friend W——, though he was rather proud of the novel exploit, had so much trouble in consequence of it, and the somewhat peculiar course of Neapolitan justice, that he used often to wish he had left the fellow in the road.

The next of my concluding anecdotes of Italian banditti on which I lay my band, is of a more tragical nature. "In the month of March 1817," says a popular author of travels, "I was out with one of my friends on a shooting party near Aquila, when I heard the farmers talking of robberies without number committed by the troop of The Independence. There was much talent, and a Turkish bravery, shown in the manner in which they were achieved. I paid little attention to all this; robberies in these parts are so common; I was all eyes to observe the manners of the people. I gave some money to a poor woman who was with child, and who, I was told, was a soldier's widow, when one said to me: 'Oh sir, she is not to be pitied, she has the ration of the banditti,' and they went on to give me the following detail:—

"There is in this country a company of thirty men and four women, all mounted in a superior manner on blood horses. This band calls itself the troop of The Independence; its chief is a former Marchal-de-Logis of king Joachim.† He orders such a landlord, or such a farmer, to put such a sum of money, on such a day, at the foot of such a tree; if not, he himself will be murdered and his house set on fire. When this troop are on the march, they send orders the day before to all the farmers on their route, to have a repast ready at such an hour, for so many persons, the best that their means will afford. This service is more regularly performed than the provision for the royal household in its progress through the country."

"About a month before I received this detail, a farmer, being piqued at the imperious manner in which the repast was ordered, sent information of it to the general, and the Independents were surrounded by a numerous band of infantry and cavalry; they fought their way through, covering the ground with the dead bodies of the soldiers, while not one of their own party fell. Learning the treachery of the farmer, they sent notice to him to settle his affairs. Three days afterwards they took possession of the farm, where they instituted a tribunal, and the farmer being put to the torture, confessed everything. After deliberating together awhile in secret, they approached the unhappy farmer, and threw him into a large cauldron which was upon the fire, full of milk for making cheese. When he had boiled there for some time, they forced all the servants to eat of this infernal banquet.

"The chief could easily increase his troop to a thousand men; but he says that his talents for command will not go beyond a band of thirty, and he restrains himself to keeping up this number. He receives daily applications from people to be received into the band; but he requires a title, that is, wounds received in the field of battle, not certificates given from complaisance:—these are his very words.

"This spring, the peasants of these parts suffered very much from scarcity. The chief of the Independents distributed among the sufferers tickets upon the rich. The rations were a pound and a half of bread for a man, a pound for a woman, and two pounds for a woman with child. The woman who excited my curiosity, had for a month received six of these tickets in the week for two pounds of bread each. For the rest, no one ever knows where the band are to be found, they get all the spies on their side. In the time of the Romans this chief of banditti would have been a Marcellus."

Though there is a little exaggeration in this account, the main points are correct, more particularly that which regards the robber's provident care of the poor.

"I have done more acts of charity," said one of these brigands, when he fell into the hands of the law, "than any three convents in these provinces!" And so, perhaps, he had, and at as little cost to himself as the monks, who beg themselves (as he had stolen) from others, what they live upon and give to beggars.

Though the "Independent" may have been averse to increase their band with men, they seem to have been anxious to recruit it with women, for at the end of 1817, as I was crossing the range of mountains above Sorra, that separates the Garigliano from the lake of Celano, in the Abruzzi, I heard the following event, at a little village where I stopped to refresh myself.

A pretty girl of the place, betrothed to a respectable young farmer, was carried off by the robbers as she was going with an old female relative to early morning mass at a chapel on the skirts of the village. The alarm was instantly spread, and a pursuit undertaken by all the fair captive's relatives and friends, with the agonised lover at their head. After scouring the country for several hours, without finding any trace of the brigands, many of the pursuing party, through fatigue and dread of advancing farther into the mountains towards the place where they had reason to apprehend the band was collected in force, hung back, and talked of returning home. The desperate lover would not pause a moment, but still hurried forward with a braver or more deeply interested few. But even these few, one by one, abandoned, what seemed so hopeless or desperate a chase, or, unable to keep up with the speed of the active, young lover, followed him trembling and panting, at a distance.

He was alone, and far ahead of them, when he heard a shriek. Flying in the direction of the sound, he soon came to a wooded hollow, where he saw through the boles of the trees his affianced struggling in the arms of a desperate-looking ruffian. Such a moment, to a bold young lover, was not a moment for hesitation or calculation,—he glided through the trees, and before the robber could seize his carbine, which lay only a few feet from the spot where his struggling victim had dragged him—almost before the robber could draw his dagger, he ran his sword home to his heart. The released girl threw herself into her lover's arms; but there was yet work to do ere he could resign himself to his transports. A second brigand, who had been stationed at the edge of the wood to keep watch, heard the shout of the lover as he made the assault, and the curse of his comrade or superior as he fell beneath it, and now rushed to the spot, with that brigand yell which the poor peasantry so much dread. The young man, with his weeping mistress still hanging on his neck, drew behind a tree—he had the advantage of a trifling elevation in his favour, and as the robber had his last step on this, and came close to him, he suddenly turned round the tree, put his foot on the fallen ruffian, who still murmured in his throat, and with a pistol, shot the second villain through the body. Supporting and caressing the dear girl his valour had so opportunely liberated, he then made all the haste he could out of the hollow, and soon came in sight of the few friends who had followed him thus far, and of whom some had been brought to a stand still, and others put to a retrograde flight by the report of his pistol in the wood. The unexpected sight, and the triumphant shouts of the lover, with his recovered affianced one, brought them, however, speedily together, and they returned to the village, with more joy than they hoped for when they set out from it on their pursuit.

The band of the "Independent" was destroyed a few months after this event.

One of the boldest deeds of resistance to the brigands was performed by a major on Murat's staff, a native of one of the German cantons of Switzerland. His name was Volff. This officer was travelling post from Naples to Rome with despatches, in a little, low, open calèche: he had not even a servant with him. In the Pontine Marshes he was stopped by six sturdy and well armed brigands. Expecting no resistance from a single man, the robbers stood by the door of the carriage uttering tremendous curses and commanding him to descend. This he presently did; but as he left his seat he grasped a ready brace of pistols, and crossed his arms under his military cloak; and as he touched the ground he pressed a trigger on either side of him, and two of the brigands, who were almost in contact with his person, fell dead by the carriage. His sabre was as ready as his pistols—with it he cleft the head of one robber who fell, and wounded another, who then, with his two unhurt but terrified companions, took to flight, and left the officer master of the field.

The unluckiest thing the Neapolitan and Roman banditti about the frontiers did in my time was to take an Austrian colonel, on the staff of General Frimont, their commander in chief at Naples. They carried this officer to the mountains, where they kept him many days, which I have heard him describe as days of continual alarm and horror, and at last procured a good ransom for him. But a dreadful vengeance followed close on this compliance, which had been necessitated by consideration for the safety of the colonel, whom the ruffians would most assuredly have murdered, had the ransom not been paid. Old Frimont sent nearly his whole force of jagers, or light troops, against them. Measures were concerted with the papal government. The Austrians were allowed free ingress into the Roman states; and they hunted the brigands in the mountains from place to place, with a most persevering activity. The shepherds and other peasants were seized, and forced to act as guides. The enraged Austrians were not restrained by many scruples. Wherever they found men with arms, they shot them: in some instances they burned down whole villages. The wives of the brigands, in the course of these tragical visitations, in several instances displayed a heroism worthy of ancient Roman matrons, and the soldiery were obliged to deal with them as though they had been men. An officer of jagers with whom I was acquainted, was shot in the shoulder, from behind a rock, by one of these heroines, who, when made prisoner, and threatened with instant death unless she showed the track of the brigands, clenched her fist, and said, looking at the rock from which they had dragged her, "Unbaptised dogs that ye are! you may as well attempt to make those stones speak, as to make me divulge where are my husband, my brother, and my friends!" And even when the jagers levelled their rifles and put their fingers to the trigger, not a word could they force from the woman, who muttered something to herself, as though a prayer to the Madonna, or her guardian saint.

There is very little doubt that the Austrians shot many a poor mountaineer that was no robber, but they certainly succeeded in putting down the banditti, who from that time (in 1824) never recovered their former importance and audacity, until the recent political troubles in Rome again.

The Austrians did not, however, achieve this without tremendous sufferings and losses. Frimont thought proper to keep forces in the lawless country he had purged. Those in the mountains fared pretty well, but the ranks of the poor jagers in the valley of the Garigliano, and in other low, marshy places, where they were stationed nearly a whole summer, were awfully thinned by malaria fevers of peculiar malignity. I had myself seen some time before, in the Abruzzi, a fine battalion of this truly excellent branch of the Austrian army; it was composed almost entirely of Bohemians, young and florid men. I met the same battalion at the end of this year, and found one half of it dead or in the hospital! I enquired after three of the officers to whom I had been indebted for much civility while travelling, and was told that one of them, a noble young fellow of three or four and twenty, had left his bones by the banks of the Garigliano, the other two were gone to the hospital at Naples. This is something much worse than dying in the "deadly breach," or on the field of battle, where, at least, (if they do not mis-spell our names!) we may have the honour of ornamenting a gazette of victory or glory!

It was about this time, that I, who had twice gone safely through the pass of Forino, even when those Corymbi of banditti, the Vardarelli, were at the plenitude of their power, and who for seven years (in which I by no means led a sedentary or fixed life) had always escaped falling into the hands of a respectable band of brigands, fell unluckily under the clutches of a contemptible gang of novices and bunglers.

My friend, the Prince D'I——, among other meritorious exertions to improve his estates, had undertaken to drain an immense extent of land he held between the mouth of the river Volturno and the lake of Patria—an enterprise in which, to the disgrace of his wealthy but unenterprising relatives, and of the imbecile government of the time, which, instead of encouraging, thwarted him, he was left to fail and to ruin his fortune. The place was only some fifteen miles from the capital, and whilst the labours of digging canals and making embankments were in full activity, the prince was accustomed to go down three or four times in the week, carrying money on the Saturday to pay the labourers. I accompanied him very frequently. It was imprudent, no doubt, but though the prince had a good number of armed guardia in his service, we always went without an escort and frequently without arms. Our road, after leaving the town of Pozzuoli, was chiefly through a solitary and wild country that bore rather a bad character; but no robberies had been heard of for a long time, and from the constant employment he gave to so many of the neighbouring peasantry, my friend might deem himself a popular character. In short, we had fifty times made the journey, and with good sums of money, without any mauvais rencontre, and thought we never should meet any, when early one fine spring morning, as we were driving in a little drosky, over a rough and narrow road that ran through fields of lupins, which in that climate grow to the height of six or seven feet, I was cut short in a story I was telling, by having a long gun put to my breast by a fellow who had been concealed in the lupin-field. At the same instant my friend received the same compliment, and our driver, a boy of fourteen or fifteen, who was riding en postillon, was knocked off his horse. We had each a pistol and no more in the carriage, and these we had to draw from under the apron. My friend moved his arm to catch his,—I was disengaging my arm from my cloak to do the same, when with the eye of a military man he glanced at the fellows' guns, which almost touched our breasts, and saw they were full cocked. There was no chance—we had to draw our pistols from the pockets of the carriage and to cock them—and the robbers were swearing they would fire into our hearts, if we did not put our hands out of the carriage and instantly descend. Had we hesitated, of a certainty they would have shot us both from very fear, for as we afterwards learned they knew very well that the prince had pistols with him, and only a few days before we had been amusing ourselves on the estate by firing at a mark, when he, as a good shot, rather surprised the country people, from whom the rogues had in all probability heard of his address. Whatever I might have done, he would not have missed his aim at twenty paces—but they were only their muskets' length from us. As it was, however, our case was hopeless, and hiding me in English, which he spoke very well, step out of the carriage, and say nothing to the ruffians, he asked them what they would of him. "Your money, you robber! you infamous assassin!" Was the reply of these honest men, who indeed kept up their courage, all the time they were with us and robbing us, by calling us these names and others, which those who knew the law, Neapolitans may fancy, but which I may not repeat.

"Take it," said the prince, pointing to the canvas bags that lay at his feet, "Take it, and go to the devil!" He was a fine, athletic, commanding figure of a man, and well known to be a brave one—even then, completely in their power as he was, they were afraid to approach him to take the money, and insisted, with the most horrible oaths, that he should descend, or they would fire upon him. The fellow who seemed to be the leader of the enterprise, had his finger on his trigger. I, who was standing by the road side with an ugly gun still at my breast, now thought it time to say, "For heaven's sake, come down." My friend stepped out of the carriage, and again told them to take the money and be off. But now, though a novice in his profession, one of the robbers, insisting on the faccia in terra ceremony, swore he would shoot us unless we lay down with our faces to the ground. This we would not do. In the next instant, the villain who had approached the carriage, cried "Ecco le pistole!"—Here are the pistols—it's all right—never mind now!" and taking out the brace, he threw away the priming, and, after dragging them, with their pans open, through the wet grass, he then threw them into the bottom of the carriage, and drew out the money, which was contained in two canvass bags.

All the while this was performing, the fellow who stood guard over me, trembled with agitation: he shook, indeed, to such a degree, that knowing, as I well did, the crazy nature of guns of common Neapolitan manufacture, and seeing his close to my body and ready to go off, I apprehended the bungler would shoot me without intending it—and once requested he would take it from my breast, as I was unarmed and could make no resistance.

When the money had been thrown in among the tall lupins, with a repetition of the pretty epithets they had already honoured us with, they lifted up the poor boy, who was almost dead with affright, from before the horses' heads, and made us get into the carriage and drive on. They swore they would shoot us if we looked back. This, however, we did when at a short distance, and saw them mount their horses, which had been concealed from us in the thick high lupin-field, and strike across the country.

The scene of the robbery was little more than a mile from the estate, where the prince, at the time, had several hundred men at work, and thither we now drove at a gallop.

The loss had been a heavy one—for owing to his not having made his payments to the labourers the preceding week, my friend had three thousand Neapolitan ducats, or five hundred pounds, with him in the bags. The robbers never touched our persons, or said a word about our delivering what we had in our pockets. Had they done so, I should have lost only a few dollars in silver and a watch of slight value, but they would have found on the prince rather a heavy purse of gold and a very valuable watch.

We soon reached the estate, where my friend, who had repressed his mortification and anger, gave them full vent, when a silly old man in his service as a sort of factor, recommended, as the first thing essential in such a case, that we should both get bed, to obviate the effects resulting from sudden alarm. This is a common Neapolitan practice, but, I believe, besides my friend's burst of rage and contempt, I stormed at the old fool as well, for proposing it in our case. We were presently on horseback with a formidable posse of guardiani, fattori, and servanti, all mounted and well armed, and, dividing into different parties, scoured the country in pursuit of the robbers.

From the solitude and wildness of the country, which for the greater part is covered by pantani or marshes, lakes, and almost impenetrable woods, we had slight hopes, when we set out, of catching them. Yet, from the shortness of the time that had elapsed, and the speed at which we rode, we were close upon them, and at one time fancied we should catch them, for we fell in with a poor old peasant woman who had just seen four men dividing two bags of money, which they were probably doing thus early for the convenience of carrying it—one thousand five hundred ducats, in silver, in each bag, being a good weight. Encouraged by this information, we galloped on. Smarting as we were under the recent outrage, had we caught the robbers, I am confident we should have taken justice into our own hands and shot them, without waiting for the tardy decisions of the courts—but, alas! we were not so fortunate. We hunted, in vain, through a complete labyrinth of cross-roads or rather paths, beat several woods, and interrogated several shepherds, in vain, and were at last obliged to return to our canal digging and embankments, with our original loss—and with our revenge ungratified.

When we returned to Naples that night, we had the consolation of hearing from all the friends we met, "I told you so!—I knew how it would be!—I wonder you haven't been both murdered long ago, going with money through that cut-throat country!" Some also talked about bleeding—but, in a metaphorical sense, surely my friend had been bleed enough!

When we had dined we went to the minister of police, who was, where every Neapolitan who can afford it is at that time of the night, at the Opera. We went there too. The next morning, however, the prince saw the man in authority, who engaged that nothing should be neglected for the detection and arrest of the offenders. We were pretty certain that these men were not regular robbers, and that they belonged to the immediate neighbourhood of the estate. We had yet another clue—by a very extraordinary circumstance, all the money was in two earlin pieces (in value about eight pence each), and by tracing a sudden influx of this particular coin in any of the little towns or villages, a discovery might be made.

To be brief, in about a fortnight four men were arrested and thrown into the prison of the Vicaria at Naples. Some six weeks after their arrest, the prince, myself, and the boy who was driving us, were summoned to that prison, and asked if we could recognise the men if they were shown us. My friend and myself both confidently affirmed that we could, for we had marked them well during our short interview. The boy was less confident.

The prince was then conducted into a hall in the prison, leaving me and the boy together. In a few minutes a jailer returned without the prince, and desired me to follow him, which I did, leaving the boy alone. I was ushered into a dark, dirty apartment, where a dozen or fifteen ruffianly looking fellows were ranged in a line, and was told to point out among them the perpetrators of the robbery. Being short sighted I went close up to this villainous file, and as soon as my eye became accustomed to the faulty light of the place, I pointed out one of my ci-devant calculators.

"Touch him with your hand," cried a little man in the corner, who was noting down what passed.

I laid my hand on the ruffian, who said with a bold enough laugh "Ah! signor mio, l'avete sbagliato grossamente!" (Ah, sir! you have made a gross mistake.) But when I laid my hand on a second, I saw that fellow's countenance change, and that he could scarcely avoid shrinking from my touch. When my recognition was finished, I was removed to another room and left alone, and the boy was called in. When the boy had picked out his men, they brought him into the room where I was, and then led us to the prince. It appeared that my friend, and myself, and the boy had selected the same individuals, only that the boy had at first been doubtful as to one of them.

On the strength of such evidence as this alone, one might have hoped for a speedy and decisive trial. But we were at Naples! I heard nothing more of the robbers for some months. When I was called to attend a trial, which, when I went to the court, I found, without learning why, was postponed.

In this interim there had been some talk in the neighbourhood, and even on the estate, that vengeance would be taken on us by the robbers' kinsmen and friends, for maliciously detaining in prison innocent, unfortunate men, which said individuals turned out to be, as we expected, of those parts, and acquainted with the circumstance that the prince carried good sums of money there every Saturday. For a month or so we had an escort of guardiani, but then went and came alone as before, frequently travelling in the darkness of night. I am fain to confess that at first, whenever I saw fellows skulking along the solitary roads with long guns in their hands, (which happened rather frequently, as, spite of the prohibition of government, nearly every peasant had his gun in that wild district,) I felt rather uncomfortable, and took care, at least, that my pistol should not be under the apron and uncocked. But this wore off, and we never heard of the prisoners' kinsmen and friends.

It was nearly two years after the offence that I was again summoned to the Vicaria. This time the trial really began; but there were only three prisoners produced—the fourth had contracted a disease and died in the prison! Had I met either of these men in the pursuit when my blood was hot, I should most assuredly have had the heart to blow his brains out. At the moment I was first confronted with them in prison, I might have borne to see one or two of them hanged; but after this long interval, in which one of them had died in a dungeon, in which I had been occupied by so many other thoughts, and feelings, and pursuits; in which, on the whole, I had enjoyed so much, and the three men, in whose hands my life had been, now crouching before me, emaciated and broken by their long and rigorous confinement, had suffered so much, I am sure, had I been able, I would have opened their prison doors and set them free. I felt sick at heart when I had to make my deposition.

One of the curious features in this extraordinary trial was, that I was never put to my oath; for when it came to that test, the presiding judge, who knew very little of me, said that my word as an Englishman and a gentleman was enough! The compliment did not prevent my astonishment at the time, and my reference in my own mind to the modes of criminal procedure in my own country. My being a protestant, I fancy, could have nothing to do in the matter, and indeed in more than one instance I had been put to my oath in the kingdom of Naples before the health officers, on arriving at a Lazzaretto.

Besides my evidence, which I thought was full and decisive, there was that of the boy and of several other witnesses, including the old woman. When I thought sentence was going to be pronounced, the court broke up, and the prisoners were remanded. I stayed at Naples five or six months longer without hearing any thing more of the robbers; what became of them I know not, for at the end of that period I quitted the country, and transferred myself to a land where justice is much more summary—I mean Turkey.

It was said by many of the Neapolitans at the time, that the robbers, who had been taken long before they could possibly spend so considerable a sum, (a fortune almost to men of their condition in that country!) had made good use of it in delaying the law's severity. What I know is, that my friend never saw a carlin of his three thousand ducats.

But what I know also is, the proneness of the Neapolitans to speak ill of each other, and to vituperate their own government. I have, moreover, lived too many years in that country, to adopt the sweeping prejudices of hasty and unexamining travellers, or to believe all or even a tithe of what is asserted against the Italians generally; still, however, the facts were such as I have represented them, and the comments they must provoke, in whatever way we look at them, cannot be otherwise than most unfavourable to the criminal courts of Naples.

That beautiful country has now a new and young king, who has, it is said, already effected many salutary reforms; let us hope he has directed, or will direct his attention to the proper administration of justice, which will be a greater benefit to the Neapolitans, than, under circumstances, their Spanish Constitution could have provided.

And now good night to Italian brigands, and once more farewell to Italy—a country where my brightest days have been passed, for I can never hope to retrace the pleasant period of life between seventeen years and twenty-seven—a country for which I may assert a hearty admiration, knowing it and living in it so long as I have done, without, I trust, incurring the suspicion of sentimentalism or affection—a country where I have had, and am confident still have, some of my best friends, and where, next to my native land, I should prefer to end my life, and find a quiet and a humble grave.

SICILIAN BRIGANDS.

The beautiful island of Sicily, which has generally had the fortune to be as badly governed as southern Italy—almost as often subjected to foreign invasion and conquest, also abounds, like Calabria, on the opposite side of the Faro, in mountains of most difficult access, and wild swamps, once fertile plains, that aided the island in its acquisition of its proud title of "The Granary of Rome," and has consequently abounded with banditti and men of the most desperate characters. Save in one solitary instance, there is little, however, in the lives of the Sicilian robbers, different from those of their near neighbours, the Calabrians. Their mode of plundering, their places of retreat, their general habits of life were the same; but they have not been so fortunate as the continental freebooters, in having good narrators of their exploits, nor have I been so lucky as to find one good eye-witness account of them. The first of the two anecdotes I have selected, came to me in the way of oral tradition, and the name of the hero has escaped me.

The peculiarity of this Sicilian robber's case is, that he did every thing single handed—he commanded no band, but mannequins, or large puppets the size of life, made and dressed up by himself, were his passive but effective satellites. He must have been an artist of considerable ingenuity, for his figures were perfect as far as brigand costume and ferocity of expression went. Their eyes were large and staring, their whiskers most tremendous, and their mouths, of course, were never seen to relax with a smile of good nature.

His plan of operation was simply this. He set up his puppets against a bank or hillock by some road side, or among bushes or thickets hanging over the road—he contrived to make them hold long guns pointed down on the road, and their daggers and couteaux de chasse were visible in their bosoms or girdles. His position was always chosen where the road or mountain path was broken and tortuous, and where passengers would come suddenly in view of his troop and he covered by their musketry at the turn of a corner. While they remained more immovable even than the Austrian sentinels at their posts, he kept a sharp look out from a point whence he could see the approaches by the road on both sides. If the travellers were numerous and well armed, he withdrew his men, like a prudent commander, and hid them and himself in the thicket; but if those who approached were less formidable, he placed himself by the side of his steady troop, and when the timid wayfarers popped upon the appalling spectacle of their fierce faces, and innumerable guns that seemed just going to be fired at them, he rushed upon them, well armed as he always was, and made them perform the "faccia in terra" evolution, which they readily did, under the impression that they would be shot by the figures on the road side if they disobeyed. He then made them give up their money or what moveable things of value they might have with them; and this also they did with promptitude, thinking a whole band of robbers kept guard over them. As soon as this agreeable operation was performed, he ordered them to rise and return the way they had come, swearing by the most tremendous oaths, that he among them who should dare to look back, was a dead man!

When the despoiled had departed, he relieved his guard, carried off and concealed his never murmuring adherents, until he should again think proper to take the field, and instead of dividing the spoils with greedy comrades, he put them all into his own pocket.

Numerous were the robberies committed by the solitary Sicilian in this ingenious manner, and as he was continually changing his scene of action, the whole island soon rang with the fame of his formidable band. Yet, do what they would, government could never trace them. Even when, as at times it happened, a military force was in the neighbourhood of the place where the depredation was committed, and sent in pursuit with the greatest alacrity, they never could come up with the banditti. Nor could promises or threats, or actual violence and torture, ever extract from the shepherds or the peasantry, scattered about spots likely to be their haunts, a confession that they had ever supplied the dangerous band with food—had ever even seen them. It may well be conceived that the pardon of accomplices and rewards offered to such of the band as would return to society, and "turn king's evidence" (as our Newgate phrase goes), were all thrown away, and that none of the robber's gang would betray him. The trick, however, was detected at last. One day a considerable armed force came so suddenly upon the ingenious chief, who had not, perhaps, chosen his spot with his usual felicity, that he had not time to withdraw his faithful adherents before the cacciatori, or sharpshooters, were in front of them, and within rifle shot, summoning them to surrender.

"Lay down your arms and submit," cried the captain of the troop, "and no evil shall befall you from us—justice will deal with you, and our government is merciful!" There was no answer returned, and as the officer saw the robbers' guns still levelled at him and his men, he gave the word of command. "Present arms!"

The cacciatori levelled their rifles, but to their surprise the robbers neither spoke nor retreated, nor dipped behind the bushes, but stood there like targets to be shot at.

"Fire!" cried the captain.

The soldiers discharged their pieces. One of the robbers fell, another staggered, and remained declining from the perpendicular, but the others were as fixed as before, and to the no small surprise of the soldiers did not even return their fire.

The captain and his men thought they were entranced—fixed by a spell, or else planning some desperate manoeuvre, nor did they fire again, until they had well looked to their flanks and rear, expecting an ambushed attack by others of this Pythagorean band.

At the second volley three more of the robbers fell, and then the soldiers boldly rushed forward to the thicket—when they had the satisfaction to find that they had been kept in awe by puppets, and had been firing at jackets and breeches stuffed with straw, two of which fierce figures, still alert, seemed to defy them to do their worst!

The mover of the marionette banditti had meanwhile made good his escape, but he was caught, some time after the destruction of his band, in the commission of some paltry footpad robbery, and sent to the galleys, where he used afterwards to amuse his companions in captivity by relating his wonderful exploits as capo-bandito, or robber chief.

The second anecdote is worth slight mention.

A friend of mine, a young English merchant, tolerably well acquainted with Sicily and its language, travelling some years ago in the interior of the island, had to pass a place that for some months had enjoyed a disagreeable notoriety as being frequented by an association that levied contributions on the road, and occasionally forgot that commandment which saith "Thou shalt do no murder." About the hour of noon he reached a solitary tavern on the side of a lofty mountain, and here, though he knew it was the very worst place on his journey, he was obliged to stop to rest his tired mules. Making a virtue of necessity, my friend followed the very sinister-looking Boniface of the miserable inn to a little room, where a table was soon spread for him. The house afforded nothing but eggs, garlic, a little macearoni, some sour bread and sour wine; but like an experienced traveller he had brought a good basket with him, and this being handed in, he began to make a hearty meal. He was considerably advanced in this pleasant operation, and, having swallowed a glass or two of generous Faro wine, was becoming very indifferent to banditti and the dangers of the road, when he was startled by a loud fierce voice speaking outside of the inn. He ran to the window, but on looking out, he only saw his muletter, who had evidently been disturbed in a slumber, rubbing his eyes, and the brawny back of a tall man who was gliding into the house. He thought the latter might be the landlord, and returned to his seat and table, but before he could carry the next morsel to his mouth, he heard heavy footsteps approaching the door—in the next moment, the door flew open, and a man of almost gigantic stature, with a long gun in his hand, a brace of pistols and a long knife in his girdle, entered the room. My friend started up. The intruder eyed him from head to foot, and his countenance, before none of the railroads now relaxed, and he said, "O! you are an Englishman, are you?—Pray don't let me disturb you!" He was about to turn out of the room, when my friend, recovering his presence of mind, paid him the compliment, never omitted in Sicily or the south of Italy, when one is found eating, of inviting him to partake with him. The intruder declined, but my friend not confining himself to a mere empty compliment (and among the Sicilians and Neapolitans it is no more) pressed him to share his meal, and the stranger, placing his long gun by his side, sat down.

He declined partaking of a pasticcio, or meat-pie, because it was a fast day, but accepted of some good biscuit and English cheese, which he declared to be excellent, and drank freely enough of the Faro wine.

By degrees, the two became very sociable. They talked about the English army that had been in Sicily, (almost the only place I have had the fortune to visit, where the English have left grateful hearts behind them;) then of the Neapolitans, whom the stranger of course hated; then of one thing, and then of another, until my friend alluded to the state of the roads and the banditti.

"You are safe from them," said the stranger, touching my friend's glass with his own, "take my word for that! I am their chief—Don Cesare!"

My friend, though he had some slight suspicion or misgiving, concealed his emotion as much as he could, and even went so far as to mutter the formula of politeness—that he was much honoured in making his acquaintance. He could not, however, conceal his real feelings from the quick-eyed Sicilian, who said, as though his delicacy was hurt by his suspicion, "Signor, mi fute torto: Sir, you wrong me; I would not, for the wealth of all Palermo, hurt a hair of your head, or take from you, without your free will, so much as this bit of biscuit. I have served your countrymen—I wish they were back again. I have eaten their bread, and though circumstances have made me what I am, I will continue to be the friend of every Englishman I meet."

Quite tranquillised by these words, and the earnest manner in which the brigand uttered them, my friend gave appropriate thanks, and then made free to ask what were the circumstances that had driven him to such a dangerous profession? The robber replied without any shyness.

It appeared that Don Cesare was one of those Sicilians who, when the Neapolitans made their revolution in 1820, aimed at still further changes, or at rendering their island independent of the continental kingdom to which it has been so long linked. These men, who were very numerous, would hear nothing of the benefits of that constitution which their fellow subjects, the Neapolitans, without knowing what it was, had adopted from the Spaniards, but insisted on separating from them and erecting Sicily into one independent state, with a king and constitution of its own. In attempting to effect this, much crime and cruelty were committed, much blood was shed; and, be it said in justice, considerable determination and valour shown by the lower order of the Sicilians, particularly at Palermo, where for some time they kept at bay a whole Neapolitan army, commanded by General Florestan Pepe, a brother to, but an abler man than, William Pepe, the hero of Riети. The Sicilian patriots, however, could not succeed; and, not many months after, when the Neapolitan constitution was "whistled down the wind," and old King Ferdinand re-pristinated, that sovereign thought fit to investigate the offences of his Sicilian subjects. Some were arrested and thrown into prison; some hid themselves, and some, among whom was my friend's acquaintance, Don Cesare, fled to the mountains, and turned brigands.

When my friend's curiosity was satisfied on this head, he ventured to express his surprise at the liberty of range the robber allowed himself, and to ask if he were not afraid the people of the country would lay hands on him? To this, Don Cesare said, that besides his own gun and knife, he had always the arms of others near him; that in a minute he could surround the house where they were with his trusty followers; and that as to the country people they knew their own interests too well to interfere with those who never harmed them, and who, after all, were nothing less than unfortunate honest men that had attempted to rid the island of the Neapolitans.

By this time the refreshed mules were at the door of the hostel; so, thanking Don Cesare for his civility and communicativeness, as that preparatory step to every departure from an inn, he called the ill-looking Boniface for his bill. The host only followed the usual practice, by asking a young Englishman somewhat more than double what he would have asked a Sicilian. My friend, without a remark, drew out his purse: the robber snatched it from him, and shut it up in his broad, horny hand. "No, sir, this shall never be—the account is not just," said he; and then turning to the host, he bade him have a conscience, and not assassinate a stranger, and an Englishman, in that way.

The innkeeper muttered something: my friend, who did not wish to have words about what after all was a mere trifle, not amounting to more than five or six shillings, begged for his purse, that he might pay the demand; but the robber would suffer no such thing, and still clenching the money in his fist, he turned again to Boniface, and said, he would fare il conto, or make the bill.

This accordingly he did, marking the articles, such as "a feed for two mules," "ditto for one muletter," "bread," "fried eggs," &c. on his fingers, and then putting the precise price to each, he summed up a total which might have met the approbation of even Joseph Hume, Esq. M. P. The next counted out the money into the palm of the host, who seemed not to dare to make any other remark, and twisting up my friend's purse as though it was never more to be opened, he restored it to him with a short piece of Italian advice to be more careful of its contents.

At the inn door he helped my friend to mount his mule, and when he offered him his hand, and would have bidden him farewell, the robber whispered—"No, we must not part company so soon; there are others may meet you between this and the next town; I will see you in safety." They then went on, the robber striding by the side of my friend's mule, and talking all the way in a cheerful tone. They had not gone much more than a mile when three wild-looking fellows were seen descending from the mountain's side towards the road, which

* This trick has been repeated in our days in the south of France—but, if I remember well, the perpetrator of it was either a Sicilian or a Neapolitan. "My companions in the diligence," said the late Mr. Henry Matthews, who was travelling at the time from Montpellier to Beziers, "were all on the qui vive, for the car was half-bent up with armed men, and the travellers by single footpad." This fellow had practised a most ingenious stratagem to effect his purpose. He manufactured ten men of straw, and drew them up in the road in a little array; and advancing some distance before them, he ordered the diligence to stop, threatening, if the least resistance was offered, to call up his companions and put all the passengers to death. In this manner he had the whole party under contribution, among whom were two Spanish merchants, whose purses were heavily laden. "Poverty of an Italian, p. 305. I have heard this story much better told. My narrator dwelt particularly on the rage of one of the passengers, a French officer—a gentle monster—on his discovering that he had been terrified into, or out of discretion—by ten men of straw!

there ran through a deep winding hollow. As these men approached, they called on the travellers to stop, and had levelled their guns at them, when Don Cesare, who had been concealed from them by the mule, and the person of my friend, stepped forward in the road, showed himself, waved his hand backward, and cried out in a voice like thunder, "In dietro, canaglia! addi su amici! Santa Diavolanti!" or "Back, you blackguards, these are friends! Saint Devil! get ye back!" The three ruffians recovered their guns, threw them over their shoulders, and without saying a word returned up the mountain.

The robber-chief took no notice of what had happened, but walking a little ahead of the mules that he might be seen, continued in conversation on indifferent subjects until they came to a fair piece of newly-made road, inclosed on either side by magnificent hedges, (common things in Sicily and Calabria,) composed of the gigantic aloes, Indian-fig plants, and high flowering geraniums. "Here you are safe," said the robber, grasping my friend's hand; "this road winds round the hill to the town of San Giovanni, and here we must part!"

"Yes," said the muletter, addressing my friend, "Yes, Don Giorgio, it is only a quarter of an hour to San Giovanni!"

"Don Giorgio!" said the outlaw: "is that your name? It is the name of your king whom I have served! May the blessed Virgin go with you," and giving a last friendly squeeze to my friend's hand, he turned back, shouting as he went, "Viva il Re Giorgio!" Long live King George!

He had not been gone many minutes, when my friend heard one of those long shrill whistles which the Sicilians and Calabrians are particularly expert in producing, by applying their fingers to their tongue and lips. The young Englishman turned his head, and presently saw above the hill round which he was winding the gigantic figure of the outlaw, accompanied by three other men, striding up the mountain. The chief also happened to turn his head nearly at the same instant. He waved a silk handkerchief, and again shouting "Viva il Re Giorgio!" thus took his last farewell!

The muletter, who had preserved a respectful silence, only broken by a word or two, as long as the outlaw was with them, now gave way to his tongue. "Don Cesare," said he, "is a robber—there is no doubt of that; some say an assassin, though, for my part, I believe he has only killed five or six Neapolitans; but there is much that is good in him for all that!" After my friend's experience, it was not for him to contradict the muletter's assertion.

SPANISH BRIGANDS.

For brigands, Spain stands next in rank to the kingdom of Naples and the states of the church. The reasons are too obvious to require any explanation here. In comparing the Italian with the Spanish bands, from the accounts I have read and heard, I should be inclined to say that the latter were generally more brutal and ferocious, and less romantic—if, after all I have said, the reader will still deem the term romantic at all applicable to the Italian banditti.

POLINARIO.

My first anecdote of Spanish robbers is rather of an agreeable character. It is extracted from the work of a recent traveller, from Mr. Inglis's "Spain in 1830." Our countryman in the course of his peregrinations, stopped one night at a posada, or inn, in the south of Spain, and sat down to sup at a sort of table d'hôte, with such company as had gathered at the said place of repose and refectory.

"Towards the conclusion of supper, a guest of no small importance took his place at the table: this was no other man than the celebrated Polinario, during eleven years the dread of half Spain, and now following the honest calling of guard of the Seville diligence. I never saw a finer man, or one whose appearance more clearly indicated a profession which he had abandoned. I could not help fancying that his countenance expressed a certain lawlessness of mind, and contempt of peaceable persons like myself, which an assumed suavity of manner was unable altogether to conceal: this suavity of manner is, however, very remarkable, and I believe is in perfect accordance with his conduct when a robber; for

* I do not know why, but the Sicilians and Calabrians have made his sanctus najesty a saint. Santa diavolanti, with its suggestive Santa diavolanti, is continually in the mouth of both. It is as much their individual oath as certain two monosyllables are those of the English.

Polinario was never guilty of any act of wanton cruelty or barbarity, but along with the most fearless courage, he always evinced a certain forbearance, not uncommon among Spanish banditti; but in him, having a deeper seat than the most civility of a Spanish thief, arising rather from a softness at heart, which afterwards led to a change in his mode of life. The history of this change is curious, and I pledge myself for its authenticity.

"The usual range of Polinario was the northern part of the Sierra Morena and the southern parts of la Mancha; and here he remained during eleven years.

"A few years ago, understanding that the archbishop of Gaen would pass the Sierra Morena in his carriage, without other attendants than his servants, he lay in wait for the prelate, and stopped his carriage. The archbishop of course delivered his money; and Polinario having received it, asked his blessing: upon this, the archbishop began to remonstrate with the robber, setting forth the heinousness of his offences, and the wickedness of his life; but Polinario interrupted the archbishop, by telling him it was of no use remonstrating upon his manner of life, unless his grace could obtain a pardon for the past; because, without this, it was impossible he could change his mode of living.

"The archbishop of Gaen is a good man; and feeling a real desire to assist Polinario in his half-expressed desire of seeking a better way of life, he passed his word that he would obtain for him his majesty's pardon; and Polinario came under a solemn promise to the archbishop, that he would rob no more. In this way the matter stood for eleven months; for it was eleven months before the archbishop could obtain the pardon he had promised; and during all this time Polinario was obliged to conceal himself from the pursuit which the offer of a considerable reward had long before instigated. At length, however, the pardon was obtained; and Polinario was free to lead an honest life. He admits, however, that he is not contented with the change, and makes no hesitation in saying, that the promise made to the archbishop alone prevents him from returning to his former profession; but he says the archbishop kept his word to him, and he will keep his word to the archbishop."

During the peninsular war, Napoleon, who then drew his resources from so many countries, and had established the conscription, and by making war the only profitable occupation, had awakened a military spirit nearly all over Europe, had, as it will be remembered, a number of Italian regiments in the field. Besides the officers of these regiments, many young Italians of good families, particularly Neapolitans, were to be found on the staff of King Joseph, who had done ill, as far as his happiness was concerned, to quit the sure throne of Naples for the very uncertain one of Spain. Though his government was not a very popular one at Naples, during the short time it lasted, the monarch had made such good use of his leisure, and of the lax morality then prevailing, that at his departure for Spain, he was sincerely regretted by a number of gay dames, who, having no longer his liberality to look to, warmly recommended their brothers, their cousins, &c. to be provided for in his new kingdom. It was curious enough to observe, that, in many instances, these young Italians, now sent to assist in the subjugation of Spain by the French, were descended from Spanish families, whose founders had served and found fortune in the Spanish armies that had subdued Italy, and under the great Captain Gonzalvo di Cordova and others, had established the dominion of Spain in the Milanese and the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, in spite of all the efforts of the French. The shoats that Spain had thrown out in foreign conquest, were now returning to strike at her own proud trunk and root! The hero of the following robber story was not, however, of Spanish lineage, but descended from an ancient family originally of the republic of Genoa, and long settled in the kingdom of Naples, where their possessions, particularly in Calabria, were at one time of an enormous extent: nor though on the staff of King Joseph, and a personal favourite of his, did Don Francesco owe his post, or his hopes of advancement, to sister or cousin, or any relation, or connection, or friend of the female gender whatsoever. The name and rank of his family had from their influence of course, and Joseph, who was far from being either adventurous or courageous himself, admired those qualities in others—and there was not a person about him more distinguished by them than the young Italian.

Whenever there was any thing daring to be done, whenever there was a message to be carried that required extraordinary speed, of all the aides-de-camp and others, Don Francesco was always the first to offer himself. But there appeared to be no danger whatever, and there was no need for haste when he met with his adventure. The intrusive king had been for some time at Madrid. England had not yet armed Wellington to do wonders, Spain seemed prostrate before the French, and though an occasional deed of blood showed their antipathy to the intruders, the destructive guerrilla warfare was not yet commenced; and though an occasional robbery was heard of, the country was not held as being much infested by banditti, and officers came and went, only accompanied by their orderlies.

Don Francesco was, therefore, despatched one morning, with only one man, a steady, old Polish trooper, to carry some instructions to a small corps of the French army in cantonments, not many miles from Madrid. Having delivered these, he was to visit some outposts scattered round the country, and then return to head-quarters at his own leisure, or rather, there was no precise time fixed for his return. He arrived safely at the cantonments, and having finished his short business, would have proceeded farther that evening, but the colonel commanding there was a countryman, and an old friend, and he pressed him to stay dinner, and then it was too late to go any further that night. At the colonel's table were two young Frenchmen, who talked of relieving the ennui of "country quarters" the following morning by a shooting excursion, and as the ground they intended to beat was the same over which Don Francesco's road lay, it was agreed, not only that they should start together, but that he, having finished his inspection, should join them, and take a day's sport.

Accordingly, they set off in high spirits the next morning, Don Francesco followed by his staunch pole, but the French officers with no attendant, save a young, naked legged Castilian, who carried their game bags, and acted as guide. They parted company at the head of a wide valley or hollow, about two hours before noon. There was no inn or posada near, but a scattered village seemed to lie midway up the hollow, and here it was agreed Don Francesco should join the young Frenchmen early in the evening, and after passing the night at the village, they were to continue their sport on the morrow. As he rode on his way he heard rather an active firing on the side of his friends, and anxious to have a share of such good sport, he put spurs to his horse, and did not draw rein until he came up to one of the French pickets. He here finished his business in a very short time, and obtaining a fresh horse, proceeded to do the rest of his duty. He now found he had more ground to go over than he had imagined, and when he returned to the post where he had left his own horse, it was much later than he could have wished. To increase his comfort, a sergeant of tirailleurs, who had the command, assured him that in spite of all the troops scattered over the country, the Spaniards were daily becoming bolder, and showing that they detested the French—that a commissary of the army, and an officer of the line, had been assaulted, not many days before, in the very district he had to traverse, and had escaped being murdered almost by miracle; and finally, he added, that even before the French invasion, the place bore a bad name for robbers. The young Neapolitan thought his friends had been rather unlucky in the choice of their shooting ground; but he could hardly fancy breaking his engagement, and late as it was, he mounted his own steed, which was by this time well refreshed, and set off at a hand-gallop for the glen where he had left them. The old Polish trooper, who had heard the dialogue between his master and the sergeant, would, of a certainty, have rather rebraussé chemin; but he was accustomed to danger, he was piqued too by the seeming indifference to it in Don Francesco, and he could not conceive (he had yet to learn what the Spaniards were) that the peasantry would dare to attack an officer of rank so near the French forces.

They reached the glen where they had left the two Frenchmen in safety, but it was dark, and when they rode up to what they had taken in the morning for a village, nearly every white spot, instead of being a house, was a calcareous rock. There were, however, among these deceptive projections some half dozen of miserable cottages, where Don Francesco confidently expected to find his friends; but where, on enquiry, he found them, not, and if the words of the inhabitants were to be taken, no such persons had been seen there since the morning. Rather inclined to be angry at any thing had happened to punctuality, than to suspect any thing had happened to them, Don Francesco was about to turn his horses' head, when an old goatherd addressed him, and told him he had seen the two strangers cross the hills at the top of the glen, and that doubtless they would be found at a farm-house in that direction—not more than a good league off, where the game was most abundant.

Spirited on by this intelligence, the young Neapolitan took the direction pointed out to him, and darker and darker though it became, he and his follower contrived to make good speed for half an hour, when they thought they ought to be near the said farm-house. But when they slackened their pace, and peered through the night-gloom, and listened to catch, if it might be, the barking of a dog, or the tinkling bells of a sheep-fold, or any thing to announce the neighbourhood of a farm or a cottage, they could see nothing, but that the rough path they had hitherto followed now lost itself in a labyrinth of other paths, and nothing in the world could they hear but the pattering of hooves and the murmur of the night-wind among the brush-wood that grew on every side of them. The country also seemed to be wilder and more desolate even than that they had left—and a country more treeless, houseless, unpeopled, barren, and utterly desolate, than that round Madrid, is scarcely to be found in Europe.

Don Francesco, however, was not to be turned back; and, indeed to go back to the pickets, or to attempt reaching the countenances, would now have been as difficult as to find out the farm-house. He did, therefore, what is perhaps as wise a thing as a man can do under such circumstances, he threw the reins on his horse's neck, and let him choose his own way. The sagacious creature had not gone far, when he drew up his head, and then threw out his nostrils, and then neighed, and the moment after a little glimmering light gave an additional proof that they were near some habitation. "It is the farm-house we are seeking," thought the young man; and going on in the direction of the light, they soon found themselves before a long, low wall, in which, after groping for some time, they found a strong wooden gate. As they struck upon this, the light disappeared—then they heard a slight noise—and the light re-appeared, but lower down than it had been seen before. They then heard the sounds of the opening of a door, and then a light was seen approaching them. Nothing doubting but that his friends were within, Don Francesco now called out their names. There was no answer given; but presently the gate before which he stood was unbarred, and they were admitted into an open yard, which seemed to have stabling and barns round three of its sides. From the readiness with which they had gained admittance, both master and man were confirmed in their opinion that their friends must be there, and retired to rest; and they asked no questions, until their conductor, an old Spaniard, led them to the door of the house, on whose threshold there stood another Spaniard, who seemed to wear a hospitable smile on his countenance. After a courteous salutation, the young officer asked whether there were not two Frenchmen within.

They were not—but had not been seen—but had they come, there would have been a welcome for them, as there was for those caballeros who now arrived, was the reply.

The fellow's manners were good; there seemed an air of mildness and respectability about him—the night without was as dark as ever, and a cold rain, that had been threatening for some time, now began to pelt most pitilessly; so wishing his friends, wherever they might be, as civil a host and as good a lodging as he seemed to have lighted upon, he gave his horse to his orderly, and walked in. The apartment had nothing remarkable about it. Its inmates were, an old woman, another man, whose countenance was not very prepossessing, but not much wilder or more forbidding than the general run of the dingy Castilian peasants, and to these was presently added, besides the host who had entered with Don Francesco, a young and rather pretty girl, who seated herself near the fire, which burned in the centre of the room. To her, of course, the young soldier's attention was presently turned. He saw her lean her head on both her hands, as though suffering from pain; and then he saw, or fancied he saw, that she looked at him now and then—looked at him with uneasiness. Perhaps, however, this only struck him afterwards.

As an Italian, whose language is itself so like to the Spanish, Don Francesco had not had much difficulty in learning the latter idiom; he had now, moreover, been some months in the country, and being rather of a literary turn, he had paid some attention to its books and grammar, &c.—things which the French were very apt to despise. And then the French, generally, as we all know, have a remarkable inaptitude for languages; so much so, that there was not one in a thousand among them, who, even after several years' residence in Italy, could express himself in that beautiful tongue with any thing like propriety of idiom or accent.

As he spoke to them, the Castilians made the remark with astonishment, that Don Francesco spoke such Spanish as they had never heard from the mouth of a Frenchman.

"I am no Frenchman," said he.

This assertion evidently produced a considerable effect: the Spanish girl fixed her large black eyes on him; the man, who seemed the master of the house, asked him of what country then he was.

When he replied he was an Italian, the host rejoined, "Oh, then you are half a Spaniard—but you are here with the French army after all!"

As Don Francesco was thinking he did not altogether like the tone with which the last words were pronounced, and the expression of countenance that accompanied them, his Polish trooper, who had been busy with the horses, came in, and stepping up to his master, whispered in French, "I hope, sir, we have got into friendly quarters—but there is something I don't quite fancy—there are several desperate looking fellows in the stable, and I am almost sure, the old goatherd who directed us hither is one among them!"

Startled as he was at this information, the young soldier, however, preserved his presence of mind: he felt that if they had really fallen into a trap, escape by force was utterly impracticable; and that the best thing he could do, was to keep a watchful eye on his friends within the house, and to tranquillise his faithful companion, who might be on his guard as to what was going on without. So, affecting to treat lightly the trooper's suspicions, and only telling him to keep the saddles on the horses, and to have their reins ready on their necks, he gave him part of the supper and wine his host had provided, and dismissed him, with a recommendation to sleep as lightly as though he were picketed in the field with the enemy close before him. While he took his own supper, Don Francesco continued his conversation with the Spaniards. So quiet and well disposed did they all again seem, that his apprehensions almost entirely left him, and he taxed himself with folly for having suspected any evil at their hands.

It was by this time waxing late—two of the Spaniards and the old woman had retired one by one, very devoutly wishing him "la buena noche," and that the saints might guard him. The young girl lingered still, but she, too, withdrew at last. Don Francesco then enquired his way for the morrow's journey, and expressing his intention of setting off at daybreak, begged to be shown to his place of rest. His complacent host regretted that his accommodations were not better, and led him by a tottering wooden staircase, or rather a broad-stopped ladder, into a large dark room, which seemed to prolong itself over part of the stabling. There was a narrow window at each end of the room, from one of which he fancied the light that first attracted him must have proceeded. The floor of the room was partly covered with grain and household provisions, but near the farther end, to which they advanced, there were two low couches, one of which was already occupied by somebody with a large Spanish capote thrown over him. The host, putting his finger to his mouth, as if to prevent talking, which might disturb the sleeper, pointed to the mattress on the opposite corner; and no sooner had Don Francesco thrown his military cloak upon it, than whispering him a good night, the host instantly withdrew, and carried the lamp with him. As he descended the ladder, he drew a trap-door after him, and the young soldier heard the noise, as if of a sliding bolt, to secure the door.

This jarred unpleasantly on Don Francesco's nerves. Instead of throwing himself at once on the couch, he grasped his pistols, which he had kept about his person, and drawing his sword, groped his way to the upper end of the room by which he had entered. The intense darkness of the night had somewhat abated—a glimmering of uncertain light penetrated through the low narrow windows which were opposite to each other, and fell on two small spaces of the flooring, but all the rest of the long room was wrapped in a gloom so dense, that he could not see the bright blade of the weapon he held in his hand. With some difficulty he piloted himself through the heterogeneous materials that encumbered the apartment, and by kneeling down and feeling the rough boards with his hand, he detected an iron ring which raised the trap-door. To his surprise and relief, when he applied his arm's strength to this, the door opened at once, and proved his car had deceived him as to its being fastened. He again thought himself a fool for harbouring suspicion; but before returning to his resting-place, he listened a few seconds at the aperture he had made by only partially lifting up the door. At first all was silent as though he had held his car over an opened tomb, and then he heard the low murmuring of a voice below as if in prayer. Encouraged by the latter circumstance, and fully deciding once more that he was in the hands of good honest people, he groped his way back to the couch. Still, however, spite of himself, there was a lingering of doubt and suspicion, and before he threw himself on his mattress, he crept across the room to the side of his sleeping companion. Whoever this was, he seemed to sleep most peacefully—with his capote drawn over his head, not even his breathing could be heard.

"People do not sleep this way in a den of robbers and murderers," thought Don Francesco, who at length wrapped his own mantle about him and laid himself down. All remained quiet—he thought a little of the events of the day, and his disappointment, and again hoping that his unpunctual friends had come to no harm, and had found as good lodgings as he had done, he gave way to fatigue and drowsiness and was falling asleep—when he was suddenly started by the creaking of a door. Quick as he was, before he grasped his sword and pistols and rose to his feet, a door, which he had not observed in the darkness, was opened between him and the bed on the opposite side of the room, and a little yellow lamp, as though of a light screened, rushed into the apartment.

Though the prospect of a hopeless struggle now presented itself, and the chill of despair fell on his heart, the young soldier levelled his pistol with a steady aim, and had nearly pressed the ready trigger, when he saw that the figure which stole into the room was that of the young Spanish damsel, whose conduct and looks below stairs had attracted his attention.

"Stranger!" said she in a fearfully agitated whisper, "put up your arms and follow me—there is hardly a minute between you and murder!"

"Ah! is it so!" said the young man, gasping for breath.

"You will be the first guest that leaves this room alive," said the girl: "But haste, or you will be too late!"

"Then let me rouse also this man who sleeps so soundly," said Don Francesco.

"Think of yourself—he needs not your care!" said the girl.

Even in that extremity of danger the brave soldier could not reconcile himself to the thought of leaving a fellow creature to the knife, and he stepped to the other side of the room. The trembling girl moved with him, drew the capote from the body, and holding down the lamp she held, and turning away her own eyes, disclosed to those of Don Francesco the ghastly countenance of one of the young Frenchmen he had been in search of.

As to what passed after this horrid disclosure,—as to his feelings or his actions, for some seconds, the young man could never render an account. What he first recollected was standing at the head of a flight of rough stone steps that descended from what appeared to be a hayloft into the courtyard, with the Spanish girl pointing to the wall that enclosed the court. While standing here listening to the directions the girl was giving him, as to the road he was to take to reach Madrid—he heard the well-known voice of his poor faithful trooper utter a French exclamation, and the next instant the report of a carbine shot, and then the noise of a deadly scuffle proceeded from that part of the stable which now seemed to be immediately beneath his feet.

"Oh, fly! it is your only hope—may God go with you!" muttered the agonised girl, still pointing to the wall. More than half stupefied, Don Francesco crept down the stone steps; but as he descended, he saw a man who had come out from the lower apartment or from the stable, advance across the courtyard to the narrow space between the foot of the stairs and the foot of the outer wall of the farm he had to climb. He then heard a long heavy groan—and then four more Spaniards came out and joined the man he had just seen. "The dog of a Frenchman is done for," said one, whose voice seemed to be that of the host, "but he has wounded me sorely in the arm. Quick, however! the noise will have awakened his master, and we shall have trouble in despatching him!"

Don Francesco turned his head—the light and the girl were gone—the door at the top of the staircase seemed closed; but dark as it was, and though he had now crouched in the smallest compass possible under the rude stone balustrade that ran along one side of the steps, he dared they must discover him even from below as he lay there, for by this time one of the men had brought out a lamp.

"He remains quiet, however, as yet," whispered another voice below; "perhaps the report of the fellow's gun has not awakened him—let us up, and finish him at once.” The speaker’s foot seemed to be on the first step of the stone stairs, the light moved in the same direction, and it was impossible Don Francisco could have escaped another moment, when a shrill female shriek was heard at the opposite end of the house, and a voice cried “The Frenchman!” “The officer!” The Spaniards, fancying their aroused victim was there attempting his escape, rushed in that direction; whilst Don Francisco, understanding and availing himself of the feint which evidently proceeded from the girl, glided down the stairs, vaulted over the wall with some difficulty, and ran with all his speed from the accursed spot.

Though out of their lair, he was still far from being out of danger. They had horses, and would no doubt speedily pursue him; and then, in the darkness of the night, and in a wild country he had never before traversed, he could not tell whether he was following his young deliverer’s directions, or running into fresh scenes of danger—perhaps returning on the very den from which he had escaped. Indeed, in a very short time he heard the hollow, rapid beat of horses’ hoofs on the dark heath. “The sounds did not, however, seem to approach—on the contrary, they waxed fainter and fainter, until they died away in the direction he fancied must be immediately opposite to that he was taking. Thus encouraged, he summoned up all his strength, and ran for a long time; but the returning agony of his apprehension may be conceived, when he was suddenly brought to a pause by hearing the sound of horses’ feet right before him, and advancing to meet him. There was not a tree, a bush on the wide open heath to conceal him from his blood-thirsty pursuers. Fortunately, however, he had retained his dark grey cloak, and wrapping himself in this, he laid himself flat on the ground, hoping that its colour, which assimilated with that of the heath, would prevent him from being discovered. The galloping horses came nearer and nearer; he saw them take the very direction of the spot where he lay. And now another dreadful thought struck him. It might very well be that one of the villains in their haste had mounted his own favourite steed, which, if it came near where he lay, was almost certain to betray him, by stopping or neighing, and thus he would be discovered, even if he escaped the searching eyes of the murderers. He grasped his pistols; his sweat was out of its sheath, as it had been since his retreat down the stairs of the house, and thus he lay with the resolution to sell his life dearly.

Meanwhile the horsemen came close upon him—so close, that at one time he thought he should be ridden over; but they passed the spot where he lay without discovering him. He remained supine as he was till the sounds of the hoofs and the villains’ dreadful imprecations died away on his ear, when he rose, and again ran forward for some time at the top of his speed.

By this time the first rays of morning began to appear. Light, however, was of little service to him in that monotonous, unknown country, as to assisting him to find his way, but, on the contrary, if his pursuers still persisted in their search, it would betray him to them. He had run himself out of breath, and was so overcome by fatigue, that he was obliged to throw himself on the ground. Having rested for awhile, he resumed his journey, and soon came to a tolerably good, and what seemed a frequented road. As he hesitated here what direction he should now take on this road, the distant, measured sounds of a drum faintly struck his ear; he bent his head to the earth, and then heard distinctly enough that it was a French drummer beating the reveille. Cheered by these welcome tones, he pursued his way, and in about a quarter of an hour, as day broke into fulness of light, he saw a low, little village close before him, with a detachment of French troops mustering on its outskirts. Setting up a shout of joy, he ran on to the village, where he was presently safe among friends and comrades. His tale of horror was soon told, and a plan of proceeding arranged; but more than two hours passed ere he was sufficiently refreshed to mount a horse, and head the troops in search of the assassins. Unfortunately, too, there was no cavalry on the spot; and what with the difficulty of retracing his steps, and time lost on false scents, it was near noon when Don Francisco drew up the troops before a solitary farm-house, which, from the little he had been able to see of it in the obscurity of the preceding night, he thought must be that which he had escaped from. After having shouted in vain, the soldiers scaled the walls, and burst open the gate. The door of the dwelling-house was merely secured by a latch, and when he entered it, if the absence of every inmate had not been proof enough, Don Francisco could have sworn to the apartment. He rushed up the ladder to the accursed loft, expecting to find the body of his friend, but it was gone, and no trace of blood, or of any thing connected with him, was left there. Some of the soldiers meanwhile had gone into the stables, which they found as empty as the rest of the house—all the horses had been removed, as also the body of the poor Pole; but on some straw, in a corner of the stable, they found a little pool of blood. This was the only evidence of crime the premises retained. On looking over the house, it was discovered that the provisions, and nearly all the portable articles of household furniture, (few, and simple enough in Spain) had been carried off. It was vain to think of pursuing the fugitives; they failed in their search after the bodies of the young officer and the Pole; and then Don Francisco marched his men to the huts where, on the preceding night, he had spoken with the goatherd. The huts were as empty as the farm-house!

To conclude a long story, the murderers were never caught. The companion of the murdered Frenchman, and the boy that had accompanied them, were never more seen or heard of; and it was supposed that, separated by accident, or the design of the Spaniards, from his friend, this second Frenchman met the fate of the first, and that the guide also was killed.

I set aside two or three horrible and disgusting stories of Spanish robbers to make room for the following interesting anecdote, (communicated to me by my kind and talented friend Mr. Breckeden,) which shows them in a better light.

A short time after the French war, and the restoration of Ferdinand VII., whose conduct made many of the loose guerrilla parties continue out in the country as brigands, an English merchant arrived one evening at a small mean town, at the foot of the Sierra Morena. In the posada of the place where he took up his lodging for the night, he met a Spaniard of a commanding figure, and of a sharp, intelligent, but amiable countenance. Much struck with his appearance, the Englishman entered into conversation with him, and was still more delighted by his frank spirited style of address and talking. Before supper was ready, the two had established that sort of traveller-intimacy, which is not perhaps the less delightful because it must finish in a few hours, and the parties, in all probability, never meet again; and when the meal was served, they sat down to it together, each, apparently, anxious to know more of the other. They conversed together during the progress of the supper, and long after it was over, until the sinking and flickering lamps on the table warned the Englishman it must be time to retire to rest. As he rose to do so, the Spaniard, with all his former frankness and gentlemanly manner, asked him which way his road lay on the morrow. The English merchant replied across the Sierra Morena, and indicated the road he meant to take.

The Spaniard, shaking his head, said he was sorry for this, as he had reasons to suspect that that very road at that very moment was beset by robbers, from whose numbers and activity there was no escape.

The Englishman confessed that this was unpleasant news, particularly as the affairs that called him towards Madrid were urgent.

“But cannot you stay where you are a day or two?” replied the Spaniard; “by that time they may have shifted their ground, and you may pass the mountains without meeting them.”

The Englishman repeated that his business was urgent, said he was no coward, that he had hitherto traveled in Spain without any misadventure, and hoped still to do so.

“But, my good Señor,” replied the Spaniard, “you will not cross the mountains to-morrow without being robbed, take my word for that!”

“Well, if it must be so, let them rob me,” said the English merchant; “I have little money to lose, and they will hardly take the life of an unarmed and unresisting man!”

“They have never been accustomed so to act—let it be said to the honour of the band, they are not such cowardly assassins,” replied the Spaniard, who was then silent, and seemed to be musing to himself.

The Englishman was beginning to call up one of the servants of the posada, to show him to his resting place, when his companion, raising his hand, said,

“Not yet, Señor, not yet! listen!” and he continued in an under tone. “It was my fortune some time since to have to cross the Sierra Morena, alone, like you; it was occupied then as now, by the Salteadores; but I met a man, also alone, as you have met me, who said he had rendered the captain of the band some service, and that he could give me a pass which should cause my person and my property to be respected by the robbers, and enable me to cross the mountains with perfect safety.”

“A much better thing this than a king’s passport,” said the astonished Englishman. “Pray what was it? and did it succeed?”

“It was only a button,” replied the Spaniard: “it did all that had been promised, and perhaps it has not yet lost its charm—I will give it you, here it is!”

After searching in his pocket, the Spaniard produced a curiously-filigreed silver button, and placed it in the hands of the Englishman, begging him to be careful of it, and to present it to any robbers that might attack him in the Sierra.

“But were you really attacked on your journey?” enquired the merchant.

“The button was respected by all the robbers I met, and I believe I saw them all,” said the Spaniard; “but ask no more questions, and take care of the button; to-morrow you will see whether it have lost its charm.”

With many thanks, the Englishman took his leave, and went to bed. On the following morning, when he continued his journey, the silver button ran in his head for some time. But it was not until noon, as he was toiling up one of the most rugged of the mountain paths, that he had the opportunity of trying its virtue. There his guide, who rode before him, was suddenly knocked off his mule, by a blow from the butt-end of a musket, and the next instant three other guns were levelled at the Englishman’s breast, by men who stepped from behind a rock. The attack was so sudden, that his ideas and recollection were disturbed, and he put his hand in his pocket, brought out his purse, and delivered it to the robbers, who were calling him all sorts of opprobrious names, before he thought of his silver button. But when the recollection came to his mind, and he produced it, much doubting of its efficacy, the oaths of the Salteadores were stopped at once, as though a sacred relic had been held before their eyes; they returned him his purse, earnestly entreated his pardon for all that had happened, and informed him that it was their bounden duty to see the bearer of that button safe across the mountains. Accordingly, on went the merchant with the brigands for his guard, he blessing the silver button, and they showing him every possible attention and respect. On their way they met with other robbers, which proved how formidable was the band, and how impossible it would have been to escape them without the charmed button.

At length they came to a low, solitary house in a wild dell, far away from the beaten path across the Sierra, which they had abandoned for rocks that seemed near to have been trodden. Here the merchant was to stop and refresh himself. Nothing loth, he dismounted and turned to the door, when his companion at the posada of the preceding evening—the donor of the magical button—met him on the threshold, with the words and the gestures of an hospitable welcome! His dress was changed—he now wore a splendid kind of uniform, the jacket of which was of velvet, embroidered with gold, but the Englishman recognised his commanding figure and impressive countenance in an instant, and gave him his hand as a friend.

“I met here before you,” said the captain of the banditti, for such in fact was the donor of the button, “and have prepared a good dinner for you, being very certain that what I gave you last night would bring you in safety under my roof!”

The Englishman expressed his gratitude, and they sat down to dine. The bandit’s dishes were savoury and good, and his wine was better. As the wine warmed the Englishman, he again expressed his gratitude, and then ventured to say how astonished he was that a person of his host’s manners, and one capable of such kind and generous feelings and actions, could lead such a kind of life.

The robber drew his hand across his dark brow and fiery eyes, and said,

“These are times when thieves and traitors thrive in the royal court and the offices of government, and honest patriots are driven to the highway. As a guerrilla, I shed my blood for my country, for my king, who, when he returned, would have left me to starve or to beg! But no matter—this is no business of yours. I met you, liked your manners, and have saved you—that is enough! say no more!”

The Englishman of course desisted, and soon after rose to take his leave. The captain, who recovered his good-humour, told him he should have an escort yet a little further, and be put in the route he wished to follow. The merchant would then have returned the silver button, but the robber insisted on his keeping it.

"You, or some friend of yours, may have to pass this way again," said he, "and whoever has the button to produce will be respected as you have been respected! Go with God! and say nothing as to what has happened between you and me mine! Adieu!"

The merchant's farewell was an earnest and cordial one. Guided by the brigands, he soon reached the beaten road on the opposite side of the mountains, and would there have given them some money for the trouble he had caused them. They said they had their captain's strict commands against this—they would not accept a real, but left him, wishing him a happy journey.

Some time, I believe some years, after this adventure, the English brigand, with deep regret, that the Spanish robber chief, whom he described as being one of the handsomest men he had ever beheld, had been betrayed into the hands of government, and put to a cruel and ignominious death.

SCHINDER-HANNES (JACK THE FLAYER), OR THE ROBBER OF THE RHINE.

This famous brigand, whose trial occupies a conspicuous place among the modern Causés Célèbres, was, at the beginning of the present century, the terror of the Palatinate, and of the other provinces on both sides of the Lower Rhine; and the boldness and extent of his depredations entitle him to a foremost rank in the annals of modern brigandism. We indeed look in vain for his equal in northern Europe. This man's real name was John Buckler, and he was born in 1779, at Mülken, on the right bank of the Rhine. His descent and training were good. His father, as fond of a vagrant life as he himself became, forsook his wife and family and enlisted in an Austrian regiment; soon growing tired of the army, or of the Austrians, he deserted from them, and fled to the Prussian territories, where his wife and his son John, then nine years of age, joined him. The elder Buckler obtained employment as forest keeper, and was able to send his son to school, where Master John was instructed in the Lutheran communion. He might have continued an honest lad for some time longer, but one day, when he was about sixteen years old, a publican entrusted him with a whole louis d'or to purchase some smuggled brandy for the house—this temptation was too strong for the virtue of Hannes, who spent the money in a jollification with his comrades, and then, afraid of the consequences should he return home, he decamped and wandered about the country. The first thing he appropriated to himself, after the publican's louis d'or, was a horse, which he stole, carried off, and sold.

At this time he could hardly have entertained a proper notion of the rights and dignity of the profession to which he had made a promising enough novice; for the next thing he did was to go and hire himself as a servant and aide-de-camp to the public executioner at Bairenbach. Hannes, however, could not conquer his love of society; he was always fond of his glass of Rhenish, and of two or three jolly fellows to drink it with. There was a butcher belonging to a neighbouring town with the same propensities, and who probably had a certain sympathy with the executioner's man, arising from a similarity of profession. The slayer of sheep and oxen, and the assistant to the slayer of men, soon became very intrinsically intimate. Hannes swore he had not known such a good fellow since the lads with whom he had spent nine hours' louis d'or, and the butcher swore Hannes was a "prime one"—fit for any thing. This butcher himself was of a certainty fit for the gallows, for, tired of killing other people's sheep, or sheep he paid the market price for, he induced Master John to go out and steal sheep and sell them to him at Kirm—at six creut prices.

This contraband trade could not last long, pleasant and profitable as it was. Hannes was arrested and conveyed to prison, and might have furnished some employment for his master the executioner, had he not ingeniously contrived to escape from his place of confinement. Wandering afterwards in the wild regions of the Hochwald, he fell in with Finkel and Black Peter, the captains of two bands of daring outlaws, who had long been distinguished in their calling.

The circumstances of the time contributed to the formation of these predatory bands, and here, as we have shown elsewhere, the field for their excesses had been prepared by political misfortunes and vicissitudes, without which no numerous associations or freebooters can long exist.

"The wars of the French revolution had raged for years, during which time the states bordering on the Rhine were continually over-run by troops, French and German; the fields had been ravaged, the cottages pillaged and burnt, the cattle carried away, forced contributions in money and kind exacted; most of the landholders and farmers became ruined, and the poorer class of labourers and artisans were absolutely starving, and these, as a last desperate resource, began thieving—some for the mere object of supporting existence; others, animated by a principle of revenge against their armed oppressors. Of the latter sort was the notorious band of Tickard, in Belgium. The political state of the country favoured their impunity. The little German governments, ecclesiastical and secular, into which it was parcelled under the old system, had been either suppressed by the French, or were allowed to drag on a precarious existence, powerless and detached from the former imperial confederation. In one part the French laws had superseded the German, but were not yet consolidated and enforced, and the subordinate agents of justice had become remiss in their duties, from the contagious example of general disorder into which society was thrown. Mechanics of all trades, vagrants, pedlars, strolling musicians, labourers, woodmen, Jews, formed the first band of robbers that appeared on the right or German side of the Rhine, as early as the years 1793—4." Surely such fatal results as these ought to have weight with the ambitious wagers of war, and with such as with uncertain prospects of success would revolutionise a country. It is not the excesses of the army in the field that are alone to be feared—it is not the passions and the vices of soldiers that are alone to be provided against; but the disorder and licentiousness of a despoiled and embittered populace, that are almost as sure to follow in the train of war and revolution, as one wave of the sea rolls on the other. But a book devoted to robbers is not likely to reform conquerors, so let us return to the life of our robber of the Rhine.

The daring bands among whom he fell in the wild country of the Hochwald readily admitted Hannes as a member, and soon had reason to applaud his activity, address, and bravery. But after committing various depredations, and such as stealing horses (to which he seems to have had all a Yorkshireman's partiality), &c. he fell a second time into the hands of justice, and into a prison. His good luck and talents did not, however, desert him, and a second time (taking some of his comrades in the band, now fellow-prisoners, with him) he contrived to escape, by breaking through a wall of the prison of Sarrchuck. He must have been rather careless, or confident in his own resources; for not long after he was seized in another part of the country, and after an examination, committed to a dungeon in the strong tower of Simmern.

This was the third time Master John was in prison, and the old proverb saith, "take care of the third time"; but he was as lucky as though it had been only his first, he threw with fortune. By means of a broken knife, he contrived to remove a board in the wall of his dungeon, whence creeping into an outward apartment, he wrenched the iron bars from the window, and leaped out from a considerable height. He fell in his descent, and a heavy stone, which he had loosened, fell after him, and wounded him severely in one of his legs. Spite, however, of this wound, he managed to crawl along in the dark to a neighbouring forest, where he lay concealed for two whole days, without food, and without assistance.

On the third, he found his way to the snug, retired house of an old associate, where his wound was dressed, and where he received all the succour and sympathy his case demanded. He soon recovered, and showed that his hair-breadth escapes, and pains, and sufferings, had brought about no penitence. He began his career of highway robbery and general brigandism in company with numerous associates, who continued to increase under the shadow of his prestige, talents, and energy, and who, for these qualities, now acknowledged him, not as a simple comrade, but as their chief. The other banditti, and even the sanguinary Black Peter himself, by degrees, submitted to his authority or advice. No expedition of moment was planned and undertaken, save by the directions of the famous jail breaker, who thus became the soul of the complicate body. It was now, in the plenitude of his power, that Master John Buckler acquired the name of Schinder-hannes, or Jack the Flayer. He was young, rather handsome, clever, as we have seen, and a popular man with the fair sex, having had sundry love adventures of considerable celat. But his qualities as a romantic hero were soon increased, for he fixed his affections upon a pretty girl, one Julia Blasius, whom, in defiance of the church, it appears, he called his wife. The fair Julia, the daughter of a fiddler and hornblower of some eminence, accompanied him occasionally in his expeditions, dressed in male attire.

The audacity of Schinder-hannes's hand is almost incredible, and can only be understood by reference to the state of the country, as I have described it. The travellers on the highway did not offer sufficient booty; they proceeded to force open houses, and to attack whole villages, carrying on at times a sort of regular fight with the inhabitants. In these operations, the captain, with one or two of his cleverest men, was always the first to enter the house, having left part of his troop to guard the approaches, and to fire upon any one who dared to come near. His introductory essay in this line was made in the year 1800, on the house of a gentleman named Riegel, who lived at Otzweiler. Schinder-hannes, with fourteen of his men, armed with firelocks, suddenly appeared one night at the house of an honest miller in the immediate neighbourhood. They came with a good appetite, and imposed on the hospitality of the miller for a good supper, which they ate, and then went to work—and, at first, in a peaceful way enough, for they knocked a rat-tat at Mr. Riegel's door, which was opened by that gentleman's son-in-law. Schinder-hannes and two of his men rushed in, when their behaviour became less civil. They began to ill-treat the inmates, and threatened Mrs. Riegel with death if she did not reveal where the money was concealed. But still worse followed; for while the good lady was shrieking in the hands of the robbers, her husband, trying to escape through a window, was fired at, and killed on the spot; and her son-in-law was severely wounded. The report of firearms alarmed the neighbours, who sallied out in great numbers; and then the banditti thought it prudent to retire, which they did, keeping up a running fire against their pursuers.

It is to be remarked in Schinder-hannes's depredations, that the Jews, who are numerous in that part of Germany, and often wealthy, were the principal victims of them. He, indeed, seemed to consider that people as legitimate plunder; and strange as it may now appear in more civilised, settled, and tolerant days, many people of the country, who were not robbers, apparently entertained the same opinion. He assailed the house of a rich Jew named Wolf, at Ottenbach, and carried off a considerable booty. At Merxheim, the rent-meister, or magistrate of the place, pointed out to him another Jew of the name of Bær, as a man of wealth, and as one who had rendered himself obnoxious to the people; and immediately acting on the suggestion, Schinder-hannes attacked and plundered the house with little obstacle. The robbers fell in with the watch, to whom they plainly stated they were going "to rob a Jew," upon which they were allowed to pass!

The spring and autumn were the favourite seasons for these expeditions; and Saturday nights were preferred for a curious reason. It appeared on their trial, when the robbers were finally brought to justice, that most of Schinder-hannes's baldaccos, or spies, and some of the brigands themselves, were Jews, who, in the leisure of their sabbath-day, could more conveniently attend to the business of crime and rapine.

But still, it must be repeated, it is chiefly as sufferers that the Jews figure in Schinder-hannes's exploits. One day this bold robber, being posted in ambuscade near the high road, with only two of his followers, saw an caravan of about forty-five Jews returning from a fair at Kreuznach. As they came near, he challenged them and ordered them to halt, which they all did at once, before three men. They turned out not worth the trouble of stopping; they had only a few kreutzers apiece, which they had gained by trafficking at the fair. The numerous robbers despised so paltry a booty, and left the Jews their leather purses. But Schinder-hannes was in a jocular mood, and he ordered them all to pull off their shoes and stockings. In a minute every Jew among them pulled off his shoes and stockings.

Schinder-hannes then made them throw them all in a heap on one side of the road, and he and his companions, with their gun-stocks, so tossed and tumbled and mixed the shoes and stockings, that fellows so parted company, it would have been a difficult job indeed to find out a pair among them, or for any man to fit himself to his own, even if ten minutes had been allowed him.

"Now then, Jews," cried Schinder-hannes, "take you every one of his own stockings and his own shoes, put them on, and decamp instantly. Be honest, if you can, and take no one's things but your own. I will shoot every one of you that takes another man's shoe or another man's stocking! Quick! quick! he is a dead man who is the last to be fitted to his own, and off, as sure as my name is Schinder-hannes!" And he and his followers levelled their muskets at the bare-faced Jews.

Well, hereof their senses, by the dread which the threat and the name of the robber inspired, the poor Jews threw themselves altogether on the heap by the roadside, and began scrambling for their shoes and stockings, cufing, and scratching, and abusing one another in their hurry and impatience. When Schinder-hannes had amused himself for awhile with this ludicrous spectacle, a subject worthy of Hogarth or Wilkie, he walked off with his comrades almost dying with laughter.

The mere name of the robber, whose exploits were spread far and wide, now struck terror into every breast. By a political alternation of kindness and severity, he imposed on the common people; and, by degrees, even the wealthier class, who had suffered from him, dreaded Schinder-hannes so much, that, far from daring to inform against him, they avoided even the mention of his name. Unlike the Italian banditti of the Apennines, who live in wilds and gloomy solitudes, these robbers of the Rhine frequented the most joyous and peopled scenes. "They appeared in the open day, and in the very scenes of their robberies; they lounged in public houses, went to dances and festivals, and were generally treated with great deference. When danger was near, they separated, and each repaired to his home, in various parts of the country, until called again by the captain on some new expedition." Besides the fair Julia, many of the band had equally devoted wives, or innamoratas, who were made useful to the lawless community by procuring information, selling the goods plundered, and obtaining passports to proceed from one state to another.

The robbers must have invoked many a "blessing on the Rhine!"—for that noble river often bore them and their spoils to a place of safety and convenient sale. After a successful expedition on one side of the Rhine, generally the left bank, they were accustomed to cross the river, where they would remain quiet for some time, and dispose of their plunder. They changed costume and appearance according to circumstances. Schinder-hannes was very happy in his disguises, and so confident, that he once for a considerable time passed himself off as a steady merchant, and even repaired to the great trading mart, Frankfort. He ran, however, his risks. In 1801, he had a narrow escape in an affray with a party of soldiers in the electorate of Mayence, with whom he engaged in a drunken brawl at a public house: on another occasion, after pillaging the house of a Jew at Bayreuth, in the Palatinate, he was so closely pressed by a party of chasseurs, that he was obliged to seek concealment in a layloft. The soldiers visited his hiding-place, but he again miraculously escaped. But this escape was his last: he had worn out his extraordinary good luck, and the career of his crimes was now drawing near its end. He was closely watched and tracked to his haunts; he could no longer prosecute his expeditions without imminent peril—for even the peasants were now on the alert against him. He had risen and thrived during the confusion and horrors of war, but peace had now been made between France and Austria, the provinces on the Rhine had consequently been restored to tranquillity and security, and the administration was in the hands of men of energy, who determined to extirpate the banditti.

Schinder-hannes for some time wandered from place to place, but he every day found his resources failing him, and was at last arrested on suspicion. Fortunately for him, however, nobody knew him, and when, making a virtue of necessity, he was fain to sink from the dignity of a captain of robbers to the grade of a common soldier, and addressed himself to an Austrian recruiting captain, he was readily accepted, and enlisted under an assumed name. He marched with the rest of the recruits to Linzbourg, and might have marched thence to some snug mud village in Hungary, where nobody would ever have known him, and have escaped the pursuits of justice for his past misdeeds; he might have commenced a new career of crime on another and a distant theatre; or he might have reformed, and become the sergeant-major and the ornament of an Austrian regiment; but, as he was walking through the streets of Linzbourg, he was accidentally met by a peasant who recognised him, and denounced him to the magistrates as the famous Schinder-hannes—the robber of the Rhine! No sooner was he denounced and produced by the officer to whom he enlisted, than the whole town flocked to see the man of whose exploits they had heard so much. Schinder-hannes had cultivated too numerous an acquaintance to hope to escape detection; he hung down his head; but he was sworn to by many who had met him on the road in the exercise of his calling. The Austrian captain gave him up to the civil power, and Schinder-hannes, after a career of unexampled audacity and success, (for this part of Europe,) which had lasted five years, was taken by a strong escort to Mayence, in May 1802. As soon as he saw himself in the hands of the French gens-d'armes, he cried "I am lost! now, indeed, it is all over with me!" On his arrival at Mayence, he was brought before the judges of the special criminal court, and to them he at once and freely gave a detailed account of his life and adventures. Such of his accomplices as were still living, were successively secured, and after eight months spent in investigations, and in receiving depositions against the robbers, in February 1803 the criminal court of Mayence declared itself competent to proceed on the trial of the accused. Omitting the doubtful or the frivolous, no less than fifty-three serious and substantiated charges were brought against Schinder-hannes. His accomplices arrested were sixty-seven. Among this number figured old Buckler, the forest-keeper, Schinder-hannes's father; the robber's mistress Julia Blasius; various other women, wives, mistresses, and sisters of the banditti; several itinerant musicians, Jews, a miller, &c. The acts of instruction, deposition, and interrogation proceeded for this extraordinary trial, filled, when printed, five thick folio volumes.

The public trial did not commence until the 24th of October 1803. Three of the accused had died meanwhile in prison, but sixty-five were brought before the court. One hundred and thirty-two witnesses appeared for the prosecution, and no less than two hundred and two for the prisoners. The first and second days of the trial were employed in reading the act of accusation. The whole trial occupied twenty-eight days. Schinder-hannes was firm and bold, and even gay. He entertained the hope that he should escape the capital punishment; but on the deposition of the miller's mother of Merxheim, to whose arm the robbers had applied a burning candle to extort her money from her, Schinder-hannes's countenance fell; till then he had succeeded tolerably well in making himself out, a criminal indeed, but not averse to cruelty or the shedding of blood, but at that moment he said, in a sad, despondent tone, "It is all over! I hear the scream of the bird of death!"

The horrid punishment of being broken on the wheel, which had been usually awarded to culprits of his class in that country, now presented itself to his imagination. The boldest might tremble at such a fate! He asked the president whether he was so to suffer? When answered that that species of punishment had been abolished by the French law, he recovered his self-possession, and added—"If I have wished to live, it is only because I intended to become an honest man!" During the whole of the trial he constantly endeavoured to screen his father and his mistress. It appeared, however, in evidence, that Julia had accompanied him in some of his minor expeditions, especially to the house of Isaac the Jew usurer; and that his parent also had participated in some of his crimes.

After a most patient investigation, Schinder-hannes was found guilty of all the charges, and with nineteen of his accomplices condemned to death. Fifteen more of the culprits, among whom was Schinder-hannes's father, were sentenced to hard labour in irons, for various terms, from six to twenty-four years; two others, with one of the women, to two years imprisonment; Julia Blasius to two years in the house of correction; and two other women to be expelled from the French territory. The rest were acquitted.

Schinder-hannes heard the sentence with much indifference, save when he evinced a lively satisfaction on hearing the lenient punishment of his mistress, and that his father's life was to be spared. He asked to speak with the president; but it was not to say one word for himself; it was only to express his hope that his father, his Julia, and his child, might be taken care of after his death.

On the morning of the 21st of November, the day fixed upon for the execution, a clergyman visited the prisoners. Schinder-hannes told him he was resigned to his fate, and respectfully requested him to bestow his spiritual care and consolation on certain of his comrades who needed them more than he did. He, however, expressed a wish to take the sacrament. When he arrived at the place of execution, he hastily climbed up the scaffold, and examined the guillotine with minute attention: he was curious to know whether its stroke was as prompt and sure as he had been given to understand it was, and put the question with an unflinching tongue.

On being answered in the affirmative, he turned round and addressed the crowd. "I have deserved death," said he, "but ten of my companions die innocent!" meaning, probably, that these ten had never been guilty of murder—the only crime, in his idea, that merited death. He then laid his head on the block, and found the transition from this world to the dread unknown, quite as rapid as the executioners told him it would be through the agency of their apparatus. The subalterns followed their captain, and the execution of the twenty culprits occupied only twenty-six minutes, making one minute eighteen seconds for each man!

The destruction of this daring band cleared the Rhine of robbers; but the inhabitants on the banks of that beautiful river will long retain the traditions of Schinder-hannes.

HUNGARIAN ROBBERS.

This story was told me by an Italian officer, who was serving, at the time he first learned it, with the "Grande Armée" of Napoleon. It seems to me to contain one of the most striking, most dramatic, and terrible scenes that can be conceived, and I have only to regret that I lack the talent or power of telling the tale of horror so well as it was told to me.

It was a few weeks before the termination of the short, but (for Austria) fatal campaign of 1809—that campaign which, begun nobly by the Austrians, ended in their seeing Bonaparte dictate to their prostrate empire from their capital, and shortly after claim as his bride the daughter of the sovereign he had so injured and humbled—that an Hungarian horse-dealer left Vienna to return to his home, which was situated in an interior province of his country.

He carried with him, in paper money and in gold, a very considerable sum, the product of the horses he had sold at the Austrian capital. To carry this in safety was a difficult object just at that time; for troops, French and Austrian, were scattered in every direction, and he knew by experience, that it was not always safe to fall in with small parties of soldiers, even of his own country or government, (to say nothing of the French,) but that Croates, and wild Hussars, and Huns, and others that fought under the Austrian eagle, were seldom over scrupulous as to "keeping their hands from picking and stealing," when opportunity was favourable or tempting.

The dealer, however, relied on his minute knowledge of the country he had traversed so often; on the bottom and speed of his thorough bred Hungarian horse;—and having obtained what he considered good information, as to the posts occupied by the belligerents, and the range of country most exposed to the soldiery, he set out from Vienna, which he feared would soon be in the hands of the enemy. He went alone, and on his road carefully avoided, instead of seeking the company of other travellers, for he reasonably judged, that a solitary individual, meanly dressed as he was, might escape notice, while a party of travellers would be sure to attract it.

By his good management he passed the Hungarian frontier unharmed, and continued his journey homeward by a circuitous unfrequented route. On the third night after his departure from Vienna, he stopped at a quiet inn, situated in the suburbs of a small town. He had never been there before, but the house was comfortable, and the appearance of the people about it respectable. Having first attended to his tired horse, he sat down to supper with his host and family. During the meal, he was asked whence he came, and when he said from Vienna, all present were anxious to know the news. The dealer told them all he knew. The host then enquired what business had carried him to Vienna. He told them he had been there to sell some of the best horses that were ever taken to that market. When he heard this, the host cast a glance at one of the men of the family, who seemed to be his son, which the dealer scarcely observed then, but which he had reason to recall afterwards.

When supper was finished, the fatigued traveller requested to be shown to his bed. The host himself took up a light, and conducted him across a little yard at the back of the house to a detached building, which contained two rooms, tolerably decent for an Hungarian hostel. In the inner of these rooms was a bed, and here the host left him to himself. As the dealer threw off his jacket and loosened the girdle round his waist where his money was deposited, he thought he might as well see whether it was all safe. Accordingly, he drew out an old leathern purse that contained his gold, and then a tattered parchment pocket-book that enveloped the Austrian bank notes, and finding that both were quite right, he laid them under the bolster, extinguished the light, and threw himself on the bed, thanking God and the saints that had carried him thus far homeward in safety. He had no misgiving as to the character of the people he had fallen amongst to hinder his repose, and the poor dealer was very soon enjoying a profound and happy sleep.

He might have been in this state of beatitude an hour or two, when he was disturbed by a noise like that of an opening window, and by a sudden rush of cool night air; on raising himself on the bed, he saw peering through an open window which was almost immediately above the bed, the head and shoulders of a man, who was evidently attempting to make his ingress into the room that way. As the terrified dealer looked, the intruding figure was withdrawn, and he heard a rumbling noise, and then the voices of several men, as he thought, close under the window. The most dreadful apprehensions, the more horrible as they were so sudden, now agitated the traveller, who, scarcely knowing what he did, but utterly despairing of preserving his life, threw himself under the bed. He had scarcely done so, when the hard breathing of a man was heard at the open window, and the next moment a robust fellow dropped into the room, and after staggering across it, groped his way by the walls to the bed. Fear had almost deprived the horse-dealer of his senses, but yet he perceived that the intruder, whoever he might be, was drunk. There was, however, slight comfort in this, for he might only have swallowed wine to make him the more desperate, and the traveller was convinced he had heard the voices of other men without, who might climb into the room to assist their brother villain in case any resistance should be made. His astonishment, however, was great and reviving, when he heard the fellow throw off his jacket on the floor, and then toss himself upon the bed under which he lay. Terror, however, had taken too firm a hold of the traveller to be shaken off at once,—his ideas were too confused to permit his imagining any other motive for such a midnight intrusion on an unarmed man with property about him, save that of robbery and assassination, and he lay quiet where he was until he heard the fellow above him snoring with all the sonorosity of a drunkard. Then, indeed, he would have left his hiding place, and gone to rouse the people in the inn to get another resting place instead of the bed of which he had been dispossessed in so singular a manner, but, just as he came to this resolution, he heard the door of the outer room open—then stealthy steps cross it—then the door of the very room he was in was softly opened, and two men, one of whom was the host and the other his son, appeared on its threshold.

"Leave the light where it is," whispered the host, "or it may disturb him and give us trouble."

"There is no fear of that," said the younger man, also in a whisper, "we are two to one; he has nothing but a little knick about him—he is dead asleep too! hear how he snores!"

"Do my bidding," said the old man, sternly; "would you have him wake and rouse the neighbourhood with his screams?"

As it was, the horror-stricken dealer under the bed could scarcely suppress a shriek, but he saw that the son left the light in the outer room, and then, pulling the door partially after him to screen the rays of the lamp from the bed, he saw the two murderers glide to the bed side, and then heard a rustling motion as of arms descending on the bed clothes, and a hissing, and then a grating sound, that turned his soul sick, for he knew it came from knives or daggers penetrating to the heart or vitals of a human being like himself, and only a few inches above his own body. This was followed by a sudden and violent start on the bed, accompanied by a moan. Then the bed, which was a low one, was bent by an increase of weight caused by one or both the murderers throwing themselves upon it, until it pressed on the body of the traveller. There was an awful silence for a moment or two, and then the host said, "He is finished—I have cut him across the throat—take the money, I saw him put it under his bolster."

"I have it, here it is," said the son; "a purse and a pocket-book."

The traveller was then relieved from the weight that had oppressed him almost to suffocation, and the assassins, who seemed to tremble as they went, ran out of the room, took up the light, and disappeared altogether from the apartment.

No sooner were they fairly gone, than the poor dealer crawled from under the bed, took one desperate leap, and escaped through the little window by which he had seen enter the unfortunate wretch who had evidently been murdered in his stead. He ran with all his speed to the town, where he told his horrid story and miraculous escape to the night watch. The night watch conducted him to the burghmaster, who was soon aroused from his sleep and acquainted with all that had happened.

In less than half an hour from the time of his escape from the inn, the horse-dealer was again at the murderous inn with the magistrate and a strong force of the horror-stricken inhabitants and the night watch, who had all run thither in the greatest silence. In the house all seemed as still as death, but as the party went round to the stables, they heard a noise; cautioning the rest to surround the inn and the outhouses, the magistrate with the traveller and some half dozen armed men ran to the stable door—this they opened, and found within the host and his son digging a grave.

The first figure that met the eyes of the murderers was that of the traveller. The effect of this on their guilty souls was too much to be borne; they shrieked and threw themselves on the ground, and though they were immediately seized by hard gripping hands of real flesh and blood, and heard the voices of the magistrates and their friends and neighbors, denouncing them as murderers, it was some minutes ere they could believe that the figure of the traveller that stood among them was other than a spirit. It was the harder villain, the father, who, on hearing the stranger's voice continuing in conversation with the magistrate, first gained sufficient command over himself to raise his face from the earth; he saw the stranger still pale and haggard, but evidently unhurt. The murderer's head spun round confusedly, but at length rising, he said to those who held him, "Let me see that stranger nearer; let me touch him—only let me touch him." The poor horse-dealer drew back in horror and disgust.

"You may satisfy him in this," said the magistrate, "he is unarmed and uninvolved, and we are here to prevent his doing you harm."

On this, the traveller let the host approach him, and pass his hand over his person, which when he had done, the villain exclaimed, "I am no murderer! who says I am a murderer?"

"That shall we see anon," said the traveller, who led the way to the detached apartment, followed by the magistrate, by the two prisoners, and all the party which had collected in the stable on hearing what passed there.

Both father and son walked with considerable confidence into the room, but when they saw by the lamps the night watch and others held over it, that there was a body covered with blood, lying upon the bed, they cried out "How is this? who is this?" and rushed together to the bed side. The lights were lowered; their rays fell full upon the ghastly figure and bleeding throat of a young man. At the sight, the younger of the murderers turned his head and swooned in silence; but the father, uttering a shriek so loud, so awful, that one of the eternally damned alone might equal its effect, threw himself on the bed and on the gashed and bloody body, and murmuring in his throat, "My son! I have killed mine own son!" also found a temporary relief from the horrors of his situation in insensibility. The next minute the wretched hostess, who was innocent of all that had passed, and who was, without knowing it, the wife of a murderer, the mother of a murderer, and the mother of a murdered son—of a son killed by a brother and a father, ran to the apartment, and would have interposed to fend its already insupportable horrors by entering there, had she not been prevented by the honest townspeople. She had been roused from sleep by the noise made in the stable, and then by her husband's shriek, and was now herself, shrieking and frantic, carried back into the inn by main force.

The two murderers were forthwith bound and carried to the town jail, where, on the examination, which was made the next morning, it appeared from evidence that the person murdered was the youngest son of the landlord of the inn, and a person never suspected of any crime more serious than habitual drunkenness; that instead of being in bed, as his father and brother had believed him, he had stolen out of the house, and joined a party of carousers in the town; of these boon companions, all appeared in evidence, and two of them deposed that the deceased, being exceedingly intoxicated, and dreading his father's wrath, should he rouse the house in such a state, and at that late hour, had said to them that he would get through the window into the little detached apartment, and sleep there, as he had often done before, and that they two had accompanied him, and assisted him to climb to the window. The deceased had reached the window once, and as they thought would have got safe through it, but drunk and unsteady as he was, he slipped back; they had then some difficulty in inducing him to climb again, for in the caprice of intoxication, he said he would rather go sleep with one of his comrades. However, he had at last effected his entrance, and they, his two comrades, had gone to their respective homes.

The wretched criminals were executed a few weeks after the commission of the crime. They had confessed every thing, and restored to the horse-dealer the gold and the paper money they had concealed, and which had led them to do a deed so much more atrocious than even they had contemplated.

THE HIGHLANDERS OF INDIA, OR THE ROBBERIES.

The following account, which is from the pen of the lamented Bishop Heber, is replete with interest, and offers one passage, than which nothing can be well more impressive and dramatic. It is, moreover, strictly confirmatory of what has been already several times advanced; that, as justice and mildness of government went men from rapine and crime, so too tyranny and oppression drive men to them; and when, under the latter circumstances, the nature of the country is favourable, abounding in forests and mountain recesses, and touching on the confines of another state, an extensive system of brigandage will almost invariably result.

"The conquest of Rohilkund by the English, and the death of its chief in battle, its consequent cession to the Nabab of Oude, and the horrible manner in which Sujah ud Dowlah oppressed and misgoverned it, form one of the worst chapters of the English history in India. We have since made the Rohillas some amends by taking them away from Oude, and governing them ourselves; but, by all I could learn, the people appear by no means to have forgotten or forgiven their first injuries."

Their insubordination and violence are favoured by the nature of the locality just alluded to—their province is in the immediate neighbourhood of Oude, and a vast forest exists along the whole of their eastern, southern and northern frontiers.

"In this forest a great Rohilla robber, or rebel chief, is by many supposed to have lurked the last seven years, for whose apprehension government have vainly offered no less a sum than 10,000 rupees. Many robberies are, certainly, still perpetrated in his name; but the opinion of the magistrates at Shahjehanpore is, that the man is really dead, and that his name only, like that of Captain Rock, remains as the rallying point of mutiny. The military officers of our dinner party had often been in this forest, which they describe as extensive, and in some places very picturesque, with some few tracts of high land, whence, even in this neighbourhood, the snowy range of Himalaya is visible.

"The Rohilla insurgents are usually very faithful to each other, and, as in Oude there is neither police nor pursuit, it very seldom happens, if they once escape, that they can be laid hold of afterwards. One of the most notorious of them, who had eluded justice, came into the hands of government not long since, under very singular circumstances. He had passed over into Oude, and bought a zemindarrie there, which was last year seized on, under circumstances of excessive injustice, by the servants of the king's favourite, who, at the same time, carried off one of his wives. The zemindar, equally high spirited and desperate, rode immediately to Lucknow, sealed, by the assistance of his servants, the wall of the minister's private garden, and waited there well-armed, but alone, till his enemy should make his appearance. The minister did not himself appear, but his two youngest sons came out to walk with their ayahs.* The Rohilla knew them, pounced on them like a tiger, and holding them between his knees, told the terrified women to go and call their master. The palace was soon in an uproar, but he sat still, with his back against the wall, the infants under his knees, and a pistol in each hand, calling out, 'Draw near and they are both dead.' The minister wept and tore his flesh, promising him every thing if he would let them go; to which he answered, 'The restoration of my wife, my own safety, and the guarantee of the British resident for both.' The Rohilla's woman was immediately brought out, and the minister ran like one frantic to the English residency, begging, for God's sake, either Mr. Ricketts or Major Raper to go with him. The latter went, and the Rohilla, after a horrible pause, in which he seemed still to be weighing the sweetness of revenge against the promises held out to him, rose, took his wife by the hand, and led her away. He was not, however, satisfied with the security of his continuance in Oude, but soon after surrendered himself to the British, saying that he must look forward to a confinement of some time, but he preferred their severities to the tender mercies of the minister, who, in spite of his promises, had, he was convinced, already laid snares for him. He is now a prisoner in the castle of Allahabad, but it is generally believed that he has made his peace, and that his confinement will not be a long one, though his offences before were serious enough."

Our sepoy that are scattered in strong detachments up and down this lawless district, have, generally, plenty of work on their hands, what with the wilfulness of the Rohillas in refusing to attend to the decrees or decisions of government, in matters of disputed property, and "an inveterate habit of 'lifting' cows and sheep, which the beggarly zemindars and idle long-legged 'gillics' of one village are apt to feel a pride in exercising against those of the next."

The Rohillas seem particularly addicted to horse stealing, and to long-tailed horses. "Take care of that long-tailed horse of yours!" was the first caution the bishop received. "Keep him carefully at night, under the sentry's eye, or you will never carry him over the ferry of Anopshahr!" The second horse of the amiable prelate being a short-tailed one, was supposed to be safe.

MEWATTIES—BHEELS—BAUGRIES—MOGHIES—GWARRIAS—THUGS.

Central India was devastated by associations of wretches who for the most part subsisted entirely on plunder. Some of them seem to have struck their baneful roots in the country long ago, others to have arisen under the Mahratta system, and the times of revolution and trouble, which would naturally tend to give strength to the old and birth to the new—and facilities to the execrable operations of all. Sir John Malcolm has described, in a striking manner, the desolation which ensued from letting loose a population composed of such iniquitous materials. Only those who resided in walled towns were safe from the ravages and massacres of the banditti. The state of the unprotected parts of the country near the Vindhya mountains and the river Nerbudda, where hundreds of villages were seen deserted and roofless, is described by Captain Ambrose, one of Sir John Malcolm's officers: in the year 1818, he ascertained the names, and the names of the villages they belonged to, of eighty-four individuals who had been killed by tigers; these ferocious animals have literally usurped the country, and fought with the returning inhabitants for their fields. Authentic documents also testify that in the state of Holkar, in 1817, sixteen hundred and sixty-three villages were deserted, or, as the natives emphatically term it—"without a lamp," a phrase that denotes the extreme of desolation. All this ruin had been affected by the banditti of Central India.

To proceed with these robbers, the Mewatties are, or were an ambiguous race, half Mahometan, half Hindoo, who were not only robbers and assassins, but, according to Sir John Malcolm, the most desperate rogues in India. It is delightful to learn from Bishop Heber, that they were in a great measure reclaimed, even when he travelled through the scenes of their crimes, which he did with perfect safety; and to contrast this with the former state of the country, when it was as dangerous as the interior of Arabia is at this moment, and when merchants were obliged to travel in caravans, and to pay high rates for protection to every paltry plundering Raja. "This neighbourhood," says the bishop, speaking of part of the province of Delhi, "is still but badly cultivated; but fifteen years ago it was as wild as the Ferraï, as full of tigers, and with no human inhabitants but banditti. Cattle stealing still prevails to a considerable extent, but the Mewatties are now most of them subject either to the British government or that of Bhurtpoor, and the security of life and property afforded them by the former, has induced many of the tribes to abandon their fortresses, to seat themselves in the plain, and cultivate the ground like honest men and good subjects."

The Bheels who inhabit the wild and mountainous tracts which separate Malwa from Nemaar and Guzerat, are a totally distinct race, insulated in their abodes, and separated by their habits, usages and forms of worship, from all other tribes of India. According to Bishop Heber, they were unquestionably the original inhabitants of Rajpootana, and driven to their fastnesses and desperate and miserable way of life by the invasion of those tribes, wherever they may have come from, who profess the religion of Brahma. "This the Rajpoots themselves virtually allow, by admitting in their traditional history, that most of their principal cities and fortresses were founded by such or such Bheel chiefs, and conquered from them by the children of the sun."

Here we have again, as it were, the Guel retreating from the Sassenach, and indemnifying and avenging himself by foray, blood, and plunder.

Thieves and savages as they were, the British officers who conversed with Bishop Heber, thought them on the whole a better race than their conquerors. Their word is said to be more to be depended on: they are of a franker and livelier character; their women are far better treated and enjoy more influence; and though they shed blood without scruple in cases of feud, or in the regular way of a foray, they are not vindictive or inhospitable under other circumstances; and several British officers have, with perfect safety, gone hunting and fishing in their country, without escort or guide, except what these poor savages themselves cheerfully furnished for a little brandy.

"In a Sanscrit vocabulary, seven hundred or more years old, the term Bheel denotes a particular race of barbarians living on plunder; and the Mahabharat, an ancient Hindoo poem, gives the same description of them. At all times formidable, they became the general terror of Central India under the guidance of Nadir Sing. This chief committed a murder, or rather caused it to be committed. The English had now the power of administering justice, and the following instance, which occurred on the trial of Nadir Sing, is strongly characteristic of the Bheel race.

"During the examination into the guilt of Nadir, when taking the evidence of some female prisoners, it appeared that the father and husband of one of them, a girl about fourteen years of age, had been instruments in committing the murder of which Nadir was accused. She was asked if they put the deceased to death; 'Certainly they did,' was her firm reply; 'but they acted by our Dhunnee's (or lord's) order.

"That may be true,' it was remarked, 'but it does not clear them; for it was not an affray; it was a deed perpetrated in cold blood.'

"Still," said the girl, 'they had the chief's order.'

"The person" conducting the examination shook his head, implying it would not be received in justification. The child, for she was hardly more, rose from the ground where she was sitting, and, pointing to two sentries who guarded them, and were standing at the door of the room, exclaimed, with all the animation of strong feeling, 'These are your soldiers; you are their Dhunnee; your words are their laws; if you order them this moment to advance and put me, my mother, and cousin, who are now before you, to death, would they hesitate in slaying three female Bheels? If we are innocent, would you be guilty of our blood, or these faithful men?' After this observation she re-seated herself, saying, 'My father and husband are Nadir's soldiers.'

The chiefs of the Bheels, indeed, who were usually called Blomeachs, exercised the most absolute power, and their orders to commit the most atrocious crimes were obeyed, (as among the sectaries of the old man of the mountain,) by their ignorant but attached subjects, without a coercion, on their part, that they had an option. But Nadir Sing was banished for the murder alluded to, his son, who had been carefully educated at Sir John Malcolm's head-quarters, succeeded to his authority, and there is now no part of the country where life and property are safer than amid the late dreaded Bheels of his father.

The Bheels excite the horror of the higher classes of Hindoos, by eating, not only the flesh of buffaloes, but of cows; an abomination which places them just above the Chunnars, or shoe-makers, who feast on dead carcasses, and are not allowed to dwell within the precincts of the village. The wild Bheels, who keep among the hills, are a diminutive and wretched-looking race, but active, and capable of great fatigue; they go armed with bows and arrows, and are self-professed robbers and thieves, lying in wait for the weak and unprotected, while they fly from the strong. Their excesses, however, are now chiefly indulged in against the Hindoos. "A few months since," says Bishop Heber, "one of the hazars of Nee-much was attacked and plundered by a body of the 'hill people'; and there are, doubtless, even in the plains, many who still shiver at their late anarchy, and exclaim amid the comforts of a peaceful government,

'Give us your wilderness and our woods,
Our huts and caves again!'

"The son of Mr. Palmer, chaplain of Nussereabad, while travelling lately with his father and mother in their way from Mhow, observed some Bheels looking curiously at a large drove of laden bullocks which were drinking in a ford. He asked one of the Bheels if the bullocks belonged to him. "No" was the reply, "but a good part of them would have been curs, if it were not for you English, who will let nobody thrive but yourselves."

On first approaching the Bheel villages, the bishop observed a man run from the nearest hut to the top of a hill, and give a shrill shout or scream, which he heard repeated from the furthest hamlet which were drinking from two others, which the bishop could not see. "I asked the meaning of this," he continues, "and my guards informed me that these were their signals to give the alarm of our coming, our numbers, and that we had horse with us. By this means they knew at once whether it was advisable to attack us, to fly, or to remain quiet, while, if there were any of their number who had particular reasons for avoiding an interview with the troops and magistrates of the low lands, they had thus fair warning given them to keep out of the way. This sounds like a description of Rob Roy's country, but these poor Bheels are far less formidable enemies than the old Mac Gregors."

This ancient people are very expert in the use of the bow, and have a curious way of shooting from the long grass, where they lie concealed, holding the bow with their feet. Besides, against their prey, quadruped, biped, and winged, the Bheels use the bow and arrow against fish, which they kill in the rivers and pools with great certainty and rapidity. Their bows are of split bamboo, simple, but strong and elastic. The arrows are also of split bamboo, with an iron head coarsely made, and a long single barb. Those intended for striking fish, have this head so contrived as to slip off from the shaft when the fish is struck, but to remain connected with it by a long line, on the principle of the harpoon. The shaft, in consequence, remains floating in the water, and not only contributes to weary out the animal, but shows its pursuer which way he flies, and thus enables him to seize it.

They have many curious customs, that date from very remote antiquity. One of them was witnessed by Bishop Heber, and described in his usual felicitous manner.

"A number of Bheels, men and women, came to our camp, (near Jhaloda,) with bamboos in their hands, and the women with their clothes so scanty, and tucked up so high, as to leave the whole limb nearly bare. They had a drum, a horn, and some other rude minstrelsy, and said they were come to celebrate the hoolee. They drew up in two parties, one men, one women, and had a mock fight, in which at first the females had much the advantage, having very slender poles, while the men had only short cudgels, with which they had some difficulty in guarding their heads. At last some of the women began to strike a little too hard, on which their antagonists lost temper, and closed with them so fiercely, that the poor females were put to the rout, in real or pretended terror. They collected a little money in the camp, and then went on to another village. The Hoolee, according to the orthodox system, was over, but these games are often prolonged for several days after its conclusion."

As Bishop Heber advanced in the country infested by the Bheels, he met caravans of Bhuijrees, or carriers of

* Sir John Malcolm himself. He was assisted on the trial by Captain D. Stuart, who noted down the girl's expression.

* Nurses or governesses.

grain, (a singular wandering race,*) escorted by Bheels, paid by the carriers for the purpose. They proceeded by day with an advanced and rear-guard of these naked bowmen, and at night for security against the robbers, the honest Brinjarrees drew their corn wagons into a circle, placing their cattle in the centre, and connecting each ox with his yoke-fellow, and at length to wain, by iron collars riveted round their necks, and fastened to an iron chain, which last is locked to the cart-wheel. It is thus extremely difficult to plunder without awaking them; and in places of greater danger, one of the Brinjarrees always stands sentry. Still further on, descending from the hills to the lowlands, the bishop had himself one of these poor Bheels for a guide, who, as he trotted along the rugged road before his horse's head, with a shield and a neatly-made hatchet, and with a blanket of red baize flung over his shoulder, reminded him strongly of the pictures of a North American Indian. The dashing appearance of this man was owing to his being in the company's pay, as a policeman; but the Bheels here were generally in much better plight, and less given to robbing than in the hilly country.

After this, a strong escort of Bheels was added to the bishop's retinue. They not only led him safely through a perilous country, abounding with ravines, and broken land overgrown with brush-wood, (the most favourable of places for the spring of a tiger, or the arrows of an ambushed band of robbers, where recently passengers had been plundered by Bheels, and a man carried off by a tiger from a numerous convoy of artillery, on its march to Kairah), but they conducted him across the rapid stream of the Nhye, and on his arrival at Waseed, acted as watchmen in his camp, where their shrill calls from one to the other were heard all night.

"We were told," says the bishop, "not to be surprised at this choice, since these poor thieves are, when trusted, the truest of men, and of all sentries the most watchful and indefatigable. They and the Khoekes, a race almost equally wild, are uniformly preferred in Guzerat for the service of the police, and as durwans to gentlemen's houses and gardens."

When Sir John Malcolm began the work of reformation, the first job he took was to raise a small corps of Bheels, commanded by their own chiefs, and "before," says he, "these robbers had been in the service one month, I placed them as a guard over treasure; which had a surprising effect, both in elevating them in their own minds, and in those of other parts of the community." Nor did the judicious reformer stop here; he took as his constant attendants some of the most desperate of the plundering chiefs; and the good effects fully answered the expectations which he had formed, by thus inspiring confidence, and exalting bold and courageous men in their own estimation.

We have only to add in honour of this ancient robber race, that the fair sex have great influence in the society, and that in the recent reform, their women acted a prominent part, and one worthy of the feelings and character of their sex.

The very interesting work of Mr. Charles Coleman, (The Mythology of the Hindoos, with notices of various mountain and island tribes, &c.) recently published, affords the following additional anecdotes relative to the Bheels previous to their reformation.

"An English officer, a Captain B— had, by interrupting and wounding a Bheel, while labouring in his vocation (of robbery), been marked out for vengeance. In consequence of this he had a sentry to his house; but from the neighbouring bank of the river they had worked a subterranean passage for a considerable distance, large enough for one man to crawl along, who had begun to perforate the floor of his hedge-chamber when he was discovered. We had at the city where this took place nearly two thousand troops, yet it was necessary, for the officer's safety, to remove him to Bombay. A Parsee newsman, who had refused to pay the usual tribute to the Bheels, was found dead in the morning in the mess-room. It was his custom to put his mat on a large wine chest where he slept: in the morning he was found with his head placed on the messtable, the headless body lying on the chest.

An encampment of English, surrounded by two hundred sentries, was robbed by this people:—

"When the morning broke forth, every officer had been robbed, save one, and he had a priest (Bhaut) and a Bheel guard. Nor did the poor siphawes escape; for when they gave the alarm of 'thief! thief!' they were sure to get a blow or wound in the leg or thigh, from a Bheel lying on the ground, or moving about on all-fours, wrapped in a bullock's hide or a sheepskin, or carrying a bush before or over him, so that the sentries were deceived; and if they fired, they were as likely to hit some of the women or children, or the followers, or the officers, as the Bheel himself; and had they fired, the Bheel, in the dark, thus placed in a populous camp, had every advantage, his weapon making no noise, and his companions being ready to shoot the siphawes through the head.

"Most of the officers were up during the night, but their presence was useless. Lieutenant B— did lay hands on a Bheel, but he literally slipped through his fingers, being naked, his body oiled all over, and his head shaved; and on giving the alarm, one or two arrows were seen to have gone through the cloths of the tent. Were it possible to reach the hold of a Bheel, your motions must be as quick as lightning; for they carry the blade of a knife, which is fastened round the neck by a string, and with which, if they find themselves in a dilemma, they will rip up the person holding them."

Captain Mundy, in his very spirited "Pen and Pencil Sketches in India," relates this personal adventure.

"I retired to my tent this evening pretty well knocked up; and during the night had an adventure, which might have terminated with more loss to myself, had I slept sounder. My bed, a low charpoy, or 'four feet,' was in one corner of the tent, close to a door, and I awoke several times from a feverish dose, fancying I heard something moving in my tent; but could not discover any thing, though a cheering, or little Indian lamp, was burning on the table. I therefore again wooed the balmy power, and slept. At length, just as 'the iron tongue of midnight had told twelve' (for I had looked at my watch five minutes before, and replaced it under my pillow,) I was awakened by a rustling sound under my head; and, half opening my eyes, without changing my position, I saw a hideous black face within a foot of mine, and the owner of this index of a cut-throat, or, at least, out-purse disposition, kneeling on the carpet, with one hand under my pillow, and the other grasping—not a dagger!—but the door-post. Still without moving my body, and with half closed eyes, I gently stole my right hand to a board-spear, which at night was always placed between my bed and the wall; and as soon as I had clutched it, made a rapid and violent movement, in order to wrench it from its place, and try the virtue of its point upon the intruder's body, but I wrenched in vain. Fortunately for the robber, my hearer, in placing the weapon to its natural recess, had forced the point into the top of the tent and the butt into the ground so firmly, that I failed to extract it at the first effort; and my visitor, alarmed by the movement, started upon his feet and rushed through the door. I had time to see that he was perfectly naked, with the exception of a black blanket twisted round his loins, and that he had already stowed away in his cloth my candlesticks and my dressing case, which latter contained letters, keys, money, and other valuables. I had also leisure, in that brief space, to judge, from the size of the arm extended to my bed, that the bearer was more formed for activity than strength; and, by his grizzled beard, that he was rather old than young. I therefore sprang from my bed, and darting through the purdar of the inner door, seized him by the cummerbund just as he was passing the outer entrance." The cloth, however, being loose, gave way, and ere I could confirm my grasp, he snatched it from my hand, tearing away my thumb nail down to the quick. In his anxiety to escape, he stumbled through the outer purdar, and the much esteemed dressing case fell out of his loosened zone. I was so close at his heels, that he could not recover it; and jumping over the tent ropes—which, doubtless, the rogue calculated would trip me up—he ran towards the door. I was in such a fury, that, forgetting my bare feet, I gave chase, vociferating lustily, 'Choor! choor!' (thief! thief!) but was soon brought up by some sharp stones, just in time to see my rascal, by the faint light of the moon through the thick foliage overhead, jump upon a horse standing unheld near the road, and dash down the path at full speed, his black blanket flying in the wind. What would I have given for my double barrelled joo at that moment! As he and his steed went clattering along the rocky forest road, I thought of the black hunter of the Hartz, or the erl king! Returning to my tent, I isolated myself by abusing my servants, who were just rubbing their eyes and stirring themselves, and by threatening the terrified sepoys sentry with a court martial. My trunks at night were always placed outside the tent, under the sentry's eye; the robber, therefore, must have made his entry on the opposite side, and he must have been an adept in his vocation, as four or five servants were sleeping between the khannats. The poor devil did not get much booty for his trouble, having only secured a razor, a pot of pomatum, (which will serve to lubricate his person for his next exploit), and the candlesticks, which on closer inspection will prove to him the truth of the axiom, that 'all is not gold that glitters,' nor even silver. * * * The next morning, on relating my adventure, I was told that I was fortunate in having escaped cold steel; and many comfortable instances were recited, of the robbed being stabbed in attempting to secure the robber."

Of the other professed robbers and thieves in Central India, the two principal are the Baggies and Moghies, both Hindoos of the lowest caste: their redeeming qualities are bravery and expertness; they are "true to their salt," or to those who feed them, beyond most of the Hindoos; and so literally do they adopt the proverb, that they avoid tasting salt from the hands of any but their own brethren, that they may not be fettered in their darling pursuit of plunder. The Gwarriahs are a tribe who support themselves by stealing women and children, whom they sell as slaves; but this abominable practice has nearly been abolished wherever British influence extends. The Thugs are the last, and worst of all. They are bands of mendicants, self-called pilgrims, pilferers, robbers, and cowardly, treacherous murderers, chiefly Brahmins, but composed of all classes, even of Mahometans. They assume all sorts of disguises; sometimes seeking protection from travellers, at others offering it; in either case the fate of those who trust them is the same.

"The Thugs," says Sir John Malcolm,* "carry concealed a long silken cord with a noose, which they throw round the necks of their heedless companions, who are strangled and plundered. Their victims, who are always selected for having property, are, when numerous or at all on their guard, lulled by every art into confidence. They are invited to feasts, where their victuals and drink are mixed with soporific or poisonous drugs, through the effects of which they fall an easy prey to these murderers and robbers, the extraordinary success of whose atrocities can only be accounted for by the condition of the countries in which they take place."

The name of these monsters—Thug, quasi Tog, in English, would not be altogether inapplicable, as regards a principal part of their performance. "They watch their opportunity," says Bishop Heber, "to fling a rope with a slip-knot over the heads of their victims, and then they drag them from their horses and strangle them; and so nimbly and with such fatal aim are they said to do this, that they seldom miss, and leave no time to the traveller to draw a sword, or use a gun, or in any way defend or disentangle himself. The wretches who practise this are very numerous in Guzerat and Malwa, but where they occur in Hindostan, are generally from the southeastern provinces."

At an immeasurable distance from these nations of robbers—these hosts of hereditary banditti in India, and more like our casual, lawless associations in Europe, are the Deoities, who particularly infest the neighbourhood of Calcutta, robbing on the river in boats, or plundering on shore. Their gang-robbery is said very nearly to resemble that of the Riband-men of Ireland, but unmixed with any political feeling. Five or ten peasants will meet together as soon as it is dark, to attack some neighbour's house, and not only plunder, but torture him, his wife, and children, with horrible cruelty, to make him discover his money. In the daytime these marauders follow peaceable professions, and some of them are thriving men, while the whole firm is often under the protection of a Zemindar, (a landholder, or lord of the manor), who shares the booty, and does his best to bring off any of the gang who may fall into the hands of justice, by suborning witnesses to prove an alibi, bribing the inferior agents of police, or intimidating the witnesses for the prosecution. Thus, many men suspected of these practices, contrive to live on, from year to year, in tolerably good esteem

* The tents in India have double flaps; the outer khannat, or wall, forming a verandah, of some four feet wide, round the interior pavilion.

* The Brinjarrees pass their whole lives in carrying grain from one part of the country to the other, seldom on their own account, but as agents for others. They travel in large bodies with their wives, children, dogs, and loaded bullocks. The men are all armed as a protection against petty thieves. From the sovereignty and armies of Hindostan, they have nothing to apprehend. Their calling is almost considered as sacred. Even conquering armies would then to pass and repay safely; never taking their goods without purchase, or even preventing them, if they chose, from victualing their camp: both sides wisely agreeing to respect and encourage a branch of industry, the interruption of which, might be attended with fatal consequences to both. The punctuality of these corn carriers is marvellous.

with their neighbours, and completely beyond the reach of a government which requires proof ere it will punish. The evil is supposed to have increased since the number of spirit shops has spread so rapidly in Calcutta. These fountains of mischief are thronged both by the Hindu and Mussulman population, especially at night; and thus drunkenness on ardent spirits, and the fierce and hateful passions they engender, lead naturally to those results which night favours, at the same time that the drinking shops furnish convenient places of meeting for all men who may be banded for an illicit purpose.

AFGHAN ROBBERS.

The mountain tribes of the Afghan race who dwell in Caubul, between India and Persia, are nearly all robbers; but like the Arabs, unite pillage with pastoral or other pursuits, and commit their depredations almost exclusively on the strangers that travel through their countries. Although I am not in possession of any striking stories of their actions, there are two or three of these tribes that may claim attention from their peculiarities.

There is, for example, that of the Jadrans, a race of goat-herds, who wander continually with their goats through the thick pine forests that cover their mountains, and are in appearance and habits of life more like mountain bears than men. They are not numerous; their wild country is never explored by travellers, and they are never by any chance met with out of their own hills. They are sometimes at war with their neighbours, and always on the look-out for travellers on the road from Caubul through Bughush, near the pass of Peiwar, whom they invariably plunder.

More important than these bear-like robbers, are the Vizeerees, a powerful tribe, occupying an extensive country among the mountains, which are also here covered by pine forests, but contain some few cleared and cultivated spots. Their habits are almost as retiring as those of their neighbours, the Jadrans, and Mr. Elphinstone found it impossible to meet with a Vizeeree out of his own country. Those of the tribe who are fixed, live in small hamlets of thatched and terraced houses; in some places they live in caves cut out of the rocks. Some of these rise above each other in three stories, and others are so high as to admit a camel. But most of the tribe dwell in black tents, or moveable hovels of mats, or temporary straw huts; these go up to the high mountains in spring, and stay there till the cold and snow drive them back to the low and warm hills. Their principal stock are goats; but they also breed many small, but serviceable horses. They have no general government; but are divided into societies, some under powerful Khans, and others under a simple democracy; they are all most remarkable for their peaceful conduct among themselves; they have no wars between clans, and private dissension is hardly ever heard of, and yet they are all robbers!

Notorious plunderers, however, as they are, the smallest escort granted by them, secures a traveller a hospitable reception through the whole tribe.

They are particularly remarkable for their attacks on the caravans, and migratory tribes to the west of the pass of Gholairce. No escorts are ever granted, or applied for there; the caravan is well guarded, and able to deter attacks or fight its way through. No quarter is given to men in these predatory wars; it is said that the Vizeerees would even kill a male child that fell into their hands; but they never molest women; and if one of their sex wander from a caravan, they treat her with kindness, and send guides to escort her to her tribe. Even a man would meet with the same treatment, if he could once make his way into the house of a Vizeeree; the master would then be obliged to treat him with all the attention and good will which is due to a guest. Such is their veracity, that if there is a dispute about a stray goat, and one party will say it is his, and confirm his assertion by stroking his beard, the other instantly gives it up, without suspicion of fraud.*

These mountain robbers have really exalted notions of what is due to the gentler sex. So kind to the stray wives or daughters of others, unlike savages or semi-barbarous men, who throw off from their own shoulders nearly all drudgery and labour save that of the chase, or the care of their flocks, these Vizeerees do not require any labour from their women. But not only this; a most extraordinary custom is said to prevail among them—a female prerogative that has no parallel among any other people upon earth, and that reverses what we are in the habit of considering the natural order of things —the women choose their husbands, and not the husbands their wives!

"If a woman is pleased with a man, she sends the drummer of the camp to pin a handkerchief to his cap, with a pin which she has used to fasten her hair. The drummer watches his opportunity, and does this in public, naming the woman, and the man is immediately obliged to marry her, if he can pay her price to her father."*

The Sheerances are a tribe more important still, great part of whose country is occupied by the lofty mountain of Tukhti Solimann, and the hills which surround its base. Many parts of it are nearly inaccessible; one of the roads is in some places cut out of the steep face of the mountain, and in others supported by beams inserted in the rock, and with all this labour is still impracticable for beasts of burden.

The habits of a pastoral, wandering life, dispose to robbery; but unlike the other tribes, the Sheerances are essentially an agricultural people, keeping their valleys in a high state of cultivation, by means of damming the hill streams to irrigate them; and yet they are, perhaps, the greatest robbers of all these Afghans.

They are governed by a chief called the Neeka, or grandfather, who is superstitiously revered by them, and left in possession of an extraordinary degree of power. He commands them in their predatory expeditions, and before the men march they all pass under his turban, which is stretched out for the purpose by the Neeka and a Moolah. This, they think secures them from wounds and death.

They respect none of the neighbouring tribes that pass through their country, in their annual pastoral migrations; they attack them all: they may, indeed, be said to be at war with all the world, since they plunder every traveller that comes within their reach. They even attack the dead!

"While I was in their neighbourhood," says Mr. Elphinstone, "they stopped the body of a Dornanee of rank, which was going through their country to be buried at Candahar, and detained it till a ransom had been paid for it."

This is rather worse than a barbarous law that has lingered on even in England to our days, and allows the creditor to arrest the corpse of a debtor. These Sheerances, however, enjoy the reputation of unblemished good faith, and a traveller who trusts himself to them, or hires an escort from among them, may pass through their country in perfect security. Mr. Elphinstone says that these curious robbers are very punctual in their prayers, but do not appear to feel much real devotion. In confirmation of this opinion, he adds the following amusing anecdote.

"I once saw a Sheerance performing his Namaz, while some people in the same company were talking of hunting; the size of deer happened to be mentioned, and the Sheerance, in the midst of his prostrations, called out that the deer in his country were as large as little bullocks, and then went on with his devotions!"

THE BUCCANEERS OF AMERICA.

The following account of a most extensive combination of outlaws, will not we trust be deemed tedious, though there is more detail than mere amusement would seem to require. It is the only accessible abridgement of a very long history, which is less known perhaps than most other important items of American annals. Captain Burney's work is an expensive one, in five quarto volumes, the fourth containing the history of the Buccaneers; the exact title is "A Chronological History of the Voyages and Discoveries in the South Sea." These five volumes will be found on the shelves of the Philadelphia Library.—Ed.

Scarcely any class of robbers have been more conspicuous, or have operated on a grander scale, than the Buccaneers and Filibusters of America. I remember, when a child, being horribly amused by a book that was popular at the time as it probably still is with young people, which contained the lives of many of these notorious characters, with minute accounts of their cruelties and atrocities. The book is probably as fresh in the memory of most of my readers. It is not my intention to draw from it, or to give a ghastly interest to the present work, by quoting how the monster Morgan tortured his captives, or made them "walk the plank," or similar matters, but to give a brief sketch of these daring adventurers from Captain Burney's voluminous, but interesting and authentic work, which in itself contains a mine of geographical and various information, first collected by the Buccaneers. All the other histories of these men, and they are numerous, are, as Captain Burney remarks, "boastful compositions which have delighted in exaggeration; and what is most mischievous, they have lavished commendations upon acts which demanded reprobation, and have endeavoured to raise miscreants, notorious for their want of humanity, to the rank of heroes, lessening thereby the stain upon robbery, and the abhorrence naturally conceived against cruelty."

Captain Burney thus describes the origin of these lawless associations, which for two centuries were allowed to carry on their depredations.

"The men whose enterprises are to be related, were natives of different European nations, but chiefly of Great Britain and France, and most of them sea-faring people, who being disappointed, by accidents or the cunivance of the Spaniards, in their more sober pursuits in the West Indies, and also instigated by thirst for plunder, as much as by desire for vengeance, embodied themselves under different leaders of their own choosing, to make predatory war upon the Spaniards. To these men the Spaniards naturally treated as pirates; but some peculiar circumstances which provoked their first enterprises, and a general feeling of enmity against that nation on account of her American conquests, procured them the countenance of the rest of the maritime states of Europe, and to be distinguished, first by the softened appellations of freebooters and adventurers, and afterwards by that of buccaneers."

Spain, indeed, considered the New World as treasure-trove of which she was lawfully and exclusively the mistress. The well known bull of Pope Alexander VI. gave what was then held as a sacred recognition of these exclusive rights. Unaccountable as such folly may now appear, it is an historical fact that the Spaniards at first fancied they could keep their discovery of the West India islands and of the American continent a secret from the rest of the world, and prevent the ships of other nations from finding their way thither. When, in the year 1517, about twenty-five years after their first settlements, the Spaniards found a large English ship between St. Domingo, and Porto Rico, they were overcome with rage and astonishment; and when this same ship came to the mouth of the port of St. Domingo, and the captain sent on shore to request permission to sell his goods, Francisco de Tapia, the governor of the Spanish fort, ordered the cannons to be fired at her, on which the English were obliged to weigh anchor and sheer off. The news of this unexpected visit, when known in Spain, caused great inquietude, and the governor of the castle of St. Domingo was reprimanded, "because he had not, instead of forcing the English ship to depart by firing his cannon, contrived to seize her, so that no one might have returned to teach others of her nation the route to the Spanish Indies."

In the plenitude of her power and pretensions, however, neither the French nor the English, though when taken they were barbarously treated as pirates, were to be deterred. According to Burney, as a factor to some English merchants, and many adventurers soon followed him. The French, who had made several voyages to the Brazil, also increased in numbers in the West Indies. All these went with the certainty that they should meet with hostility from the Spaniards, which they resolved to return with hostility. That they did not always wait for an attack, appears by an ingenious phrase of the French adventurers, who, if the first opportunity was in their favour, termed their profiting by it, "dédonner par avance." To repress these interlopers, the jealous Spaniards employed armed ships, or guarda-costas, the commanders of which were instructed to take no prisoners! On the other hand, the intruders joined their numbers, made combinations, and descended on different parts of the coast, ravaging the Spanish towns and settlements. A warfare was thus established between Europeans in the West Indies, entirely independent of transactions in Europe. All Europeans not Spaniards, whether there was war or peace between their respective nations in the Old World, on their meeting in the New, regarded each other as friends and allies, with the Spaniards for their common enemy, and called themselves "Brethren of the Coast."

Their principal pursuit was not of a nature to humiliate these desperate adventurers, for it was hunting of cattle, the hides and suet of which they could turn to profitable account. "The time when they began to form factories," says Captain Burney, "to hunt cattle for the skins, and to cure the flesh as an article of traffic, is not certain, but it may be concluded that these occupations were begun by the crews of wrecked vessels, or by seamen who had disagreed with their commander; and that the ease, plenty, and freedom from all command and subordination enjoyed in such a life, soon drew others to quit their ships, and join in the same occupations. "The ships that touched on the coast supplied the hunters with European commodities, for which they received in return, hides, tallow, and cured meat."

When the Spanish court complained to the different governments of Europe, of which these men were the natural subjects, it was answered: "That the people complained against, acted entirely on their own authority and responsibility, not as the subjects of any prince, and that the king of Spain was at liberty to proceed against them according to his own pleasure." But the lion-hearted Queen Isabella retorted more boldly. "That the Spaniards had drawn these inconveniences upon themselves, by their severe and unjust dealings in their American commerce; for she did not understand why either her subjects, or those of any other European prince, should be debared from traffic in the West Indies. That as she did not acknowledge the Spaniards to have any title by the donation of the bishop of Rome, so she knew no right they had to any places others than those they were in actual possession of; for that their having touched only here and there upon a coast, and given names to a few rivers and capes, were such insignificant things as could no ways entitle them to a property further than in the parts where they actually settled and continued to inhabit."

"The Brethren of the Coast" were first known by the general term of Libustic, which is supposed to be nothing but the French sailors' corruption of our word "freebooter." The origin of the term buccanier, by which they were afterwards designated, is of curious derivation.

"The flesh of the cattle killed by the hunters was cured to keep good for use, after a manner learned from the Caribbee Indians, which was as follows: the meat was laid to be dried upon a wooden grate or hurdle, which the Indians called barbecu, placed at a good distance over a slow fire. The meat when cured was called buccan, and the same name was given to the place of their cookery." From buccan they made the verb buccaner, which the Dictionnaire de Trévoux explains to be "to dry red, without salt," and then the noun Boucanier, quasi buccanier.

This curious association, that united the calling of hunters and cruisers, was held together by a very simple code of laws and regulations. It is said that every member of it had his chosen and declared comrade, between whom property was in common while they lived together, and when one of the two died, the other succeeded to whatever he possessed. This, however, was not a compulsory regulation, for the buccaniers were known at times to bequeath by will to their relatives or friends in Europe. There was a general right of participation insisted upon in certain things, among which was meat for present consumption and other necessities of life. It has even been said that bolts, locks, and every kind of fastening were prohibited as implying a doubt of "the honour of their vocation." Many men of respectable lineage became buccaniers, on which it was customary for them to drop their family name, and to assume a nom de guerre. "Some curious anecdotes," says Captain Burney, "are produced, to show the great respect some of them entertained for religion and morality. A certain libustic captain, named Daniel, shot one of his crew in the church, for behaving irreverently during the performance of mass. Ravenau de Lussan took the occupation of a buccanier, because he was in debt, and wished, as every honest man should do, to have wherewithal to satisfy his creditors."

In the year 1625 the English and French together took possession of the island of St. Christopher, and five years later of the small island of Tortuga, near the north-west of Hispaniola, which continued to be for some years the headquarters of the buccaniers, who, whenever the countries of which they were natives were at war with Spain, obtained commissions from Europe, and acted as regular privateers in the West Indies, and on the Spanish main.

In 1638, the Spaniards in great force surprised the island of Tortuga, while most of the adventurers were absent in Hispaniola engaged in the chase of cattle, and barbarously massacred all who fell into their hands. The Spaniards did not garrison the island. Soon after their departure, the buccaniers, to the numbers of three hundred, again took possession of Tortuga, and then for the first time elected a chief or commander.

As the hostility of the buccaniers was solely directed against the Spaniards, all other Europeans in those latitudes regarded them as champions in the common cause; and the severities which had been exercised against them increased the sympathy for them in the breasts of others, and inflamed their own hearts with the thirst of revenge. Their numbers were speedily recruited by English, French, and Dutch from all parts, and both the pursuits of hunting and cruising were followed with redoubled vigour. At this time, the French in particular seemed to pride themselves in the buccaniers, whom their writers styled "nos braves." The English contented themselves with speaking of their "unparalleled exploits."

About the middle of the seventeenth century, the French addicted themselves almost exclusively to hunting. Hispaniola was their great resort, and as the Spaniards found they could not expel them from that island, they themselves destroyed the cattle and wild hogs, in order to render the business of hunting unproductive. This drove the French to other branches of industry, equally opposed to the inclinations of the Spaniards; for finding the chase no longer profitable, they began to cultivate the soil and to cruise more than ever.

The extermination practised upon them by the Spaniards whenever they fell into their hands, seems to have been admitted as a standing and praiseworthy law among the latter people, while it naturally produced an equally sanguinary retaliation on the part of the adventurers. The cruelties of the Spaniards were much circulated in Europe in the form of popular stories, and produced a great effect. A Frenchman, a native of Languedoc, of the name of Montbars, on reading one of these stories, conceived such an implacable hatred against the Spaniards, that he went to the West Indies, joined the buccaniers, and pursued his vengeance with so much ardour and success, that he obtained the title of "The Exterminator."

Pierre, a native of Dieppe, whose name was graced with the adjunct of "Le Grand," was another famous French buccanier. In a boat with only twenty-eight men, he surprised and took the ship of the vice-admiral of the Spanish galleons, as she was sailing homeward with a rich freight. He did not, however, disgrace his exploit by massacre, for he set the Spanish crew on shore at Cape Thuron, and carried his prize safely to France.

A native of Portugal, styled Bartolomeo Portuguese, also rendered himself famous about this time for his numerous and wonderful escapes in battle and from the galleys.

"But," continues Captain Burney, "no one of the buccaniers hitherto named, arrived at so great a degree of notoriety as a Frenchman called François L'Olonnais. This man, and Michel le Basque, at the head of 650 men, took the towns of Maracaibo and Gibraltar, in the gulf of Venezuela. The booty they obtained by the plunder and ransom of these places was estimated at 400,000 crowns. The barbarities practised on the prisoners could not be exceeded. L'Olonnais was possessed with an ambition to make himself renowned for being terrible. At one time, it is said, he put the whole crew of a Spanish ship, ninety men, to death, performing himself the office of executioner, by beheading them. He caused the crews of four other vessels to be thrown into the sea; and more than once, in his frenzies, he tore out the hearts of his victims and devoured them! Yet this man had his enemies so much will loose notions concerning glory, aided by a little partiality, misled even sensible men. The career of this savage was terminated by the Indians of the coast of Darien, on which he had landed."

The buccaniers now became so formidable, that several Spanish towns submitted to pay them regular contributions. They were commanded at this time by one Mansvelt, whose country is unknown, but who was followed with equal alacrity by both French and English, and who seems to have been more provident and more ambitious than any chief who had preceded him. He formed a plan for founding an independent buccanier establishment, and at the head of five hundred men took the island of Santa Catalina for that purpose from the Spaniards, and garrisoned it with one hundred buccaniers, and all the slaves he had taken. A Welshman called Henry Morgan, was the second in command on this expedition. Mansvelt died of illness shortly after, when the garrison he had left was obliged to surrender to the Spaniards.

On the death of Mansvelt, Morgan became the chief, and the most fortunate leader of the buccaniers. A body of several hundred men placed themselves under his command, with whom he took and plundered the town of Puerto del Principe in Cuba. At this place a Frenchman was foully slain by an Englishman. All the French took to arms, but Morgan pacified them by putting the murderer in irons, and afterwards hanging him at Jamaica. Morgan, however, whom the old English author of "the Buccaniers of America" styles Sir Henry Morgan, did not respect the old proverb, of honour among thieves; in consequence of which, most of the French separated from him. Yet he was strong enough shortly after to attack Porto Bello, one of the best fortified places belonging to the Spaniards. His bravery and his wonderful address are overshadowed by the shocking cruelties he committed in this expedition. In the attack of a fort, he compelled a number of priests, monks, and nuns, his prisoners, to carry and plant the scaling ladders against the walls; and many of these poor creatures were killed by their countrymen who defended the fort. A castle that had made a bold resistance, on surrendering, was set on fire, and burned to the ground with the garrison within it. Many prisoners died under the tortures that Morgan inflicted on them, to make them discover concealed treasures, which frequently had no existence, save in the cupidity of his imagination.

In the brilliancy of this success, the French forgot Morgan's peccadilloes in money matters, and joined him again in great numbers. There was one large French buccanier ship, the commander and crew of which refused to act with him. The crafty Welshman dissembled his rage, and pressingly invited the French captain and his officers to dine on board his own ship. These guests he made his prisoners, and in their absence easily took their ship. The men he put in charge of this prize got drunk on the occasion, and the ship was suddenly blown up; whether from the drunkenness and carelessness of the English, or the direful revenge of some Frenchmen, remains matter of doubt. The number of the French prisoners is not mentioned, but it is said, that three hundred and fifty Englishmen perished with this ship, which was the largest of the fleet.

Morgan's next operation was an attack on Maracaibo and Gibraltar, which unfortunate towns were again sacked. These merciless desperadoes were accustomed to shut up their prisoners in churches, where it was easy to keep guard over them. At Maracaibo and Gibraltar, in this instance, so little care was taken of them, that many of these unfortunate captives were actually starved to death in the churches, whilst the buccaniers were reveling in their dwellings.

Morgan was near being destroyed on his return from these places, for the Spaniards had had time to put in order a castle at the entrance of the Lagune of Maracaibo, and three large men of war had arrived, and stationed themselves by the castle to cut off the pirate's retreat.

But the Welshman fitted up one of his vessels as a fire-ship, in which were stuck logs of wood, dressed with hats on to look like men, and which in every thing was made to bear the appearance of a common fighting ship. Following close in the rear of this mute crew, he saw two of the Spanish men of war blown up, and he took the third. He then passed the castle without loss, by means of a stratagem, by which he threw the stupid garrison off their guard. The value of the booty obtained was 250,000 pieces of eight.

The year after this expedition, (in July 1670,) a solemn treaty of peace, known in diplomacy under the name of the "Treaty of America," and made, in the view of terminating the buccanier warfare, and settling all disputes between the subjects of the two countries in the western hemisphere, was concluded between Great Britain and Spain. But the buccaniers cared nothing for treaties, and would not be pacified. On the contrary, as soon as the news of the peace reached them, they resolved, as of one accord, to undertake some grand expedition, of which the skillful Morgan should have the command. In the beginning of December 1670, thirty-seven vessels, having on board altogether more than two thousand men, joined the Welshman at Cape Tibouron, the place of general rendezvous he had himself appointed. Lots were then cast as to which of the three places, Carthagena, Vera Cruz, and Panama, should be attacked. The lot fell upon Panama, which was believed to be the richest of the three.

Preparatory to this arduous undertaking, Morgan employed men to hunt cattle and cure meat, and sent vessels to procure maize, at the settlements on the main. For the distribution of the plunder they were to obtain, specific articles of agreement were drawn up and subscribed to. Morgan, as commander in chief, was to receive one hundredth part of the whole; each captain was to have eight shares; those who should be maimed and wounded were provided for, and additional rewards promised for those who should, particularly distinguish themselves by their bravery and conduct. On the 16th of December, the fleet set sail, and on the 20th they retook the island of Santa Catalina, which Morgan, who had embraced the notion of Mansvelt to erect himself into the head of a free state, independent of any European nation, resolved should be the centre of its establishment and power. The buccaneers next took the castle of San Lorenzo, at the entrance of the river Chagre, on the West India side of the American isthmus, losing one hundred men in killed, and having seventy wounded. Of three hundred and fourteen Spaniards who composed the garrison, more than two hundred were put to death.

Morgan had now a piéd-à-terre, and a good place of retreat on one side of the wild and perilous isthmus; he accordingly set his prisoners to work to repair and strengthen the castle of San Lorenzo, where he left five hundred men as a garrison, besides one hundred and fifty men to take care of the ships which were left in the Atlantic, while he should go to the shores of the Pacific. It was on the 18th of January 1671, that he set forward at the head of twelve hundred men for Panama. The length of the march from ocean to ocean was not long, but rendered tremendous by the nature of the intervening country and the wildness of its Indian inhabitants. One party of this pirate army, with artillery and stores, embarked in canoes, to ascend the river Chagre, the course of which is very serpentine. At the end of the second day they were obliged to quit their canoes, for a vast number of fallen trees obstructed them, and the river was found in many places almost dry; but the way by land offered so many difficulties to the carriage of their stores, that they again resorted to their canoes, where they could, making very little way. On the sixth day, when they had nearly exhausted their travelling store of provision, and death by hunger in that horrid wilderness stared them in the face, they had the good fortune to discover a barn full of maize. The native Indians fled at their approach, and could never be caught. On the seventh day they reached a village called Cruz, which was set on fire and abandoned by its inhabitants, who fled as the buccaneers approached. They, however, found there a sack of bread and fifteen jars of Peruvian wine. They were still eight leagues distant from Panama. On the ninth day of the journey, they saw the expanse of the South Sea before them, and around them some fields with cattle grazing. As evening approached, they came in sight of the church towers of Panama, when they halted and waited impatiently for the morrow. They had lost in their march thus far, by being fired at from concealed places, ten men; and had ten more wounded.

The city of Panama is said to have consisted at that time of seven thousand houses, many of which were edifices of considerable magnificence and built with cedar; but no regular fortifications defended the wealth and magnificence of the place. Some works had been raised, but in most parts the city lay open, and was to be won and defended by plain fighting. The buccaneers asserted that the Spaniards had a force amounting to two thousand infantry and four hundred horse; but it is supposed that this was in part made up of inhabitants and slaves.

When the buccaneers resumed their march at an early hour next morning, the Spaniards came out to meet them, preceded by herds of wild bulls, which they drove upon the adventurers to disorder their ranks. But the buccaneers, as hunters of these wild animals, were too well acquainted with their habits to be decomposed by them; and this attack of the van does not seem to have had much effect. The Spaniards, however, must have made an obstinate resistance, for it was night before they gave way, and the buccaneers became masters of the city. During the long battle, and, indeed, all that day and night, the buccaneers gave no quarter. Six hundred Spaniards fell. The loss of the buccaneers is not specified, but it appears to have been very considerable.

When master of the city, Morgan was afraid that his men might get drunk and be surprised and cut off by the Spaniards: to prevent this, he caused it to be reported that all the wine in the city had been expressly poisoned by the inhabitants. The dread of poison kept the fellows sober. But Morgan had secretly taken up his quarters in Panama when several parts of the city burst into flames, which, fed by the cedar wood and other combustible materials of which the houses were chiefly built, spread so rapidly, that in a short time a great part of the city was burnt to the ground. It has been disputed whether this was done by design or accident—by the buccaneers or the despairing Spaniards; but it appears that Morgan, who always charged it upon the Spaniards, gave all the assistance he could to such of the inhabitants as endeavoured to stop the progress of the fire, which, however, was not quite extinguished for weeks. Among the buildings destroyed, was a factory house belonging to the Genoece, who then carried on the trade of supplying the Spaniards with slaves from Africa.

The licentiousness, rapacity, and cruelty of the buccaneers had no bounds. "They spared," says Esquemelin, a Dutchman, and one of the party, "in these their cruelties, no sex nor condition whatsoever. As to religious persons (monks and nuns, he means) and priests, they granted them less quarter than others, unless they procured a considerable sum of money for their ransom." Detachments scoured the country to plunder and to bring in prisoners. Many of the unfortunate inhabitants escaped with their effects by sea, and reached the islands that are thickly clustered in the bay of Panama. But Morgan found a large boat lying aground in the port, which he launched and manned with a numerous crew, and sent her to cruise among those islands. A galley, on board which the nuns of a convent had taken refuge, and where much money, plate, and other effects of value had been lodged, had a very narrow escape from these desperadoes. They took several vessels in the bay. One of them was large and admirably adapted for cruising. This opened a new prospect, that was brilliant and enticing; an unexplored ocean studded with islands was before them, and some of the buccaneers began to consult how they might leave their chief, Morgan, and try their fortunes on the South Sea, whence they proposed to sail, with the plunder they should obtain, by the East Indies to Europe. This diminution of force would have been fatal to Morgan, who, therefore, as soon as he got a hint of the design, cut away the masts of the ship, and burned every boat and vessel lying at Panama that could suit their purpose.

At length, on the 24th of February 1672, about four weeks after the taking of Panama, Morgan and his men departed from the still smouldering ruins of that unfortunate city, taking with them one hundred and seventy-five mules loaded with spoil, and six hundred prisoners, part of whom were detained to carry burdens across the isthmus, and others for the ransom expected for their release. Among the latter were many women and children, who were made to suffer cruel fatigue, hunger, and thirst, and artfully made to apprehend being carried to Jamaica and sold as slaves, that they might the more earnestly endeavour to procure money for their ransom. When these poor creatures threw themselves on their knees, and weeping and tearing their hair, begged of Morgan to let them return to their families, his brutal answer was, that "he came not there to listen to cries and lamentations, but to seek money." This idol of his soul, indeed, he sought from his comrades as well as his captives, and in such a manner that it is astonishing they did not blow his brains out. In the middle of his march back to the fort of San Lorenzo, he drew up his men, and caused every one of them to take a solemn oath, that he had not reserved for himself or concealed any plunder, or had delivered all himself into the common stock. (This ceremony, it appears, was not uncommon among the buccaneers.) "But," says Esquemelin, "Captain Morgan having had experience that those loose fellows would not much stickle to swear falsely in such a case, he commanded every one to be searched; and that it might not be taken as an affront, he permitted himself to be the first searched, even to the very soles of his shoes. The French buccaneers who had engaged in this expedition with Morgan, were not well satisfied with this new custom of searching; but their number being less than that of the English, they were forced to submit."

As soon as the marauders arrived at San Lorenzo, a division was made of the booty, according to the proportions agreed upon before sailing from Hispaniola. But the narrative says, "Every person received his portion, or rather what part thereof Captain Morgan was pleased to give him. For so it was, that his companions, even those of his own nation, complained of his proceedings; for they judged it impossible that, of so many valuable robberies, no greater share should belong to them than two hundred pieces of eight per head. But Captain Morgan was deaf to these, and to many other complaints of the same kind."

Morgan, however, having well filled his own purse, determined to withdraw quietly from the command: "Which he did," says the narrative of the buccaneer, "without calling any council, or bidding any one adieu; but went secretly on board his own ship, and put out to sea without giving notice, being followed only by three or four vessels of the whole fleet, who, it is believed, went shares with him in the greatest part of the spoil."

The rest of the buccaneer vessels left before the castle of San Lorenzo at Chagre, soon separated. Morgan sailed straight to Jamaica, where he had begun to make fresh levies of men to accompany him to the island of St. Catalina, which he purposed to hold as his own independent state, and to make it a common place of refuge for pirates; but the arrival of a new governor at Jamaica, Lord John Vaughan, with strict orders to enforce the late treaty with Spain, obliged him to abandon his plan.*

The buccaneers, however, were not put down by this new governor of Jamaica, but under different leaders continued their depredations for more than twenty years longer. Lord John Vaughan proclaimed a pardon for all piratical offences committed to that time, and promised a grant of thirty-five acres of land to every buccaneer who should claim the benefit of the proclamation and engage to apply himself to planting. I am startled almost to incredulity by what follows.

"The author of the History of Jamaica says, 'This offer was intended as a lure to engage the buccaneers to come into port with their effects, that the governor might, and which he was directed to do, take from them the tenths and the fifteenths of their body as the dues of the crown, and of the colonial government for granting them commissions.' Those who had neglected to obtain commissions would of course have to make their peace by an increased composition. In consequence of this scandalous procedure, the Jamaica buccaneers, to avoid being so taxed, kept aloof from Jamaica, and were provoked to continue their old occupations. Most of them joined the French filibusters at Tortuga. Some were afterwards apprehended at Jamaica, where they were brought to trial, condemned as pirates and executed."

A war entered into by the English and French against the Dutch, gave, for a time, employment to the buccaneers and filibusters, and a short respite to the Spaniards, who, however, exercised their wonted barbarous revenge on their old enemies, whenever and in whatever manner they fell into their hands.

In 1673, for example, they murdered in cold blood three hundred French filibusters, who had been shipwrecked on their coast at Porto Rico, sparing only seventeen of their officers. These officers were put on board a vessel bound for the continent, with the intention of transporting them to Peru; but an English buccaneer cruiser met the ship at sea, liberated the Frenchmen, and, in all probability cut the throats of the Spaniards.

Ever since the plundering of Panama by Morgan, the imaginations of the buccaneers had been heated by the prospect of expeditions to the South Sea. This became known to the Spaniards, and gave rise to numerous forebodings and prophecies, both in Spain and in Peru, of great invasions by sea and by land.

In 1673 an Englishman of the name of Thomas Peeche, who had formerly been a buccaneer in the West Indies, fitted out a ship in England for a piratical voyage to the South Sea against the Spaniards; and two years after, La Sound, a Frenchman, with a small body of daring adventurers, attempted to cross the Isthmus, as Morgan had done, (though not by the same route,) but he could not get farther than the town of Cheapo, where he was driven back. These events greatly increased the alarm of the Spaniards, who, according to Dampier, prophesied with confidence "that the English privateers in the West

* This audacious and barbarous overture went to England, where he so ingratiated himself with King Charles II. and with his ministers, that he received the honour of knighthood and the appointment of commissioner of the admiralty court in Jamaica. In 1675 the Earl of Sandwich, then governor of that island, returned to England with the plea of bad health, and left as deputy governor, Morgan the buccaneer, the plunderer of Panama, but who was now in reality Sir Henry Morgan. In his new capacity he was far from being favourable or lenient to his old associates, "sought of whom suffered the extreme hardship of being tried and hanged under his authority." Morgan was certainly a villain of the first water, for which a crew of buccaneers, most of whom were his countrymen, fell into his hands, he delivered them over the West Indies, and he was strongly suspected of having sold them to the vindictive Spaniards. His "brief authority" only lasted till the next year, when he was superseded by the arrival of a new governor from England. He continued, however, to hold office in Jamaica during the first of the moral reign of Charles II. though accused by the Spaniards of conniving with the buccaneers. In the next reign the Spanish court had influence sufficient to procure his being sent home prisoner from the West Indies. He was kept in prison three years, but no charge being brought forward against him, the worthy knight was liberated.

Indies would that year (1675) open a door into the South Sea."

But it was not till five years after, or in 1680, when, having contracted friendship with the Darien Indians, and particularly with a small tribe called the Mosquitos, the English adventurers again found their way across the Isthmus to those alarmed shores. Some of these Mosquito Indians, who seem to have been a noble race of savages deserving of better companions than the buccaners, went with this party, being animated by a deadly hatred of the Spaniards, and an extraordinary attachment to the English.

The buccaners who engaged in this expedition were the crews of seven vessels, amounting altogether to three hundred and sixty-six men, of whom thirty-seven were left to guard the ships during the absence of those who went on the expedition, which was not expected to be of long continuance. There were several men of some literary talent among the marauders, who have written accounts of the proceedings, which have the most romantic interest. These were Basil Ringrose, Barty Sharp, William Dampier, who, though a common seaman, was endowed with great observation and a talent for description, and Lionel Wafer, a surgeon providently engaged by the buccaners, whose "Description of the Isthmus of Darien" is one of the most instructive, and decidedly the most amusing book of travels we have in our language.

It was on the 16th of April, that the expedition passed over from Golden Island, and landed in Darien, each man provided with four cakes of bread called dough-boys, with a fusil, a pistol, and a hanger. They began their arduous march marshalled in divisions, each with its commander and distinguishing flag. Many Darien Indians came to supply them with provisions, and to keep them company as confederates; among these were two chiefs, who went by the names of Captain Andreas and Captain Antonio.

The very first day's journey discouraged four of the buccaners, who returned to their ships. The object of the expedition was to reach and plunder the town of Santa Maria, near the gulf of San Miguel, on the South Sea side of the isthmus; and on the afternoon of the second day they came to a river, which Captain Andreas, the Indian chief, told them, crossed the isthmus and ran by Santa Maria. On the third day they came to a house belonging to a son of Captain Andreas, who wore a wreath of gold about his head, which made the buccaners call him "King Golden Cap."

Wherever there were Indian habitations, they were most kindly and hospitably received. On the evening of the fourth day, they gained a point whence the river of Santa Maria was navigable, and where canoes were prepared for them. The next morning as they were about to depart, the harmony of the party was disturbed by the quarrel of two of the buccaner commanders. John Coxon fired his musket at Peter Harris, which Harris was going to return, when the others interfered and effected a reconciliation. Here seventy of the buccaners embarked in fourteen canoes, in each of which there went two Indians to manage them, and guide them down the stream. This mode of travelling, owing to the scarcity of water and other impediments, was as wearisome as marching. After enduring tremendous fatigue, the land and water party met on the eighth day of the journey at a beachy point of land, where the river, being joined by another stream, became broad and deep. This had often been a rendezvous of the Darien Indians, when they collected for attack or defence against the Spaniards; and here the whole party now made a halt, to rest themselves, and to clean and prepare their arms.

On the ninth day, buccaners and Indians, in all nearly six hundred men, embarked in sixty-eight canoes, got together by the Indians, and glided pleasantly down the river.

At midnight they landed within a half a mile of the town of Santa Maria. The next morning, at day-break, they heard the Spanish garrison firing muskets and beating the réveille. It was seven in the morning when they came to the open ground before the fort, when the Spaniards commenced firing upon them. This fort was nothing but a stockade, which the buccaners took without the loss of a single man—an immunity which did not teach them mercy, for they killed twenty-six Spaniards, and wounded sixteen.

The Indians, however, were still less merciful. After the Spaniards had surrendered, they took many of them into the adjoining woods, where they killed them with their spears, and if the buccaners had not prevented them, they would not have left a single Spaniard alive. The long and bloody grievances these savages had scored against their conquerors, was aggravated here by the circumstance that one of their chiefs, or, as the buccaneers call him, the King of Darien, found in the fort his eldest daughter, who had been forced from her father's habitation by one of the Spanish garrison, and was pregnant by him!

The Spaniards had by some means been warned of the intended visit to Santa Maria, and had secreted or sent away almost every thing that was of value. "Though we examined our prisoners severely," says a buccaner, "the whole that we could pillage, both in the town and fort, amounted only to twenty pounds' weight of gold, and a small quantity of silver; whereas, three days sooner we should have found three hundred pounds weight in gold in the fort." It ought to be mentioned, that the Spaniards were in the habit of collecting considerable quantities of gold from the mountains in the neighbourhood of Santa Maria.

This disappointment was felt very severely, and whether it was previously decided, or now entered their heads to seek compensation for this disappointment, the majority of the buccaners resolved to proceed to the South Sea. The boldness of this resolution will be felt by reflecting, that they had only canoes to go in, and that they might meet at their very outset a lofty Spanish galcon or ship of war, that might sink half of their frail boats at a broadside. Some of them, indeed, were deterred by this prospect. John Coxon, the commander, who had fired his musket at Peter Harris, and who seems to have been a contemptible bully, was for returning across the isthmus to their ships, and so were his followers. To win him over, those who were for the South Sea, though they had a mean opinion of his capability, offered him the post of general, or commander in chief, which Coxon accepted, and it was on the condition that he and his men should join in the scheme, all the buccaners went together. The Darien chief Andreas, with his son Golden Cap, and some followers, also continued with the rovers, but the greater part of the Darien Indians left them at Santa Maria, and returned to their homes.

On the 17th of April, the expedition embarked, and fell down the river to the gulf of San Miguel, which they did not reach until the following morning, owing to a flood tide. They were now fairly in the South Sea! The prophecy of the Spaniards was accomplished, and the buccaners looked across that magnificent expanse of waters with sanguine hope. On the 19th of April, they entered the vast bay of Panama, and fortunately captured at one of the islands, a Spanish vessel of thirty tons, on board of which one hundred and thirty of the buccaners immediately threw themselves, overjoyed to be relieved from the cramped and crowded state they had endured in the canoes—though of a certainty, even now, so many men on board so small a vessel, could leave small room for comfort.

The next day, they took another small bark. On the 22d, they rendezvoused at the island of Chepillo, near the mouth of the river Chapiro; and in the afternoon began to row along shore from that island towards the city of Panama. The Spaniards there had obtained intelligence of the buccaners being in the bay, and prepared to meet them. Eight vessels were lying in the road; three of these they hastily equipped, manning them with the crews of all the vessels, and with men from shore; the whole, however, according to the buccaner accounts, not exceeding two hundred and thirty men; and of these, one third only were Europeans—the rest mulattoes and negroes. The great disparity therefore was in the nature of the vessels. "We had sent away the Spanish barks we had taken," says one of the buccaners, "to seek fresh water, so that we had only canoes for the fight, and in them not two hundred men."

As this fleet of canoes came in sight at day break on the 23d, the three armed Spanish ships got under sail, and stood towards them. The conflict was severe, and lasted the greater part of the day. The Spanish ships fought with great bravery, but their crews were motley and unskilful, whilst the buccaners were expert seamen, and well trained to the use of their arms. Richard Sawkins was the hero of the day; after three repulses, he succeeded in boarding and capturing one of the Spanish ships, which decided the victory. Another ship was carried by boarding soon after, and the third saved herself by flight. The Spanish commander fell with many of his people. The buccaners had eighteen killed, and above thirty wounded. Peter Harris, the captain, who had been fired at by Coxon, was among the wounded, and died two days after. As for John Coxon, who was nominally general, he showed great backwardness in the engagement, which lost him the confidence of the rovers. The Darien chiefs were in the heat of the battle, and behaved bravely.

The buccaners, not thinking themselves strong enough to land and attack Panama, contented themselves with capturing the vessels that were at anchor in the road before the city. One of these was a ship named the Trinidad, of 400 tons burden, a fast sailer and in good condition. She had on board a cargo principally consisting of wine, sugar, and sweetmeats; and, moreover, a considerable sum of money was found. In the other prizes they found flour and ammunition. Two of these, with the Trinidad, they fitted out for cruising.

Thus, in less than a week after their arrival on the coast of the South Sea, they were in possession of a fleet not ill equipped, with which they formed a close blockade of Panama for the present, and for the future might scour that ocean.

Two or three days after the battle with the Spaniards, discord broke out among the buccaners. The taunts and reflections that fell upon the General, Coxon, and some of his followers, determined him and seventy men to return, by the way they had come, across the isthmus to the Atlantic. The Darien chiefs, Andreas and Antonio, also departed for their homes, but Andreas, to prove his good will to the buccaners, who remained in the South Sea, left a son and one of his nephews with them.

Richard Sawkins, who had behaved so well in the battle, was now unanimously chosen general or chief commander. After staying ten days before Panama, they retired to the island of Taboga, in the near neighbourhood. Here they stopped nearly a fortnight in expectation of the arrival of a rich ship from Lima. This ship came not, but several other vessels fell into their hands, by which they obtained nearly sixty thousand dollars in specie, 1200 sacks of flour, 2000 jars of wine, a quantity of brandy, sugar, sweetmeats, poultry, and other provisions, some gunpowder, shot, &c. Among their prisoners was a number of unfortunate negro slaves, which tempted the Spanish merchants of Panama to go to the buccaners, and to buy as many of the slaves as they were inclined to sell. These merchants paid two hundred pieces of eight for every negro, and they sold to the buccaners all such stores and commodities as they stood in need of.

Ringrose, one of the buccaners, relates that during these communications the governor of Panama sent to demand of their leader, "Why, during a time of peace between England and Spain, Englishmen should come into those seas to commit injury? and from whom they had their commission so to do?" Sawkins replied, "That he and his companions came to assist their friend, the king of Darien, (the said chief Andreas), who was the rightful lord of Panama, and all the country thereabouts. That as they had come so far, it was reasonable that they should receive some satisfaction for their trouble; and if the governor would send to them 500 pieces of eight for each man, and 1000 for each commander, and would promise not any further to annoy the Darien Indians, their allies, that then the buccaners would desist from hostilities, and go quietly about their business." The governor could scarcely be expected to comply with these moderate demands.

The General Sawkins, having learnt from one of the Spaniards who traded with the buccaners, that the bishop of Panama was a person whom he had formerly taken prisoner in the West Indies, sent him a small present as a token of regard and old acquaintanceship: the bishop in return sent Sawkins a gold ring!

Having consumed all the live stock within reach, and tired of waiting for the rich ship from Peru, the buccaners sailed on the 5th of May to the island of Otoko, where they found food and poultry, and rested a day. From Otoko they departed with three ships and two small barks, steering out of the bay of Panama, and then westward for the town of Pueblo Nuevo. In this short voyage a violent storm separated from the ships the two barks, which never joined them again. One of them was taken by the Spaniards, who shot the men; and the crew of the other contrived to reach Coxon's party, and to recross the isthmus with them. On reaching Pueblo Nuevo, the buccaners, instead of meeting with an easy prize, sustained a complete discomfiture, and lost their brave commander Sawkins, who was shot dead by the Spaniards, as he was advancing at the head of his men towards a breastwork. "Captain Sawkins," said his comrade Ringrose, "was a valiant and generous spirited man, and beloved more than any other we ever had among us, which he well deserved." His loss not only disheartened the whole, but induced between sixty and seventy men, and all the Darien Indians, to abandon the expedition and return to the isthmus.

Only one hundred and forty-six buccaners now remained with Bartholomew Sharp, whom they had chosen commander, but who, though clerk enough to write and publish, on his return to England, a very readable account of his adventures, did not at first shine as a leader. In their retreat from Pueblo Nuevo, they took a ship loaded with indigo, butter, and pitch, and burned two others. They lay at anchor for some time at the island of Quibo, where they pleasantly and profitably employed their time in taking "red deer, turtle, and oysters, so large, says Ringrose, that they were obliged to cut them into four quarters, each quarter being a good mouthful."

On the 6th of June, Sharp, who had boasted he would "take them a cruise, whereby he doubted not they would gain a thousand pounds per man," sailed with two ships for the coast of Peru. But on the 17th he came to anchor at the island of Gorgona, where the buccaneers idled away their time till near the end of July, doing nothing worthy of mention, except killing "a snake eleven feet long, and fourteen inches in circumference."

On the 13th of August they got as far as the island of Plata, where Sharp again came to anchor. From Plata they beat to the south, and on the 25th, when near Cape St. Elena, they captured, after a short contest, in which one buccaneer was killed and two were wounded, a Spanish ship bound for Panama. In this prize they gained 3000 dollars. The ship they sank, but it is not said what they did with the crew; as, however, Ringrose makes particular mention that they "punished a friar and shot him upon deck, casting him overboard while he was yet alive," it is to be presumed he was the only sufferer, and that the crew were kept to work as seamen or servants, or in hopes that they might be ransomed, or merely until some convenient opportunity were found for dismissing them.

One of the two vessels in which the buccaneers cruised, was now found to sail so badly, that she was abandoned, and they all embarked together in the Trinidad. On the 4th of September, they took another ship bound for Lima. It appears here to have been a custom among the buccaneers, that the first who boarded, should be allowed some extra privilege of plunder; for Ringrose says, "we cast dice for the first entrance, and the lot fell to the larboard watch, so twenty men belonging to that watch entered her." They took out of this prize as much of the cargo as suited them; they then put some of their prisoners in her, and dismissed her with only one mast standing and one sail.

Sharp passed Callao at a distance, fearing the Spaniards might have ships of war there. On the 26th of October, he attempted a landing at the town of Arica, but was prevented by a heavy surf, and the armed appearance of the place. This was the more mortifying, as the stock of fresh water was so reduced, that the men were only allowed half a pint a day each; and it is related, that a pint of water was sold in the ship for thirty dollars. They bore away, however, for the island of Llo, where they succeeded in landing, and obtained water, wine, flour, fruit, and other provisions, and did all the mischief they could to the houses and plantations, because the Spaniards refused to purchase their forbearance either with money or cattle.

From Llo, keeping still southward, they came, on the 3d of December, to the town of La Serena, which they took without opposition. They here obtained, besides other things, five hundred pounds weight of silver, but were very near having their ship burned by a desperate Spaniard, who went by night on a boat made of a horse's hide, blown up like a bladder, and crammed with powder and brimstone, and other combustible matters between the rudder and the stern-post, to which he set fire by a match, and then escaped. From La Serena, the buccaneers made for Juan Fernandez, at which interesting, romantic island, they arrived on Christmas day, and remained some time. Here they again disagreed, some of them wishing to sail immediately homeward by the strait of Magalhães, and others desiring to try their fortunes longer in the South Sea. Sharp was of the homeward party; but the majority being against him, deposed him from the command, and elected in his stead, John Watling, "an old privateer, and esteemed a stout seaman." Articles between Watling and the crew were drawn up in writing, and subscribed in due form.

One narrative, however, says, "the true occasion of the grudge against Sharp was, that he had got by these adventures almost a thousand pounds, whereas many of our men were scarce worth a groat; and good reason there was for their poverty, for at the Isle of Plata, and other places, they had lost all their money to their fellow buccaneers at dice; so that some had a great deal, and others just nothing. Those who were thrifty, sided with captain Sharp, but the others, being the greatest number, turned Sharp out of his command; and Sharp's party were persuaded to have patience, seeing they were the fewest, and had money to lose, which the other party had not." But Dampier says, Sharp was dismissed the command by general consent, the buccaneers being satisfied neither with his courage nor his conduct.

John Watling, as Richard Sawkins before him, had a glimmering of devotion in his composition. He began his command by insisting on the observance of the Lord's day by the buccaneers. "This day, January the 9th, 1681," says Ringrose, "was the first Sunday that ever we kept by command, since the loss and death of our valiant commander Captain Sawkins, who once threw the dice overboard, finding them in use on the said day." On the 12th of January, they were scared away from their anchorage at Juan Fernandez, by the appearance of three sail, and left behind them on shore, William, a Musquito Indian.

The three vessels, whose appearance had caused them to move in such a hurry, were armed Spanish ships. They remained in sight two days, but showed no inclination to fight. The buccaneers had not a single great gun in their ship, and must have trusted to their gunnery and to boarding; yet it seems they must have contemplated making an attack themselves, as they remained so long without resigning the honour of the field to the Spaniards. They then sailed eastward for the coast of the continent, where they intended to attack the rich town of Arica.

On the 26th of January, they made the small island of Yunque, about twenty-five leagues from Arica, where they plundered an Indian village of provisions, and made prisoners of two old Spaniards and two Indians. The next day Watling examined one of the old Spaniards, concerning the force at Arica, and taking offence at his answer ordered him to be shot—which was done! Shortly after, he took a small bark, laden with fresh water for the little island, which was destitute of it.

The next night Watling, with one hundred men, left the ship in the boats and the small bark they had taken, and rowed for Arica. They landed on the continent about five leagues to the south of Arica before it was light, and remained there all day concealed among the rocks. When the shades of night fell, they crept along the coast without being perceived, and at the next morning dawn Watling landed with ninety-two men. They were still four miles from the town, but they marched boldly and rapidly forward, and gained an entrance with the loss of three men killed and two wounded. Though in possession of the town, Watling neglected a fort or little castle, and when he had lost time and was hampered by the number of prisoners he had made for the sake of their ransoms, and the inhabitants had recovered from their first panic, and had thrown themselves into the fort, he found that place too strong for him. He attacked it, however, making use of the cruel expedient of placing his prisoners in the front of his own men; but the defenders of the fort, though they might kill countrymen, friends and relatives, were not by this deterred, but kept up a steady fire, and twice repulsed the buccaneers. Meanwhile the Spaniards outside of the fort, made head from all parts, and hemmed in the buccaneers, who, from assaults, found themselves obliged to look for their own defence and retreat. Watling paid for his imprudence with his life, and two quarter-masters, the boatswain, and some of the best men among the rowers, fell before the fort. When the rest withdrew from the town, and made for their boats, they were harassed the whole way by a distant firing from the Spaniards, but they effected their retreat in tolerably good order. The whole party, however, narrowly escaped destruction; for the Spaniards had forced from the prisoners they took, the signals which had been agreed upon with the men left four miles off in charge of the buccaneer boats; and having made these signals, the boats had quitted their post, to which the rowers were now retreating, and were setting sail to run down to the town, when the most swift of foot of the band reached the sea-side just in time to call them back. They embarked in the greatest hurry and ran for their ships, too much disheartened to attempt to capture three vessels that lay at anchor in the roads.

In this mismanaged attack on Arica, the buccaneers lost between killed and taken, twenty-eight men, besides having eighteen wounded. Among the prisoners taken by the Spaniards, were two surgeons, to whom had been confided the care of the wounded. "We could have brought off our doctors," says Ringrose, "but they got too drinking while we were assaulting the fort, and when we called to them, they would not come. The Spaniards gave quarter to the surgeons, they being able to do them good service in that country; but as to the wounded men taken prisoners, they were all knocked on the head!"

The deposed chief, Barty Sharp, was now reinstated in the command, being esteemed a leader of safer conduct than any other. It was unanimously agreed to quit the South Sea, which they proposed to do, not by sailing round the American continent by the strait of Magalhães, but by recrossing the isthmus of Darien. They did not, however, immediately alter their course, but still beating to the south, landed on the 10th of March at Guasco, whence they carried off one hundred and twenty sheep, eighty goats, two hundred bushels of corn, and a plentiful supply of fresh water. They then stood to the north, and on the 27th passed Arica at a respectful distance: "our former entertainment," says one of the buccaneers, "having been so very bad, that we were no ways encouraged to stop there again."

By the 16th of April, however, when they were near the island Plata, where on a former occasion many of them "had lost their money to their fellow buccaneers at dice," the spirits of some of the crew had so much revived, that they were again willing to try their fortunes longer in the South Sea. But one party would not continue under Sharp, and others would not recognise a new commander. As neither party would yield, it was determined to separate, and agreed, "that which party soever upon polling should be found to have the majority should keep the ship." Sharp's party proved the most numerous, and they kept the vessel. The minority, which consisted of forty-four Europeans, two Mosquito Indians, and a Spanish Indian, took the long boat and the canoes, as had been agreed, and separating from their old comrades, proceeded to the gulf of San Miguel, where they landed, and travelled on foot over the isthmus by much the same route as they had come. From the Atlantic side of the isthmus they found their way to the West Indies. In this second party were the two authors, William Dampier and Lionel Wafer, the surgeon. Dampier published a brief sketch of this Expedition to the South Sea, with an account of his return across the isthmus; but of the latter the most entertaining description was written by Wafer, who, meeting with an accident on his journey back, which disabled him from keeping pace with his countrymen, was left behind, and remained for some months the guest of the Darien Indians. Living among them as he did, he had ample opportunity of informing himself of all their manners and customs, and I know no book that gives so complete and amusing a picture of the habits of savage life, unless it be the volume on the New Zealanders, published by the "Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge."

Sharp, with his diminished crew, which must have been reduced to about seventy men, sailed with the ship northward to the gulf of Nicoya. Meeting no booty there, he returned to the island Plata, picking up three prizes in his way. The first was a ship called the San Pedro, with a lading of cocoa-nuts, and 21,000 pieces of eight in chests, and 16,000 in bags, besides plate. The money in bags, with all the loose plunder, was immediately divided, each man receiving two hundred and thirty-four pieces of eight. The money in chests was reserved for a future division. Their second prize was a packet from Panama bound to Callao, by which they learned that in Panama it was believed that all the buccaneers had returned over land to the West Indies. The third was a ship called the San Rosario, which made a bold resistance, and did not submit until her captain was killed. She came from Callao with a cargo of wine, brandy, oil, and fruit, and had in her as much money as yielded ninety-four dollars to each buccaneer. Through their ignorance of metals they missed a much greater booty. There were seven hundred pigs of plate which they mistook for tin, on account of its not being refined and fitted for coining. They only took one of the seven hundred pigs, and two thirds of this they melted down into bullets and otherwise squandered away. After having beaten along the coast, coming at times to anchor, making a few discoveries, and giving names to islands and bays, but taking no prizes, they sailed early in November from the shores of Patagonia. Their navigation hence, as Captain Barney remarks, was more than could be imagined: it was like the journey of travellers by night in a strange country without a guide. The weather being very stormy, they were afraid to venture through the strait of Magalhães, but ran to the south to go round the Tierra del Fuego. Spite of tempests, clouds, and darkness, and immense ice-bergs, they doubled in safety the redoubtable Cape Horn, nine months after their comrades, who went back by the isthmus of Darien, had left them.

On the 5th of December they made a division of such of their spoils as had been reserved. Each man's share amounted to three hundred and twenty-eight pieces of eight.

On January the 28th, 1682, they made the island of Barbadoes, where the British frigate Richmond was lying. "We having acted in all our voyage without a commission," says Rincoso, "dared not be so bold as to put in, lest the said frigate should seize us for privateering, and strip us of all we had got in the whole voyage." They, therefore, sailed to Antigua. People may say what they choose about the virtues of old times! It is a notorious fact that statesmen and the servants of government were in those days corrupt, rapacious, dishonest. It seems to have been an established practice among the buccaners to purchase impunity by bribing our governors of the West India islands. But at Antigua, Sharp now found, as Governor, Colonel Codrington, an honest man, who would not allow his lady to accept of a present of jewels sent by the buccaners as a propitiatory offering, nor give the buccaners leave to enter the harbour. The buccaners then separated. Some stole into Antigua on board of other craft; Sharp and some others landed at Nevis, whence they procured a passage to England. Their ship, the Trinidad, which they had captured in the Bay of Panama, was left to seven desperadoes of the company, who having lost every farthing by gaining, had no inducement to lead them to England, but remained where they were, in the hope of picking up new associates, with whom they might again try their fortunes as free rovers.

When Bartholomew Sharp arrived in England, he and a few of his men were apprehended and brought before a court of admiralty, where, at the instance of the Spanish ambassador, they were tried for piracy in the South Sea. One of the principal charges against them was taking the Spanish ship Rosario, and killing the captain and one of her men. "But it was proved," says the author of an anonymous narrative, who was one of the buccaners tried, "that the Spaniards fired at us first, and it was judged that we ought to defend ourselves." I can hardly understand how it should have been so, but it is said, from the general defectiveness of the evidence produced, they all escaped conviction.

Three of Sharp's men were also tried at Jamaica, one of whom, being wheeled into an open confession, was condemned and hanged; the other two stood it out, and escaped for want of witnesses to prove the fact against them.

"Thus terminated," adds Captain Burney, "what may be called the First Expedition of the buccaners in the South Sea; the boat excursion by Morgan's men in the Bay of Panama being of too little consequence to be so reckoned. They had now made successful experiments of the route both by sea and land; and the Spaniards in the South Sea had reason to apprehend a speedy renewal of their visit."

And indeed their visit was repeated the very next year. "On August the 23d, 1683," says William Dampier, who had not had enough of his first expedition, "we sailed from Virginia, under the command of Captain Cook, bound for the South Seas." Their adventurous, dangerous mode of life must have had strong charms for them, for besides Dampier and Cook, Lionel Wafer, Edward Davis, and Ambrose Cowley, went for the second time, and indeed nearly all of their crew, amounting to about seventy men, were old buccaners.

Their ship was called the Revenge, and mounted eighteen guns: an immense superiority over the craft with which they had already scoured those seas, and which had not even a single large gun on board.

Quite enough has been said to give the reader a notion of the mode of proceeding and living of these marauders. Without including an account of the discoveries they made in the South Sea, and the additions Dampier and Wafer procured to our knowledge of the natural history of those parts of the globe, and of the manners and habits of the savages who inhabited them, a continuation of the narrative of the buccaners would be monotonous; and to include these would occupy too much space, and not be germane to a work like the present. I will, therefore, mention only a few particulars, and hasten to the extinction of these extraordinary associations.

When the Revenge got into the South Sea, they were surprised to find another English ship there. This ship had been fitted out in the river Thames, under a pretence of trading, but with the intention of making a piratical voyage. Her commander was one John Eaton, who readily agreed to keep company with Cook. Cook died in July, just as they made Cape Blanco, and Edward Davis, the second in command, was unanimously elected to succeed him. This man, though a buccaner, had many good and some great qualities. Innate himself, he repressed the ferocity of his companions; he was prudent, moderate, and steady; and such was his commanding character, and the confidence his worth and talent inspired, that no rival authority was ever set up against him, but the lawless and capricious freebooters obeyed him implicitly in all that he ordered. For a long while he maintained his sway, not only over the two ships already mentioned, but over another English vessel, and over two hundred French, and eighty English buccaners that crossed the isthmus of Darien, and joined him, besides other parties, that went from time to time to try their fortunes in the South Seas.

By far the most interesting incident in the history of these marauders is found in their second expedition in the Pacific. On their first cruise, when under the command of Watling, the buccaners having been suddenly scared away from the uninhabited island of Joan Fernandez by the appearance of three armed Spanish ships, left behind them one William, an Indian of the Mosquito tribe, whose attachment to the English adventurers has been mentioned. The poor fellow was absent in the woods, hunting goats for food for the buccaners at the time of the alarm, and they could spare no time to search after him. When this second expedition came near Juan Fernandez, on March 22d, 1681, several of the buccaners who had been with Watling, and were still attached to their faithful Indian comrade William, were eager to discover if any traces could be found of him on the island, and accordingly made for it in great haste in a row-boat.

In this boat was Dampier, who, marauder though he was, has described the scene with exquisite simplicity and feeling, and Robin a Mosquito Indian. As they approached the shore, to their astonishment and delight they saw William at the seaside waiting to receive them.

"Robin, his countryman," says Dampier, "was the first who leaped ashore from the boat, and running to his brother Mosquito man, threw himself flat on his face at his feet, who helping him up and embracing him, fell flat with his face on the ground at Robin's feet, and was by him taken up also. We stood with pleasure to behold the surprise, tenderness, and solemnity of this interview, which was exceedingly affectionate on both sides; and when their ceremonies were over, we also stood gazing at them, drew near, each of us embracing him we had found here, who was overjoyed to see so many of his old friends come hither, as he thought, purposely to fetch him."

William had by this time lived in utter solitude for more than three years. The Spaniards knew that he had been left behind at the island, and several ships of that nation had stopped there and sent people in pursuit of him, but he, dreading they would put him to death as an ally of their persecutors, the English buccaners, had each time fled and succeeded in concealing himself from their search.

When his friends first sailed away and left him at Juan Fernandez, William had with him a musket, a small horn of powder, a few shot, and a knife. "When his ammunition was expended," continues Dampier, "he contrived, by notching his knife, to saw the barrel of his gun into small pieces, wherewith he made harpoons, lances, hooks, and a long knife, heating the pieces of iron first in the fire, and then hammering them out as he pleased with stones. This may seem strange to those not acquainted with the sagacity of the Indians; but it is no more than what the Mosquito men were accustomed to in their own country." He had worn out the English clothes with which he had landed, and now had no covering save a goatskin round his waist. For fishing, he made lines from sealskins cut into thongs. "He had built himself a hut, half a mile from the seashore, which he lined with goatskins, and slept on his couch or barbecue of sticks raised about two feet from the ground, and spread with goatskins." He saw the buccaners' ships the day before, and with his quick sight perceived at a great distance, that from their rigging and manner of manœuvring they must be English; he therefore killed three goats, which he dressed with vegetables, and when his friends and liberators landed he had a feast ready prepared for them.

After having cruised for four years, Davis and many of his companions returned to the West Indies in 1688, in time to benefit by a proclamation offering the king's pardon to all buccaners who would claim it and quit their lawless way of life. "It was not," says Captain Burney, "the least of fortune's favours to this crew, that they should find it in their power, without any care or forethought of their own, to terminate a long course of piratical adventures in quietness and security."

By a short time after the return of Davis, all the buccaners, both French and English, had quitted the South Sea, most of them having effected a retreat across the isthmus, in which they met with some most desperate adventures. They continued their depredations for a few years longer in the West Indian seas, and on the coasts of the Spanish main, but they never returned to the Pacific.

On the accession of William III. a war between Great Britain and France, that had been an unusually long time at peace with each other, seemed inevitable. The French in the West Indies did not wait for its declaration, but attacked the English portion of St. Christopher, which island, by joint agreement, had been made the original and confederated settlement of the two nations. The English were forced to retire to the island of St. Nevis. The war between France and England, which followed, lasted till nearly the end of William's reign. The old ties of amity were rent asunder, and the buccaners, who had been so long leagued against the Spaniards, now carried arms against each other, the French acting as auxiliaries to the regular forces of their nation, the English fighting under the royal flag of theirs. They never again confederated in any buccaner cause. Had they been always united and properly headed—had conquest and not plunder been their object, they might gradually have obtained possession of a great part of the West Indies—they might at once have established an independent state among the islands of the Pacific ocean.

The treaty of Ryswick, which was signed in September 1697, and the views of the English and French cabinets as regarded Spain, and then, four years later, the accession of a Bourbon prince to the Spanish throne, led to the final suppression of these marauders. Many of them turned planters or negro drivers, or followed their profession of sailors on board of merchant vessels; but others, who had good cruising ships, quitted the West Indies, separately, and went roving to different parts of the globe. "Their distinctive mark, which they undeviatingly preserved nearly two centuries, was their waging constant war against the Spaniards, and against them only."—Now this was obliterated, and they no longer existed as buccaners.

I conclude with the words of Captain Burney, in which will be found a melancholy truth, but which, I hope, from the anchorage of our colonial governments and our general improvement, will soon, as regards Englishmen and present times, appear like a falsehood.

"In the history of so much robbery and outrage, the rapacity shown in some instances by the European governments in their West Indian transactions, and by governors of their appointment, appears in a worse light than that of the buccaners, from whom, they being professed ruffians, nothing better was expected. The superior attainments of Europeans, though they have done much towards their own civilisation, chiefly in humanising their institutions, have, in their dealings with the inhabitants of the rest of the globe, with few exceptions, been made the instruments of usurpation and extortion."

"After the suppression of the buccaners, and partly from their relics, arose a race of pirates of a more desperate cast, so rendered by the increased danger of their occupation, who for a number of years preyed upon the commerce of all nations, till they were hunted down, and, it may be said, exterminated."

All my readers will remember that there has been a doubt expressed, whether or not a dignity of the English church had not been in early life a buccaner and a robber. I say all will remember it, because Lord Byron alluded to the circumstance in a note to "The Corsair," one of the finest of his poems.

As, however, the passage is short as it is curious, I will quote it here.

"In Noble's continuation of Granger's Biographical History there is a singular passage in his account of Archbishop Blackbourne; and as in some measure connected with the profession of the hero of the foregoing poem, I cannot resist the temptation of extracting it—

"There is something mysterious in the history and character of Dr. Blackbourne. The former is but imperfectly known; and report has even asserted he was a buccaner; and that one of his brethren in that profession having asked, on his arrival in England, what had become of his old chum, Blackbourne, was answered, he is archbishop of York. We are informed, that Blackbourne was installed sub-dean of Exeter in 1694, which office he resigned in 1702; but after his successor Lewis Barnett's death, in 1704, he regained it. In the following year he became dean; and in 1714 held with it the archdeaconry of Cornwall. He was consecrated bishop of Exeter, February 24, 1716; and translated to York, November 28, 1724, as a reward, according to court scandal, for milking George I. to the Duchess of Münster. This, however, appears to have been an unfounded calumny. As archbishop he behaved with great prudence, and was equally respectable as the guardian of the revenues of the see. Rumour whispered he retained the vices of his youth, and that a passion for the fair sex formed an item in the list of his weaknesses; but so far from being convicted by seventy witnesses, he does not appear to have been directly criminated by one. In short, I look upon these aspersions as the effects of mere malice. How is it possible a buccaner should have been so good a scholar as Blackbourne certainly was? He who had so perfect a knowledge of the classics (particularly of the Greek tragedies), as to be able to read them with the same ease as he could Shakespeare, must have taken great pains to acquire the learned languages, and have had both leisure and good masters. But he was undoubtedly educated at Christ church college, Oxford." These arguments do not appear to me to be very conclusive. Dampier, Liouel Wafer, Sharp, and others of the buccaneers, were men of considerable education. From their acquisitions to the classical accomplishments of Blackbourne is indeed a step, but still it is only a question of degree, and in associations where there were such civilised men as they, there might be one still more cultivated, like Blackbourne. I have no anxiety to prove the identity of a robber and a bishop, but think there can be nothing so very improbable in the story, that a wild youth, even though educated at "Christ church college, Oxford," should have been a buccaner in the West Indies, and then have returned, and, after a dubious reformation of his morals, have attained high church preferment, by his talents, his intrigues, or by a fortunate patronage. "He is allowed to have been a pleasant man; this, however, was turned against him, by its being said, he gained more hearts than souls."

Mr. Mac Farlane having, in the preceding narrations, confined himself to a particular class of American buccaneers, we have prepared the following brief notices of Captain Blackbeard and Kid, who were long the terror of the American colonists, and give them in place of some familiar and less exciting relations, which have been omitted.

Mr. Watson, the annalist of Philadelphia, bears ample testimony that the legends of the pirates were of deep interest in the time of our forefathers; so much so, that the echo of their recitals, far as we are removed from their effects, has not ceased to vibrate upon our ears. The annalist had not access to the "History of the Pirates," from which we have drawn our information, but he has inserted some particulars relative to their appearance in this city and neighbourhood which deserve a place here. He says—

"Mrs. Balah Coates, (once Jaquet,) the grandmother of Samuel Coates, Esq. now an aged citizen, told him that she had seen and sold goods to the celebrated Blackbeard, when keeping a store in High street, No. 77, where Benninghove now owns and dwells—a little west of Second street. He bought freely and paid well. She then knew it was him, and so did some others. But they were afraid to arrest him lest his crew, which they should hear of, should avenge his cause, by some midnight assault. He was too politic to bring his vessel or crew within impudic reach; and at the same time was careful to give no direct offence in any of the settlements where they wished to be regarded as visitors and purchasers, &c.

"Blackbeard was also seen at sea by the mother of the late Dr. Hugh Williamson of New York; she was then in her youth coming to this country, and their vessel was captured by him. The very aged John Hutton, who died in Philadelphia in 1792, well remembered to have seen Blackbeard at Barbadoes after he had come in under the act of oblivion. This was but shortly before he made his last cruise, and was killed in 1716. The present aged Benjamin Kite has told me, that he had seen in his youth an old black man, nearly one hundred years of age, who had been one of Blackbeard's pirates, by impressment. He lived many years with George Gray's family, the brewer in Chestnut street, near to Third street. The same Mr. Kite's grandfather told him he well knew one Crane, a Swede, at the upper ferry on Schuylkill, who used to go regularly in his boat to supply Blackbeard's vessel at State Island. He also said it was known that that freebooter used to visit an inn in High street, near Second street, with his sword by his side. There is a traditional story, that Blackbeard and his crew used to visit and revel at Marcushook, at the house of a Swedish woman, whom he was accustomed to call Marcus, as an abbreviation of Margaret.

"How long Blackbeard exercised his piracies before the years 1717 and '18, which terminated his profligate career, I am not enabled to say, but in this time the MSS. papers in the Logan collection make frequent mention of him and others, as in that hateful pursuit.

"In 1717, James Logan writes, saying, 'We have been extremely pestered with pirates who now swarm in America, and increase their numbers by almost every vessel they take—[compelling them to enter by coercion or otherwise.] If speedy care be not taken they will become formidable, being now at least fifteen hundred strong. They have very particularly talked of visiting this place; many of them being well acquainted with it, and some born in it, for they are generally all English, and therefore know that our government can make no defence.'

"In October, 1718, James Logan again writes to Colonel Hunter, the governor of New York, by express, saying, 'We are now sending down a small vessel to seize those rogues, if not strengthened from sea. We are in manifest danger here, unless the king's ships (which seem careless of the matter) take some notice of us; they probably think a proprietary government no part of their charge. It is possible, indeed, that the merchants of New York, some of them I mean, might not be displeased to hear we are all reduced to ashes. [Even so early it seems there were jealousies of trade.] Unless these pirates be deterred from coming up our rivers by the fear of men of war outside to block them in, there is nothing but what we may fear from them, for that unhappy pardon [the same Teach before embraced,] has given them a settled correspondence every where, and an opportunity [mark this] of lodging their friends where they please to come to their assistance; and nowhere in America, [mark this!] I believe, so much as in this town.'

"Such was the picture of piracy which once distressed and alarmed our forefathers, and shows in itself much of the cause of the numerous vague tales we still occasionally hear of Blackbeard and the pirates."

From a very scarce book now before us, entitled "A General History of the Pyrates, from their first rise and settlement in the Island of Providence to the present time," by Charles Johnson, 4th edition, London, 1726," which was evidently prepared with constant reference to authentic documents, we have collected the following particulars.

BLACKBEARD.

Edward Teach, better known by the name of Blackbeard, was born in Bristol, England, and for a considerable period was engaged in privateering from the Island of Jamaica. He acted as a private sailor till the year 1716, when a Captain Hornigold, a noted pirate, raised him to the command of a sloop he had made prize of. He continued in company with Hornigold until the latter was captured. In the spring of 1717 they sailed together from the Island of Providence for the American colonies, and took in their way a vessel from Havana, which they plundered, and a sloop from Bermuda, from which they took only a few gallons of wine, and dismissed her. They also captured a ship from Madeira, bound to South Carolina, from which they got considerable plunder.

After cleaning their vessel on the coast of Virginia, they started for the West Indies, and on the voyage made prize of a large French Guineaman. After various cruises they were shipwrecked on the coast of North Carolina, when Teach, hearing of a proclamation by which all pirates who surrendered were to be pardoned, went with twenty of his men to the governor of that state, and received certificates of having complied with its terms.

But it does not appear that their submission was from any reformation, but only to gain time to prepare for a renewal of their deeds of iniquity. An opportunity soon presented, with a fair prospect of success, Teach having in the interim cultivated a good understanding with Charles Eden, the governor above mentioned. He had brought in, some time before, a merchantman, of which, says Johnson, Eden contrived to give him possession, through a packed vice-admiralty court, held at Bath Town, though it was notorious that he had never held a commission in his life, and that the vessel in question belonged to English merchants had been taken in time of peace. Before Teach sailed he married a girl of about sixteen, the governor performing the ceremony—this, it is said, made his fourteenth wife! What acts of piracy he committed on this voyage we have no data for ascertaining.

In June 1718, he steered his course for Bermuda, and met two or three English vessels, which he robbed of provisions, stores, and other necessaries. When near Bermuda, he fell in with two French ships; one of them was loaded with sugar and cocoa, and the other in ballast; the latter he dismissed, with both crews on board; the other he brought to North Carolina, where the governor and the pirates shared the plunder. Teach and his officers having made affidavit that they found their prize at sea, without a soul on board, the governor's obedient court condemned her—his excellency having sixty hogsheads of sugar for his dividend, and his secretary, Mr. Knight, one; the collector for the province received twenty.

But this affair was not yet completed; the ship remained, and it was possible somebody might come into the river who would recognise her, and thus discover their villany. Teach, thinking it would be most prudent to destroy her, under pretence that she was in a leaky condition, and by sinking would destroy the entrance to the harbour, procured an order from the governor to set her on fire, which was accordingly done. She was burnt to the water's edge, her hull sunk, and with it their fears of her ever rising in judgment against them disappeared.

Blackbeard now entered on a petty course of piracy, infesting the whole colonial coast, but more particularly the waters of Virginia and the Delaware. In November, 1718, Governor Spotswood of Virginia offered a reward for Teach, dead or alive, of one hundred pounds; for every other commander of a pirate ship, forty pounds; for inferior officers, from fifteen to twenty pounds; and for every private, ten pounds.

On the 17th of the same month, Lieutenant Maynard sailed from Kiptopean, in James river, in search of Blackbeard. On the 31st, in the evening, he came to the mouth of Omeock inlet, where he got sight of the pirate. This expedition was managed with the greatest secrecy, the officer prudently stopping all boats and vessels he met with in the river, to prevent any intelligence reaching the outlaws. But, notwithstanding this caution, Blackbeard had information of the design from Governor Eden, his secretary, Mr. Knight, having written him a letter, with the information that he had sent him four of his men, who were all he could muster, reminding him to be on his guard. The pirate, having frequently before been falsely alarmed, paid little attention to the advice, nor was he fully aware of the expedition till he actually saw the sloop. He immediately put his vessel in a state of defence. Having but about twenty-five men on board, he told them to sell their lives dearly, and then sat down to a drinking frolic with the master of a trading sloop, who it was suspected was rather too intimate with the pirate for his own credit.

Lieutenant Maynard came to anchor in front of the inlet, but in the morning weighed, and sent his boats ahead of the sloop to sound. On coming within gunshot of the pirates, he received their fire, and heaving the king's colours, stood directly for the enemy, when Blackbeard cut his cable, and endeavoured to make a running fight, keeping up a continued fire with his guns, which Maynard could only answer with small arms, the shallowness of the navigation precluding their carrying cannon. In a little time Teach's sloop ran aground, but the lieutenant's drawing more water he could not come near him, and therefore anchored within gun-shot. In order to lighten the vessel, so as to run him aboard, Maynard threw over all the ballast and water, weighed, and stood for the pirate. Blackbeard hailed him with an oath, and demanded who they were and whence they came. The lieutenant made answer, "You see by our colours that we are no pirates." Blackbeard ordered him to send a boat aboard, that he might see who he was, but he was answered that they could not spare the boat, but would come aboard with the sloop as soon as they could. The pirate took a glass of liquor, and drinking to his opponent, swore he would neither give nor receive quarters; Maynard replied, he expected none, nor would he give any.

By this time, Blackbeard's vessel made an attempt to escape as the sloops were rowing towards him, and he fired a broadside, charged, says the historian, "with all manner of small shots." The deck of Maynard's vessel being unprotected, twenty of his men were either killed or wounded, but the crew still kept to their oars, determined on capture. Fearing another broadside, the lieutenant ordered all the men below, except the helmsman, who, with himself, solely occupied the deck. The helmsman was ordered to lay close, and the hands below had received previous orders to be instantly ready on a given signal. When the two vessels came in contact, Teach's men threw case-bottles on board of Maynard's, filled with powder and small shot, slugs, and pieces of lead or iron, with a lighted match in the mouth. Exploding on the deck, they would have done great execution, if the men had not been in safety in the hold. Blackbeard, seeing few or none of the hands, told his men that they were all killed, except three or four, and proposed to jump aboard, and cut them to pieces. No sooner said than done; under the smoke of one of the exploded case-bottles, he sprang on deck, followed by fourteen men, who were not perceived off. The signal being given, in a moment the two parties were engaged in deadly combat, and the lieutenant firing the first shots at each other, by which the pirate received a wound. They then engaged at arms' length with swords, till the lieutenant's men, unluckily broke, when, stepping back to cock a pistol, Blackbeard raised his cutlass, and was in the act of striking, when one of Maynard's men gave him a terrible wound in the neck and throat, Maynard receiving only a small cut over his fingers.

The parties were now closely and warmly engaged, the lieutenant and twelve men against Blackbeard and fourteen, "till the sea was tintured with blood round the vessel." Blackbeard received a shot in his body from Maynard's pistol, but still stood his ground, fighting with great fury, till he had received twenty-five wounds, five of them by shot. At length, as he was cocking another pistol, having already fired several, he fell dead on the deck. Eight of his men shared the same fate, and the others, much wounded, jumped overboard, and called out for quarters, which was granted, though it was only prolonging their lives a few days. The second sloop under Maynard's command, which had been aground, now came up, and attacked the men in Blackbeard's vessel who had not boarded, and came off equally victorious.

Here was an end to the great terror of the colonies, and of a wretch, who, had he been employed in a good cause, might have passed for a hero. Lieutenant Maynard deserved great praise for his bravery in following such a desperado with very small vessels, whose draught would not admit of their carrying either ordnance or a sufficient numerical force.

When they got possession of the piratical vessel, they found a negro with a lighted match in the powder room, waiting for commands to blow all up, which were to have been given if Maynard and his men should enter and seem likely to prove victorious; the intention having been to destroy the conquerors with themselves, and from this they were only saved by the prudent precaution of the commander in keeping his men in the hold till the pirates left their own vessel. The negro, when he found how things were going, could scarcely be persuaded from setting fire to the powder.

The lieutenant caused Blackbeard's head to be severed from his body, and hanging it up at the boltsprit head, sailed for Bath Town, to procure surgical aid for his wounded men. In rummaging the pirates' sloop, several letters were found which discovered their correspondence with Governor Eden's secretary, of which the following is a copy, preserved in Williamson's History of North Carolina.

"My friend—

"If this finds you in the harbour, I would have you make the best of your way up as soon as possible your affairs will let you. I have something more to say to you than at present I can write. The bearer will tell you the end of our Indian war, and Ganet can tell you in part what I have to say to you, so refer you in some measure to him.

"I really think those three men are heartily sorry at your difference with you, and will be very willing to ask your pardon. If I may advise, be friends again; its better so than falling out among yourselves. I expect the governor this night or to-morrow, who I believe would be likewise glad to see you before you go. I have not time to add, save my hearty respects to you, and am your real friend,

"T. KNIGHT."

Some traders in New York were also implicated by the letters found on board.

When the lieutenant came to Bath Town, he seized the governor's store-house, and his sixty hogheads of sugar, as well as honest Mr. Knight's. The latter did not long survive this discovery; being apprehensive he might be called to account, he became ill with fright, and died in a few days.

After the wounded men had recovered, the lieutenant sailed back to James river, with Blackbeard's head still at the boltsprit head, having on board fifteen prisoners, thirteen of whom were afterwards hanged. It appearing on trial that one of them, Samuel Odell, was taken out of the trading sloop only the night before the engagement, he was pardoned. Odell had no less than seventy wounds in various parts of the body, notwithstanding which he lived and was cured of them all. The other person who escaped the gallows was named Israel Hands. He appeared not to have been in the fight, but was taken afterwards ashore, at Bath Town, having been some time before disabled by Blackbeard in the following manner. One night, when drinking in his cabin with Hands, the pilot, and another individual, Blackbeard, without any provocation, privately drew out a small pair of pistols, and, blowing out the candle, discharged them at his company. Hands was shot through the knee, and lamed for life; the other pistol did no execution. Blackbeard being asked the meaning of this, coolly answered with an oath, that if he did not now and then kill one of them, they would forget who he was. Hands being taken, was tried and condemned, but pleaded his majesty's pardon, and by some juggling escaped with his life.

Teach owed his nickname of Blackbeard to the extraordinary quantity of hair with which his head and face were covered. His beard was of a jet black, in full keeping with his black or bloody flag, and suffered to grow to an extravagant length. It came entirely up to his eyes, and he was in the habit of twisting it with ribbons into small tails, and turning them up about his ears. In time of action he wore a sling over his shoulders, with three brace of pistols, hanging in holsters; and still further to render his horrible countenance terrific, he stuck lighted matches under his hat, which appearing on each side of his face, his eyes naturally looking fierce and wild, made him appear altogether like a demon. His disposition corresponded to his appearance, a more reckless wretch having rarely graced the annals of piracy. He appeared desirous to impress his followers with the belief that he was a devil incarnate. On one occasion, when intoxicated, he proposed to his followers to make a little hell of their own, and see how long it could be borne. Accordingly, three or four of them descended to the hold, and closing up all the hatches, filled several pots with brimstone, and then set it on fire. They bore the effluvia as long as possible, but being nearly suffocated two of the men called out for air, and after some time their commander opened the hatches, not a little pleased that he had held out the longest. Sitting up with his comrades the night previous to his death, one of them asked him, in case he was killed, whether his wife knew where he had buried his money. He answered, that "nobody but himself and old Nick knew where it was." An idea long prevailed, and still exists, for aught we know, in various parts of the neighbouring states, that Blackbeard had deposited pots of money in various secure places. The writer has met with more than one instance of positive belief in these idle stories, and his friend, Mr. Watson, in his very amusing book, says—

"The conceit was, that sometimes they killed prisoners, and interred him with it, to make his ghost keep his vigils there as a guard 'walking his weary round.' Hence it was not rare to hear of persons having seen a shipook or ghost, or of having dreamed of it a plurality of times; thus creating a sufficient incentive to dig on the spot.

"Dream after dream ensues;
And still they dream that they shall still succeed,
And still are disappointed."

"Colonel Thomas Forrest, who died in 1828, at the age of 83, had been in his early days a youth of much frolic and fun, always well disposed to give time and application to forward a joke. He found much to amuse himself in the credulity of some of the German families. I have heard him relate some of his anecdotes of the prestigious kind with much humour. When he was about twenty-one years of age, a tailor who was measuring him for a suit of clothes happened to say, 'Now, Thomas, if you and I could only find some of the money of the sea-robbers, (the pirates,) we might drive our coach for life!' The sincerity and simplicity with which he uttered this, caught the attention of young Forrest, and when he went home he began to devise some scheme to be amused with his credulity and superstition. There was a prevailing belief that the pirates had hidden many sums of money and much of treasure about the banks of the Delaware. Forrest got an old parchment, on which he wrote the dying testimony of one John Hendricks, executed at Chestnut for piracy, in which he stated he had deposited a chest and a pot of money at Cooper's Point, in the Jerseys. This parchment he smoked, and gave to it the appearance of antiquity; calling on his German tailor, told him he had found it among his father's papers, who got it in England from the prisoner whom he visited in prison. This he showed to the tailor as a precious paper, which he could by no means lend out of his hands. This operated the desired effect.

"Soon after, the tailor called on Forrest with one Ambuster, a printer, who he introduced as capable of 'printing any spirit out of hell,' by his knowledge of the black art. He asked to see the parchment; he was delighted with it, and confidently said he could conjure Hendricks to give up the money. A time was appointed to meet in an upper room of a public house in Philadelphia, by night, and the innkeeper was let into the secret by Forrest. By the night appointed, they had prepared by a closet a communication with a room above their sitting room, so as to lower down by a pulley the invoked ghost, who was represented by a young man entirely sewed up in a close white dress, on which were painted black-eyed sockets, mouth, and bare ribs with dashes of black between them, the outside and inside of the legs and thighs blacked, so as to make white bones conspicuous. About twelve persons met in all, seated around a table. Ambuster shuffled and read out cards, on which were inscribed the names of saints, telling them he should bring Hendricks to encompass the table, visible or invisible he could not tell. At the words, John Hendricks 'du verfluchter eun heraus,' the pulley was heard to reel, the closet door to fly open, and John Hendricks with ghastly appearance, to stand forth. The whole were dismayed and fled, save Forrest the brave. After this, Ambuster, on whom they all depended, declared that he had by spells got permission to take up the money. A day was therefore appointed to visit the Jersey shore, and to dig there by night. The parchment said it lay between two great stones. Forrest, therefore, prepared two black men, to be entirely naked, except white petticoat-breeches; and these were to jump each on the stone whenever they came to the spot, which had been previously put there. These frightened off the company for a little. When they next essayed, they were assailed by cats, tied two and two, to whose tails were spiral papers of gunpowder, which illuminated and whizzed, while the cats howled. The pot was at length got up, and brought in great triumph to Philadelphia wharf: but oh, sad disaster! while helping it out of the boat, Forrest, who managed it, and was handing it up to the tailor, trod upon the gunnel and filled the boat, and, holding on to the pot, dragged the tailor into the river—it was lost! For years afterwards, they reproached Forrest for that loss, and declared he had got the chest by himself, and was enriched thereby. He favoured the conceit, until at last they actually sued him on a writ of treasure trove; but their lawyer was persuaded to give it up as idle. Some years afterwards, Mr. Forrest wrote a very humorous play, (which I have seen printed, and a copy of it is now in the Philadelphia Athenæum,) which contained many incidents of this kind of superstition. It gave such offence to the parties represented, that it could not be exhibited on the stage. I remember some lines in it, for it had much of broken English and German-English verses, to wit:

"My dearest wife, in all my life,
Ich neber was so fruchtlich'n
De spirit come and I did run
'Twas just like tuder with lightning."

"Several aged persons have occasionally pointed out to me the places where persons to their knowledge, had dug for pirates' money. The small hill once on the north side of Coates street, near to Front street, was well remembered by John Brown as having been much dug. Colonel A. J. Morris, now in his ninetieth year, has told me, that in his early days very much was said of Blackbeard and the pirates, both by young and old. Tales were frequently current that this and that person had heard of some of his discovered treasure. Persons in the city were named as having profited by his depredations. But he thought those things were not true.

"As late as the year 1792, the shipcarpenters formed a party to dig for pirates' money on the Cohocksine creek, northwest of the causeway, under a large tree. They got frightened off. And it came out afterwards, that a waggish neighbour had enacted diabolus for their discomfiture."

Smith, the historian of New York, remarks—"It is certain, that the pirates were frequently in the Sound, and supplied with provisions by the inhabitants of Long Island, who, for many years afterwards, were so infatuated with a notion that the pirates buried great quantities of money along the coast, that there is scarcely a point of land, or an island, without the marks of their auri sacri fumes. Some credulous people have ruined themselves by these researches, and propagated a thousand idle fables, current to this day, among our country farmers." To prove the fallacy of these stories no argument is necessary; Williamson states that Blackbeard's "treasures, which vulgar credulity, prone to believe a wonderful story, had passed to his account, were of no use to himself at least. The man who is said and believed to have buried pots or chests of money, in every deep creek along our coasts, had not the means of supporting himself on shore when he left off cruising."

Johnson has one more anecdote of this famous freebooter, with which he closes his annals of Captain Teach. Those of his crew who were taken alive, told a story in which they placed implicit reliance,—that when out upon a cruise, they discovered there was one man on board more than their complement. He was seen for several days among them—sometimes upon deck, and sometimes below—but was entirely unknown to any of the hands, and disappeared suddenly, without any one's knowledge. This individual these superstitious and ignorant wretches firmly believed was the devil!

CAPTAIN KID.

Captain Kid's piracies are of an earlier date than Blackbeard's, and, being carried on at a greater distance from our shores, excited less attention among the mass of the people. From Johnson's history, and other sources the following facts have been collected.

It appears, that before the Earl of Bellmont sailed to take command as governor of the provinces of Massachusetts Bay and New Hampshire, in 1698, he became acquainted with Robert Livingston, Esq. the ancestor of the present Livingstons of New York, who was then in England, prosecuting his own affairs before the Council. The earl took occasion to mention to Mr. Livingston the scandal which attached to the province on account of the pirates. The latter confessed the reports in circulation were well founded, and introduced the earl to Captain Kid, whom he recommended as a man of integrity and courage, well acquainted with the pirates and their rendezvous, and who would undertake to apprehend them, if the king would employ a good sailing frigate of thirty guns and one hundred and fifty men. Bellmont laid the proposal before the king, who consulted the admiralty upon the subject; this project was, however, dropped, and Mr. Livingston then proposed a private adventure against the pirates, offering to be concerned with Kid to the amount of one fifth of the cost of outfit, and to be himself responsible for Kid's faithful execution of the commission. The king then gave his approval to the plan, and reserved to himself a tenth share, to show that he was concerned in the enterprise. Lord Chancellor Somers, and others of high standing, joined in the scheme, agreeing to make up a sum of six thousand pounds, leaving the management of the whole affair to Lord Bellmont, who gave orders to Kid to pursue his commission, which was in the usual form.

Kid sailed from Plymouth for New York, in April, 1696, bearing also a commission, to justify him in taking French merchant ships, King William being then at war with that nation. His vessel, the Adventure Galley, carried thirty guns and eighty men; on the voyage they captured a French "Banker," and, arriving at New York, Kid advertised for more men, offering every one who joined a share of what should be taken. His company was thus increased to one hundred and fifty men, with which crew he sailed, first for Madeira, where he took in wine and other articles, and proceeded to Bonavista, to procure salt. He now bent his course to Madagascar, the known rendezvous of pirates, where he arrived in February, 1697.

The pirates were most of them out in search of prey, so that according to the best information Kid could obtain, there were none of their vessels about the island. After watering and taking in provisions Kid steered for the coast of Malabar, and made an unsuccessful cruise. It does not appear that, up to this period, he had any design of turning buccaneer himself, for on the last named voyage he fell in with several India ships, richly laden, to which he offered no violence, though his crew was numerous enough to have captured the whole; he soon, however, began to open his views to the men, by informing them that the Mocha fleet, which was to set sail shortly, would make their fortunes. Finding that none of them made any objection, he ordered a boat out, well manned, to go on the coast to make discoveries, commanding them to take a prisoner and bring him aboard, or procure intelligence by any other method. The boat returned in a few days, bringing him word that they saw fourteen or fifteen ships ready to sail, some with Dutch and others with Moorish flags.

Kid must have determined to turn pirate in consequence of his disappointments and apprehensions lest his owners, on discovering his want of success, should dismiss him. Whatever his motives might have been, he soon fell in with the fleet, and firing into a Moorish ship the others bore down upon him, and obliged him to sheer off; but, having commenced hostilities, he soon captured a small vessel, belonging to Moorish merchants, the master of which was an Englishman, named Parker; Kid forced him and a Portuguese, the only Europeans on board, to join his crew, the first for pilot, and the other as interpreter. He also used the men very cruelly, causing them to be hoisted up by their arms, and drubbed with a cutlass, in order to make them confess where their money was concealed, but as they had neither gold nor silver on board, he took nothing from the vessel but a little coffee and pepper.

The news of this piracy soon spread, and a Portuguese man-of-war was sent out in search of the new pirate; meeting with Kid, a savage battle was fought, in which both ships were more or less injured, and our hero, finding the enemy too strong for him to entertain the hope of coming off conqueror, hoisted sail and made off.

Meeting with better success soon after, Kid was seized with a fit of penitence, entertaining fears that his conduct would eventually bring him to the gallows; after overhauling a Dutch ship without committing any violence, his crew mutinied, and the dispute ended with his laying one of his men dead at his feet. His conscience does not appear to have troubled him long. Coasting along Malabar, he met a great number of boats, all of which he plundered, as well as a Portuguese ship, of which he took possession a week, and having extracted some cases of India goods, thirty jars of butter, with some wax, iron, and a hundred bags of rice, he let her go.

Landing on one of the Malabar islands for wood and water, his cooper was murdered by the natives, upon which Kid burnt and pillaged several of their houses. Having captured one of the islanders, he hung him to a tree, and commanded one of his men to shoot him; after which, putting to sea, he captured a Moorish ship of 400 tons, richly laden. The share of each man, after the cargo was sold, amounted to two hundred pounds, and Kid to eight thousand, sterling. Putting some of his men on board his prize, the two set sail for Madagascar, where he fraternised with some noted pirates, supplying them with such articles as they stood in need of. Finding his gally no longer sea-worthy, he transferred his quarters to the recently captured ship, the "Queda Merchant," and was soon placed in a situation of great distress by the desertion of the principal part of his crew, who either absconded on shore or joined other captains; about forty only remaining with him. Touching at Ambonja, he was informed that the news of his piracies had reached England, and that he was there declared a pirate, a motion having been made in the House of Commons to enquire into the conduct of the parties who had fitted out the expedition, and even for their expulsion from their places; this however was rejected by a large majority. Some of them were afterwards impeached, but acquitted, and Lord Bellmont published a pamphlet justifying himself from the aspersions cast upon his character. A proclamation had been published, offering the king's free pardon to all such pirates as should surrender themselves before the last day of April, 1699; in this, however, Avery and Kid were excepted by name.

When Kid left Ambonja, he could have known nothing of this exception, or he would not have been so infatuated as to have run himself into the meshes of his enemies. Relying upon his interest with Lord Bellmont, and believing that a French pass or two he had found on board some of the ships he had taken, would hush up the affair, while his booty would gain him new friends, he sailed directly for New York, where he no sooner landed, than the whole company was arrested by Lord B.'s orders, together with their papers and effects. At first they were admitted to bail, but were afterwards put in strict confinement, and finally sent to England for trial.

At an admiralty sessions, held at the Old Bailey in 1701, Captain Kid, Nicholas Churchill, James Howe, Robert Lumley, William Jenkins, Gabriel Loff, Hugh Parrot, Richard Barlicorne, Abel Owens, and Darby Mullins, were arraigned for piracy and robbery on the high seas, and all found guilty, except three, Lumley, Jenkins, and Barlicorne, who, proving themselves under indentures to some officers of the ship, were acquitted. The others had availed themselves of the pardon and surrendered.

Kid was also tried for murder and found guilty, though he pleaded his own innocence and the villany of his men, declaring that he went out in a laudable employment; that the men often mutinied, and did as they pleased; that he was threatened to be shot in his cabin, and that ninety-five left him at one time, and set fire to his boat, so that he was prevented from bringing his ship home, or the prizes he took, to have them regularly condemned. He called a witness to prove his good character and bravery, but the evidence against him being full and particular, about a week afterwards he and his companions were executed at Execution Dock, and afterwards hung up in chains at some distance from each other, where their bodies were exposed for many years.

Mr. Watson has preserved the "Ballad of Captain Kid, a great rarity in the present day, although the pensive tones are still known to some." As a curiosity in its way we here insert it; the tune was the same as that of the eccentric song, "Farewell, ye blooming youth," &c.

My name was Captain Kid,
When I sail'd, when I sail'd,
My name was Captain Kid,
And so wickedly I did,
God's laws I did forbid,
When I sail'd, when I sail'd.

I roam'd from sound to sound,
And many a ship I found,
And them I sunk or burn'd,
When I sail'd, when I sail'd.

I murdered William Moore,
And laid him in his gore,
Not many leagues from shore,
When I sail'd, when I sail'd.

Farewell to young and old,
All jolly seamen bold;
You're welcome to my gold,
For I must die, I must die.

Farewell to Lummon town,
The pretty girls all round;
No pardon can be found,
And I must die, I must die.

Farewell, for I must die,
Then to eternity,
In hideous misery,
I must lie, I must lie.

The foregoing abridgements of the lives of two celebrated sea rovers, have been rendered as short as possible. In the appendix to his 4th edition, Johnson expresses some doubt as to the culpability of Governor Eden, but the letter from his secretary, previously quoted, and other corroborating circumstances, have left a suspicion upon his character which will not easily be effaced. As this is a curious piece of colonial history but rarely referred to, we may add, that Dr. Williamson, author of the History of South Carolina, appears to give full credit to the story, stating, that "Eden's administration was chequered by trouble, and clouded by disgrace, that he might and should have prevented—His conduct," he continues, "when viewed in the most favourable light, was very imprudent, although his guilt was not fully established."

Another governor, Robert Quarry, of South Carolina, was degraded, in 1681, for harbouring pirates, and the character of Fletcher, the resident governor of New York before the appointment of Lord Bellamont, was also stained with the same reproach, having been strongly suspected of confederating with Kid and his associates. When that pirate was secured, it was discovered that Nicoll, a member of the governor's council, had received bribes for granting protections to pirates who frequented the Sound. Lord Bellamont's council advised that Fletcher should be sent to England, to be tried for piracy; and that Nicoll should be tried in the colony, but, according to Smith's History of New York, his advice was never carried into execution, probably owing to a want of evidence against the parties.

CHINESE PIRATES.

The celestial empire, spite of the boasted wisdom of its government, and the virtue and order that have been supposed to reign there for so many centuries, is no more free from robbers than countries of less ancient date and inferior pretension. On the contrary, if we except India, no part of the world has, in our time, witnessed such formidable and numerous associations of freebooters. These Chinese robbers were pirates, and I am disposed to give a sketch of them and their adventures, as a striking pendant to the preceding chapter on the Buccaneers of America; and this, because I am not only in possession of a most curious account of the suppression or pacification of the rovers, translated from the original Chinese, but of a corroborated written by an Englishman, who was so unfortunate as to fall into their hands, and to see his comrades (English sailors) obliged to take part in their marauding and murderous expeditions.

For the translation of Yuen Tze's "History of the Pirates who infested the China Sea from 1807 to 1810," we are indebted to that excellent institution, the Oriental Translation Fund, and to the labours of the distinguished Orientalist, Mr. Charles Fried Neumann; and for the Narrative (first published in Wilkinson's Travels to China) of his captivity and treatment amongst the Ladrões, (pirates), to Richard Glasspool, Esq. of the Hon. East India Company's service, a gentleman who is still living. I shall make out my account of the Chinese pirates from either of these two authorities.

The Ladrões, as they were christened by the Portuguese of Macao, were originally a disaffected set of Chinese, that revolted against the oppression of the Mandarines. The first scene of their depredations was the western coast, about Cochín-China, where they began by attacking small trading vessels in row boats, carrying from thirty to forty men each. They continued this system of piracy, and thrived and increased in numbers under it for several years. At length the fame of their successes, and the oppression and horrid poverty and want that many of the lower order of Chinese laboured under, had the effect of augmenting their bands with astonishing rapidity. Fishermen and other destitute classes flocked by hundreds to their standard, and their audacity growing with their numbers, they not merely swept the coast, but blockaded all the principal rivers, and attacked and took several large government war junks, mounting from ten to fifteen guns each.

These junks being added to their shoals of boats, the pirates formed a tremendous fleet, which was always along shore, so that no small vessel could safely trade on the coast. When they lacked prey on the sea, they laid the land under tribute. They were at first accustomed to go on shore and attack the maritime villages, but becoming bolder, they, like the buccaners, made long inland journeys, and surprised and plundered even large towns.

An energetic attempt made by the Chinese government to destroy them, only increased their strength; for in their very first encounter with the pirates, twenty-eight of the imperial junks struck, and the remaining twelve saved themselves by a precipitate retreat.

The captured junks, fully equipped for war, were a great acquisition to the robbers, whose numbers now increased more rapidly than ever. They were in their plenitude of power in the year 1809, when Mr. Glasspool had the misfortune to fall into their hands, at which time that gentleman supposed their force to consist of 70,000 men, navigating eight hundred large vessels, and one thousand small ones, including row boats. They were divided into six large squadrons, under different flags—the red, the yellow, the green, the blue, the black, and the white. "These wasps of the ocean," as the Chinese historian pertinently calls them, were further distinguished by the names of their respective commanders. Of these commanders a certain Ching-yih had been the most distinguished by his valour and conduct. By degrees Ching obtained almost a supremacy of command over the whole united fleet; and so confident was this robber in his strength and daily augmenting means, that he aspired to the dignity of a great political character, and went so far as openly to declare his patriotic intention of hurling the present Tartar family from the throne of China, and of restoring the ancient native Chinese dynasty.

But unfortunately for this ambitious pirate, "it happened that on the seventeenth day of the tenth moon, in the year of Kea-King," he perished in a heavy gale, and instead of placing a sovereign on the Chinese throne, he and his lofty aspirations were buried in the sea of China. And now comes the most remarkable passage in the history of these pirates—remarkable with any class of men, but doubly so among the Chinese, who entertain more than the general opinion of the inferiority, or nothingness, of the fair sex.

On the death of Ching-yih, his legitimate wife had sufficient influence over the freebooters to induce them to recognise her authority in the place of her deceased husband; and she appointed one Paou as her lieutenant and prime minister, and provided that she should be considered the mistress or the commander in chief of the united squadrons.

This Paou had been a poor fisher boy, picked up with his father at sea, while fishing, by Ching-yih, whose good will and favour he had the fortune to captivate, and by whom, before that pirate's death, he had been made a headman or captain. The grave Chinese historian does not descend into such domestic particulars, but we may presume, from her appointing him to be her lieutenant, that Paou had been equally successful in securing the good graces of Mistress Ching, as the worthy translator somewhat irreverently styles our Chinese heroine.

Instead of declining under the rule of a woman, the pirates became more enterprising than ever. Ching's widow was clever as well as brave, and so was her lieutenant Paou. Between them they drew up a code of laws for the better regulation of their freebooters.

That the pirates might never feel the want of provisions and other supplies, it was ordered by Ching-yih's widow, that every thing should be done to gain the common country people to their interest. Wine, rice, and all other goods were to be paid for, as the villagers delivered them: capital punishment was pronounced on every pirate who should take any thing of this kind by force, or without paying for it. And not only were these laws well calculated for their object, but the she commander in chief and her lieutenant Paou were vigilant in seeing them observed, and strict in every transgression.

By these means an admirable discipline was maintained on board the ships, and the peasantry on shore never let the pirates want for gunpowder, provisions, or any other necessary. On a piratical expedition, either to advance or to retreat without orders, was a capital offence.

Under these philosophical institutions, and the guidance of a woman, the robbers continued to scour the China sea, plundering every vessel they came near; but it is to be remarked, in their delicate phraseology, the robbing of a ship's cargo was not called by any such vulgar term—it was merely styled "a transhipping of goods."

After some reverses the tarnished laurels of the pirates were however brightened; for when Tsuen-mow-Sun went to attack them in the bay of Kwangchow, the widow of Ching-yih, remaining quiet with part of her ships, sent her bold lieutenant Paou to make an attack on the front of the admiral's line. When the fight was well begun, the rest of the pirate's ships, that had been lying perdu, came upon the admiral's rear, and presently surrounded him. "Then," saith the historian, "our squadron was scattered, thrown into disorder, and consequently cut to pieces: there was a noise which rent the sky; every man fought in his own defence, and scarcely a hundred remained together. The squadron of the wife of Ching-yih overpowered us by numbers; our commander was not able to protect his lives, they were broken, and we lost fourteen ships."

The next fight being very characteristically described, must be given entire in the words of our Chinese historian.

"Our men of war escorting some merchant ships, in the fourth moon of the same year, happened to meet the pirate chief nicknamed, 'The jewel of all the crew,' cruising at sea. The traders became exceedingly frightened, but our commander said: 'This not being the flag of the widow Ching-yih, we are a match for them; therefore we will attack and conquer them.' Then ensued a battle; they attacked each other with guns and stones, and many people were killed and wounded. The fighting ceased towards the evening, and began again next morning. The pirates and the men of war were very close to each other, and they boasted mutually about their strength and valour. It was a very hard fight, the sound of cannon, and the cries of the combatants, were heard some *le distant. The traders remained at some distance; they saw the pirates mixing gunpowder in their beverage—they looked instantly red about the face and the eyes, and then fought desperately. This fighting continued three days and nights incessantly; at last, becoming tired on both sides, they separated."

To understand this inglorious bulletin, the reader must remember that many of the combatants only handled bows and arrows, and pelted stones, and that Chinese powder and guns are both exceedingly bad. The bathos of the conclusion does somewhat remind one of the Irishman's despatch during the American war—"It was a bloody battle while it lasted; and the sergeant of marines lost his cartouche-box."

The pirates continuing their depredations, plundered and burned a number of towns and villages on the coast, and carried off a number of prisoners of both sexes. From one place alone, they carried off fifty-three women. At length they separated: Mistress Ching plundering in one place; Paou, in another; O-po-tai, in another, &c.

It was at this time that Mr. Glasspool had the ill fortune to fall into their power. This gentleman, then an officer in the East India Company's ship the Marquis of Ely, which was anchored under an island about twelve miles from Macao, was ordered to proceed to the latter place with a boat to procure a pilot. He left the ship in one of the cutters, with seven British seamen well armed, and the 17th September 1809. He reached Macao in safety, and having finished his business there and procured a pilot, returned towards the ship the following day. But, unfortunately, the ship had weighed anchor and was under sail, and in consequence of squally weather, accompanied with thick fogs, the boat could not reach her, and Mr. Glasspool and his men and the pilot were left at sea, in an open boat. "Our situation," says that gentleman, "was truly distressing—night closing fast, with a threatening appearance, blowing fresh, with hard rain and a heavy sea; our boat very leaky, without a compass, anchor, or provisions, and drifting fast on a lee-shore, surrounded with dangerous rocks, and inhabited by the most barbarous pirates."

After suffering dreadfully for three whole days, Mr. Glasspool, by the advice of the pilot, made for a narrow channel, where he presently discovered three large boats at anchor, which, on seeing the English boat, weighed and made sail towards it. The pilot told Mr. Glasspool they were Ladrões, and that if they captured the boat, they would certainly put them all to death! After rowing tremendously for six hours they escaped these boats, but on the following morning falling in with a large fleet of the pirates, which the English mistook for fishing boats, they were captured.

"About twenty savage looking villains," says Mr. Glasspool, "who were stowed at the bottom of a boat, leaped on board us. They were armed with a short sword in either hand, one of which they laid upon our necks, and pointed the other to our breasts, keeping their eyes fixed on their officer, waiting his signal to cut or desist. Seeing we were incapable of making any resistance, the officer sheathed his sword, and the others immediately followed his example. They then dragged us into their boat, and carried us on board one of their junks, with the most savage demonstrations of joy, and, as we supposed, to torture and put us to a cruel death." When on board the junk they rifled the English men, and brought heavy chains to chain them to the deck.

"At this time a boat came, and took me, with one of my men and the interpreter, on board the chief's vessel. I was taken before the chief. He was seated on a deck, in a large chair, dressed in purple silk, with a black turban on. He appeared to be about thirty years of age, a stout commanding looking man. He took me by the coat, and drew me close to him; then questioned the interpreter very strictly, asking him who we were, and what was our business in that part of the country. I told him to say we were Englishmen in distress, having been four days at sea without provisions. This he would not credit, but said we were bad men; and that he would put us all to death; and then ordered some men to put the interpreter to the torture until he confessed the truth. Upon this occasion, a Ladron, who had been once to England and spoke a few words of English, came to the chief, and told him we were really Englishmen, and that we had plenty of money, adding that the buttons on my coat were gold. The chief then ordered us some coarse brown rice, of which we made a tolerable meal, having eaten nothing for nearly four days, except a few green oranges. During our repast, a number of Ladrones crowded round us, examining our clothes and hair, and giving us every possible annoyance. Several of them brought swords, and laid them on our necks, making signs that they would soon take us on shore, and cut us in pieces, which I am sorry to say was the fate of some hundreds during my captivity. I was now summoned before the chief, who had been conversing with the interpreter; he said I must write to my captain, and tell him, if he did not send an hundred thousand dollars for our ransom, in ten days he would put us all to death."

* Le, a Chinese mile. "I compute," says Bell, "five of their miles to be about two and a half English."

After vainly expostulating to lessen the ransom Mr. Glasspool wrote the letter, and a small boat came alongside and took us to Macao.

"About six o'clock in the evening they gave us some rice and a little salt fish, which we ate, and they made signs for us to lie down on the deck to sleep; but such numbers of Ladrones were constantly coming from different vessels to see us, and examine our clothes and hair, they would not allow us a moment's quiet. They were particularly anxious for the buttons of my coat, which were new, and as they supposed gold. I took it off, and laid it on the deck to avoid being disturbed by them; it was taken away in the night, and I saw it on the next day stripped of its buttons."

Early in the night the fleet sailed, and anchored about one o'clock the following day in a bay under the island of Lantow, where the head admiral of Ladrones (our acquaintance Paou) was lying at anchor, with about two hundred vessels and a Portuguese brig they had captured a few days before, and the captain and part of the crew of which they had murdered. Early the next morning, a fishing boat came to enquire if they had captured an European boat; they came to the vessel the English were in.

"One of the boatmen spoke a few words of English, and told me he had a Ladron pass, and was sent by our captain in search of us; I was rather surprised to find he had no letter. He appeared to be well acquainted with the chief, and remained in his cabin smoking opium, and playing cards all the day. In the evening I was summoned with the interpreter before the chief. He questioned us in a much milder tone, saying, he now believed we were Englishmen, a people he wished to be friendly with; and that if our captain would lend him seventy thousand dollars till he returned from his cruise up the river, he would repay him, and send us all to Macao. I assured him it was useless writing on those terms, and unless our ransom was speedily settled, the English fleet would sail, and render our enlargement altogether ineffectual. He remained determined, and said if it were not sent, he would keep us, and make us fight, or put us to death. I accordingly wrote, and gave my letter to the boat belonging to the boat before mentioned. He said he could not return with an answer in less than five days. The chief now gave me the letter I wrote when first taken. I have never been able to ascertain his reasons for detaining it, but suppose he dared not negotiate for our ransom without orders from the head admiral, who I understood was sorry at our being captured. He said the English ships would join the Mandarin and attack them."

While the fleet lay here, one night the Portuguese who were left in the captured brig murdered the Ladrones who were on board of her, cut the cables, and fortunately escaped through the darkness of the night.

"At daylight the next morning, the fleet, amounting to above five hundred sail of different sizes, weighed, to proceed on their intended cruise up the river, to levy contributions on the towns and villages. It is impossible to describe what were my feelings at this critical time, having received no answers to my letters, and the fleet under way to sail—hundreds of miles up a country never visited by Europeans, there to remain probably for many months, which would render all opportunities of negotiating for our enlargement totally ineffectual; as the only method of communication is by boats that have a pass from the Ladrones, and they dare not venture above twenty miles from Macao, being obliged to come and go in the night, to avoid the mandarins; and if these boats should be detected in having any intercourse with the Ladrones, they are immediately put to death, and all their relations, though they had not joined in the crime, share in the punishment, in order that not a single person of their families should be left to imitate their crimes or revenge their death."

The following is a very touching incident in Mr. Glasspool's narrative.

"Wednesday the 26th of September, at daylight, we passed in sight of our own ships, at anchor under the island of Chiu Po. The chief then called me, pointed to the ships, and told the interpreter to tell us to look at them, for we should never see them again! About noon we entered a river to the westward of the Bogue, three or four miles from the entrance. We passed a large town situate on the side of a beautiful hill, which is tributary to the Ladrones; the inhabitants saluted them with songs as they passed."

After committing numerous robberies, sacking towns, burning vessels and carrying off women, &c. Mr. G. says:—

"On the 28th of October, I received a letter from Captain Kay, brought by a fisherman, who had told him he would get us all back for three thousand dollars. He advised me to offer three thousand, and if not accepted, extend it to four; but not farther, as it was bad policy to offer much at first: at the same time assuring me we should be liberated, let the ransom be what it would. I offered the chief the three thousand, which he disdainfully refused, saying he was not to be played with; and unless they sent ten thousand dollars, and two large guns, with several casks of gunpowder, he would soon put us all to death. I wrote to Captain Kay, and informed him of the chief's determination, requesting, if an opportunity offered, to send us a shirt of clothes, for which it may be easily imagined we were much distressed, having been seven weeks without a change; although constantly exposed to the weather, and of course frequently wet."

"On the first of November, the fleet sailed up a narrow river, and anchored at night within two miles of a town called Little Whampoa. In front of it was a small fort, and several mandarin vessels lying in the harbour. The chief sent the interpreter to me, saying, I must order my men to make catridges and clean their muskets ready to go on shore in the morning. I assured the interpreter I should give the men no such orders, that they must please themselves. Soon after the chief came on board, threatening to put us all to a cruel death if we refused to obey his orders. For my own part I remained determined, and advised the men not to comply, as I thought by making ourselves useful we should be accounted too valuable. A few hours afterwards he sent me again, saying, that if myself and the quartermaster would assist them at the great guns, that if also the rest of the men went on shore and succeeded in taking the place, he would then take the money offered for our ransom, and give them twenty dollars for every Chinaman's head they cut off. To these proposals we cheerfully acceded, in hopes of facilitating our deliverance."

Preferring the killing of Chinese to the living with pirates, our English tars therefore handed next day with about three thousand ruffians. Once in the fight, they seem to have done their work con amore! and to have battled it as if they had been pirates themselves. Our friend, the Chinese historian, indeed, mentions a foreigner engaged in battle and doing great execution with a little musket, and sets him down, naturally enough, as "a foreign pirate!"

After recapitulating several battles which he witnessed, Mr. Glasspool continues—"On the 2d of December I received a letter from Lieutenant Mauglin, commander of the Honourable Company's cruiser the Antelope, saying that he had the ransom on board, and had been three days cruising after us, and wished me to settle with the chief on the securest method of delivering it. The chief agreed to send us in a small gunboat till we came within sight of the Antelope; then the comprador's boat was to bring the ransom and receive us. I was so agitated at receiving this joyful news, that it was with considerable difficulty I could scruple about two or three lines to inform Lieutenant Mauglin of the arrangements I had made. We were all so deeply affected by the gratifying tidings, that we seldom closed our eyes, but continued watching day and night for the boat."

"On the 6th, she returned with Lieutenant Mauglin's answer, saying, he would respect any single boat; but would not allow the fleet to approach him. The chief then, according to his first proposal, ordered a gunboat to take us, and with no small degree of pleasure we left the Ladron fleet about four o'clock in the afternoon. At one P. M. saw the Antelope under all sail, standing towards us. The Ladron boat immediately anchored, and despatched the comprador's boat for the ransom, saying, that if she approached nearer, they would return to the fleet; and they were just weighing when she shortened sail, and anchored about two miles from us. The boat did not reach her till late in the afternoon, owing to the tide's being strong against her. She received the ransom, and left the Antelope just before dark. A mandarin boat that had been lying concealed under the land, and watching their manoeuvres, gave chase to her, and was within a few fathoms of taking her, when she saw a light, which the Ladrones answered, and the mandarin hauled off. Our situation was now a most critical one; the ransom was in the hands of the Ladrones, and the comprador dared not return with us for fear of a second attack from the mandarin boat. The Ladrones would not remain till morning, so we were obliged to return with them to the fleet. In the morning the chief inspected the ransom, which consisted of the following articles: two bales of superfine scarlet cloth; two chests of opium; two casks of gunpowder; and a telescope; the rest in dollars. He objected to the telescope not being new; and said he should detain one of us till another was sent, or a hundred dollars in lieu of it. The comprador, however, agreed with him for the hundred dollars. Every thing being at length settled, the chief ordered two gunboats to convey us near the Antelope; we saw her just before dusk, when the Ladron boats left us. We had an inexpressible pleasure of arriving on board the Antelope at seven P. M., where we were most cordially received, and heartily congratulated on the safe and happy deliverance from a miserable captivity, which we had endured for eleven weeks and three days."

"China, December 8th, 1809."

The following notes added to Mr. Glasspool's very interesting account of these Eastern pirates, will show how ill he fared during his detention among them, and that with all their impurity of plundering, their lives were but wretched and beastly.

"The Ladrones have no settled residence on shore, but live constantly in their vessels. The after part is appropriated to the captain and his wives; he generally has five or six. With respect to conjugal rights they are religiously strict; no person is allowed to have a woman on board, unless married to her according to their laws. Every man is allowed a small berth, about four feet square, where he stows with his wife and family. From the number of souls crowded in so small a space, it must naturally be supposed they are horribly dirty, which is evidently the case, and their vessels swarm with all kinds of vermin. Rats in particular, which they encourage to breed, and eat them as great delicacies; in fact, there are very few creatures they will not eat. During our captivity we lived three weeks on caterpillars boiled with rice. They are much addicted to gambling, and spend all their leisure hours at cards and smoking opium."

At the time of Mr. Glasspool's liberation, the pirates were at the height of their power; after such repeated victories over the mandarin ships, they had set at naught the Imperial allies—the Portuguese, and not only the coast, but the rivers of the celestial empire seemed to be at their discretion—and yet their formidable association did not many months survive this event. It was not, however, defeat, that reduced it to the obedience of the laws. On the contrary, that extraordinary woman, the widow of Ching-yih, and the daring Paou, were victorious and more powerful than ever, when dissensions broke out among the pirates themselves. Ever since the favour of the chieftainess had elevated Paou to the general command, there had been enmity and altercations between him and the chief O-po-tae, who commanded one of the flags or divisions of the fleet; and it was only by the deference and respect they both owed to Ching-yih's widow, that they had been prevented from turning their arms against each other long before.

At length, when the brave Paou was surprised and cooped up by a strong blockading force of the emperor's ships, O-po-tae showed him all his deadly spite, and refused to obey the orders of Paou, and even of the chieftainess, which were, that he should sail to the relief of his rival Paou, with his bravery and usual good fortune, broke through the blockade, but when he came in contact with O-po-tae, his rage was too violent to be restrained.

* That the whole family must suffer for the crime of one individual, seems to be the most cruel and foolish law of the whole Chinese criminal code.

* The Chinese in Canton only eat a particular sort of rat, which is very large and of a whitish colour.

O-po-tae at first pleaded that his means and strength had been insufficient to do what had been expected of him, but concluded by saying,—"Am I bound to come and join the forces of Paou?"

"Would you then separate from us?" cried Paou, more enraged than ever.

O-po-tae answered: "I will not separate myself."

Paou—"Why then do you not obey the orders of the wife of Ching-yih and my own? What is this, else than separation, that you do not come to assist me, when I am surrounded by the enemy? I have sworn that I will destroy thee, wicked man, that I may do away with this sorcery on my back."

The angry words of Paou were followed by others, and then by blows. Paou, though at the moment far inferior in force, first began the fight, and ultimately sustained a sanguinary defeat, and the loss of sixteen vessels. Our longing for this cruel, detestable race, must be increased by the fact, that the victors massacred all the prisoners—or three hundred men.

This was the death blow to the confederacy which had so long defied the emperor's power, and which might have effected his dethronement. O-po-tae dreading the vengeance of Paou and his mistress, Ching-yih's widow, whose united forces would have quitted his own, gained over his men to his views, and proffered a submission to government, on condition of free pardon, and a proper provision for all.

The government that had made so many lamentable displays of its weakness, was glad to make an unreal parade of its mercy. It was but too happy to grant all the conditions instantly, and, in the fulsome language of its historians, "feeling that compassion is the way of heaven—that it is the right way to govern by righteousness—it therefore redeemed these pirates from destruction, and pardoned their former crimes."

O-po-tae, however, had hardly struck his free flag, and the pirates were hardly in the power of the Chinese, when it was proposed by many that they should all be treacherously murdered. The governor happened to be more honourable and humane, or probably, only more politic than those who made this foul proposal—he knew that such a bloody breach of faith would for ever prevent the pirates still in arms from voluntarily submitting; he knew equally well, even weakened as they were by O-po-tae's defection, that the government could not reduce them by force, and he thought by keeping his faith with them, he might turn the force of those who had submitted against those who still held out, and so destroy the pirates with the pirates. Consequently the eight thousand men, it had been proposed to cut off in cold blood, were allowed to remain uninjured, and their leader, O-po-tae, having changed his name to that of Heo Ben, or "The Lustre of Instruction," was elevated to the rank of an imperial officer.

The widow of Ching-yih, and her favourite Paou, continued for some months to pillage the coast, and to beat the Chinese and mandarins' troops and ships, and seemed almost as strong as before the separation of O-po-tae's flag. But that example was probably operating in the minds of many of the outlaws, and finally the lawless heroine herself, who was the spirit that kept the complicate body together, seeing that O-po-tae had been made a government officer, and that he continued to prosper, began also to think of making her submission.

"I am," said she, "ten times stronger than O-po-tae, and government will perhaps, if I submit, set towards me as they have done with O-po-tae."

A rumour of her intentions having reached shore, the mandarins sent off a certain chow, a doctor of Macao, "who," says the historian, "being already well acquainted with the pirates, did not need any introduction," to enter on preliminaries with them.

When the worthy practitioner presented himself to Paou, that friend concluded he had been committing some crime, and had come for safety to that general refuge, pecorum, the pirate fleet.

The doctor explained, and assured the chief, that if he would submit, government was inclined to treat him and his far more favourably and more honourably than O-po-tae. But if he continued to resist, not only a general arming of all the coast and the rivers, but O-po-tae was to proceed against him.

At this part of his narrative our Chinese historian is again so curious, that I shall quote his words at length.

"When Fei-heung-chow came to Paou, he said: 'Friend Paou, do you know why I come to you?'"

"Paou.—Thou hast committed some crime and comest to me for protection?"

"Chow.—By no means."

"Paou.—You will then know, how it stands concerning the report about our submission, if it is true or false?"

"Chow.—You are again wrong here, sir. What are you in comparison with O-po-tae?"

"Paou.—Who is bold enough to compare me with O-po-tae?"

"Chow.—I know very well that O-po-tae could not come up to you, sir; but I mean only, that since O-po-tae has made his submission, since he has got his pardon and been created a government officer,—how would it be, if you with your whole crew should also submit, and if his excellency should desire to treat you in the same manner, and to give you the same rank as O-po-tae? Your submission would produce more joy to government than the submission of O-po-tae. You should not wait for wisdom to act wisely; you should make up your mind to submit to the government with all your followers. I will assist you in every respect, it would be the means of securing your own happiness and the lives of all your adherents."

"Chang-pau remained like a statue without motion, and Fei-heung-chow went on to say: 'You should think about this affair in time, and not stay till the last moment. Is it not clear that O-po-tae, since you could not agree together, has joined government? He being enraged against you, will fight, united with the forces of the government, for your destruction; and who could help you, so that you might overcome your enemies? If O-po-tae could before vanquish you quite alone, how much more can he now when he is united with government? O-po-tae will then satisfy his hatred against you, and you yourself will soon be taken either at Wei-chow or at Neau-chow. If the merchant vessels of Hwy-chaou, the boats of Kwang-chow, and all the fishing vessels, unite together to surround and attack you in the open sea, you will certainly have enough to do. But even supposing they should not attack you, you will soon feel the want of provisions to sustain you and all your followers. It is always wisdom to provide before things happen; stupidity and folly never think about future events. It is too late to reflect upon events when things have happened; you should, therefore, consider this matter in time!'"

Paou, after being closeted for some time with his mistress, Ching-yih's widow, who gave her high permission for him to make arrangements with Doctor Chow, said he would repair with his fleet to the Bocca Tigris, and there communicate personally with the organs of government.

After two visits had been paid to the pirate fleets by two inferior mandarins, who carried the imperial proclamation of free pardon, and who, at the order of Ching-yih's widow, were treated to a sumptuous banquet by Paou, the governor-general of the province went himself in one vessel to the pirates' ships, that occupied a line of ten le, off the mouth of the river.

As the governor approached, the pirates hoisted their flags, played on their instruments, and fired their guns, so that the smoke rose in clouds, and then bent sail to meet him. On this dense population that were ranged thousands after thousands along the shore, to witness the important reconciliation, became sorely alarmed, and the governor-general seems to have had a strong inclination to run away. But in brief space of time, the long dreaded widow of Ching-yih, supported by her lieutenant Paou, and followed by three other of her principal commanders, mounted the side of the governor's ship, and rushed through the smoke to the spot where his excellency was stationed; where they fell on their hands and knees, shed tears, knocked their heads on the deck before him, and received his gracious pardon, and promises for future kind treatment. They then withdrew satisfied, having promised to give in a list of their ships, and of all else they possessed, within three days.

But the sudden apparition of some large Portuguese ships, and some government war junks, made the pirates suspect treachery. They immediately set sail, and the negotiations were interrupted for several days.

They were at last concluded by the boldness of their female leader. "If the governor general," said this heroine, "a man of the highest rank, could come to us quite alone, why should not I, a mean woman, go to the officers of government? If there be danger in it, I take it all on myself; no person among you need trouble himself about me—my mind is made up, and I will go to Canton!"

Paou said—"If the widow of Ching-yih goes, we must fix a time for her return. If this pass without our obtaining certain information, we must collect all our forces, and go before Canton: this is my opinion as to what ought to be done; comrades, let me hear yours!"

The pirates then, struck with the intrepidity of their chieftainess, and loving her more than ever, answered, "Friend Paou, we have heard thy opinion, but we think it better to wait for the news here, on the water, than to send the wife of Ching-yih alone to be killed." Nor would they allow her to leave the fleet.

Matters were in this state of indecision, when the two inferior mandarins who had before visited the pirates, ventured out to repeat their visit. These officers protested no treachery had been intended, and pledged themselves, that if the widow of Ching-yih would repair to the governor, she would be kindly received, and every thing settled to their hearts' satisfaction.

With this, in the language of our old ballads, upspoke Mistress Ching,—"You say well, gentlemen: and I will go myself to Canton with some other of our ladies, accompanied by you!" And accordingly, she and a number of the pirates' wives with their children, went fearlessly to Canton, arranged every thing, and found they had not been deceived. The fleet soon followed. On its arrival every vessel was supplied with pork and wine, and every man (in lieu, it may be supposed, of his share of the vessels, and plundered property he resigned) received at the same time a bill for a certain quantity of money. Those who wished it, could join the military force of government for pursuing the remaining pirates; and those who objected, dispersed and withdrew in the country. "This is the manner in which the great red squadron of the pirates was pacified."

The valiant Paou, following the example of his rival O-po-tae, entered into the service of government, and proceeded against such of his former associates and friends as would not accept the pardon offered them. There was some hard fighting, but the two renegades successively took the chief Shih Uri, forced the redoubtable captain, styled "The Scourge of the Eastern ocean," to surrender himself, drove "Frog's Meal," another dreadful pirate, to Manila, and finally, and within a few months, destroyed or dissipated the "wasps of the ocean" altogether.

"From that period," saith our Chinese historian, in conclusion, "ships began to pass and repass in tranquillity. All became quiet on the rivers, and tranquil on the four seas. People lived in peace and plenty. The country began to assume a new appearance. Men sold their arms and bought oxen to plough their fields; they burned sacrifices, said prayers on the tops of the hills, and rejoiced themselves by singing ballads and sermons during day time"—and, (grand climax to all!) "the governor of the province, in consideration of his valuable services in the pacification of the pirates, was allowed by an edict of the "Son of Heaven," to wear peacocks' feathers with two eyes!"

MARY READ AND ANNE BONNEY.

Two female pirates named Mary Read and Anne Bonney being frequently mentioned incidentally by historians, the following particulars of them may be worth preserving. The first, Mary Read, was an officer's widow, who assumed the dress of a man, and shipped as a sailor, but the vessel being captured by the pirates who hailed from the island of Providence, she remained among them, and was as lawless and savage as any of their number. On her trial it was declared by her companions, that in time of action, no person on board was more resolute, or ready to board, or to undertake any thing that was hazardous, than she and Anne Bonney; that on one occasion, when they were attacked and captured, none kept the deck except these two women and a single sailor. They called to those below, to come up and fight like men; but finding they did not obey, Mary Read fired her arms down the hold, killed one of the crew and wounded several others. This charge she denied, though it would seem she was not deficient in bravery, for on one occasion she challenged one of the pirates and fought him on shore, for some offence to her lover.

Johnson relates a curious anecdote of these two females; so completely was Mary Read disguised by her dress, that sailing in company with Anne Bonney, the latter actually fell in love with her.

Mary was tried and found guilty by the English courts, but died of a fever in prison.

Anne Bonney's history as related by Johnson, entitles her to a place in the annals of the most infamous of her sex. She went to sea with the piratical Captain Rackman, and bore him company in many of his expeditions, no body on board being more courageous, or ready to lend a hand in perpetrating the darkest deeds of blood. It appears she was reprieved from time to time after conviction, and was not executed, though what became of her is not known.

SEMI-SERIOUS OBSERVATIONS

OF AN

Italian Exile,

DURING HIS RESIDENCE IN ENGLAND.

BY COUNT PECCHIO.

Preface to the first American Edition.

The following observations on England, issued in London last January, remarkable for their originality of thought and expression, as well as for the acknowledged excellence of their portraiture, are from the pen of a learned Italian. We have not read a more agreeable new book for some time; the remarks are those of a sensible dispassionate observer, who is content to eulogise where praise is due, but who nevertheless treats his hosts with some wholesome castigation. Notwithstanding the remarks on religious sects, at which a few may feel disposed to cavil, the author has evidently endeavored in this instance, as in others, to confine himself within the bounds of charity and good taste; our readers must decide how far he has succeeded. The "Advertisement" to the English translation says:—

Giuseppe, Count Pecchio, the author of the following pages, is not altogether unknown to the English public. In the year 1823 he published some letters on the Spanish revolution; in 1824, a journal of military and political events in Spain during the preceding twelve months; and in 1825 (in the New Monthly Magazine) a narrative of a tour in Greece. A few years before he had fled his own country—the north of Italy—to escape the consequences of the share he had taken in the unsuccessful Piedmontese revolution. He had, in the first instance, taken refuge in England, but the climate being injurious to his health, he conceived the hope of finding a more congenial residence in Spain, where he was connected by friendship with some of the most distinguished public characters;—his expulsion from that country he terms a second exile. Since his return from Greece he has, we believe, uninterruptedly continued in England, has married an English lady, and now resides at Brighton.

The observations contained in the volume before the reader will often be found particularly striking, from the contrast they present to those of other travellers. Whatever opinion may be formed of Count Pecchio's mode of thinking, it cannot at any rate be denied that he thinks for himself. This translation presents a complete duplicate of all his statements and opinions; faults, errors, and omissions not excepted. It was at first intended to add a few notes, pointing out where the count had fallen into error, but it was soon found that if this plan were pursued, the work would have been, perhaps, more augmented than improved. Most of his mistakes are such as the reader will, with a smile, correct: we are in no danger of believing, on Count Pecchio's authority, that in England all the boys can ride, and none of the children ever cry. Besides, his slips, though they may throw no light on English character, very often give us an insight, the more valuable from being unconscious, into the Italian. We have however, ventured with some hesitation, to correct a few verbal errors. Thus, in his account of the Nottingham assizes, when the count informs us that he saw a man capitally convicted of the crime of abigato, he adds, in a parenthesis, as the English equivalent, the word horse-dealing: as we were not previously aware that this crime, however heinous, was visited with a punishment so severe as that of death, we have, on our own responsibility, changed the term to horse-stealing.

With these few introductory remarks, we commend Count Pecchio, in his English dress, to the benevolence of his English readers.

NEW SERIES—9

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

"Ah!" replied Sancho, weeping, "don't die, your honour, but follow my advice, and live many years;—because the silliest thing a man can do in this life is to die without any reason, without being killed by any body, or finished off by any other hands than melancholy's." This advice of the faithful Sancho Panza always appeared to me the plainest and the wisest of all the recipes philosophers have prescribed for adversity. Putting it then into practice, instead of pouring forth useless lamentations, or hanging down my head like a weeping willow, I have acquired the habit, in travelling, of throwing upon paper the observation that, from time to time, new objects awakened in me. In this way I have beguiled a good deal of the leisure of my exile; and fortunate I am, if, by these sketches, I can excite some moments of the leisure of my countrymen. My book cannot enter into competition with any other; it is but a miscellany like the olla-podrida of the Spaniards, that favourite dish of my favourite Sancho Panza. Let him who wishes to become acquainted with English politics, read M. de Pradt; him who wishes to know the statistics of England, refer to the work of Baron Dupin. Let him who desires to understand the machinery of the admirable administration of justice in England, consult the work of M. Cotto. Let him who wishes to become familiar with English manners, read the elegant descriptions of the American, Washington Irving, in his "Sketch-Book." But let him who does not love science and information well enough to read these; who admires profiles rather than full lengths; who reads for reading sake, and in the way the journals of the fashions and the opera-books are read, skipping, singing, and yawning—let him, I say, read the following observations of

GIUSEPPE PECCHIO.

ARRIVAL IN LONDON.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

When, on his first arrival in England, the foreigner is seated on the roof of a carriage which bears him towards London at the rate of eight miles an hour, he cannot help believing himself hurried along in the car of Pluto to the descent into the realms of darkness, especially if he have just left Spain or Italy, the favourite regions of the sun. In the midst of wonder, he can hardly avoid, at first setting off, being struck with an impression of melancholy. An eternal cloud of smoke which involves and penetrates every thing; a fog which, during the months of November and December, now grey, now red, now of a dirty yellow, always obscures, and sometimes completely extinguishes, the light of day, cannot fail to give a lugubrious and Dantesque air to this immeasurable and interminable capital. He, above all, who is just arrived from a sunny country, experiences, as I said before, the same effect as when, from the bright light of noon, he enters a half-closed chamber: at the first glance he sees nothing,—but afterwards, by little and little, he discerns the harp, the lady, the sofa, and the other agreeable objects in the apartment. Caracciolo, the ambassador to George the Third, was not in the wrong when he said, that the moon of Naples was warmer than the sun of London. In fact, for several days the sun only appears in the midst of the darkness visible, like a great yellow spot. London is a "panorama of the sun," in which he is often better seen than felt. On the 24th of November, 1826, there was an eclipse visible in England: the sky that day happened to be clear, but nobody took the least notice of the phenomenon, because the fog produces in one year more eclipses in England than there ever were, from other causes, perhaps since the creation of the world.

One day I was strolling in Hyde Park, in company with a Peravian; it was one of the fine days of London, but the sun was so obscured by the fog, that it had taken the form of a great globe of fire. "What do you think of the sun to-day?" said I to my companion. "I thought," replied the adorer of the true sun, "that the end of the world was come! Was it not a singular caprice of Fortune, that where there is the least light, the greatest Newton should have been born to analyse it?" It appears to me like the other singularity,—that Alfieri, who analysed liberty so well, should have been born in Italy, where they have less of it, perhaps, than anywhere else. After all, what of it? The English, by force of industry, have contrived to manufacture for themselves even a sun. Is it not indeed a sun,—that gas, which, running underground through all the island, illuminates the whole in a fiat lux? It is a sun, without twilight and without setting, that rises and disappears like a flash of lightning, and that too just when we want it. The gas illumination of London is so beautiful, that M. Sismondi had good reason to say, that in London, in order to see, you must wait till night. The place of St. Antonio, at Cadiz, on a starry summer's evening,—the noisy Strada Toledo of Naples, silvered by the moon,—the Parisian Tivoli, blazing with fireworks;—none of them can sustain a comparison with the Regent street of London, lighted by gas. Nor is this artificial sun an exclusive advantage of the capital; it shines every where with the impartiality of the great planet, illuminating alike the palace and the hovel. Whoever travels in England by night, in the country around Leeds, Nottingham, Derby, or Manchester, imagines he sees on every side the enchanted palaces of the fairies, and shining in the light of a thousand torches: but they are in reality no other than very large and very lofty manufactories of cotton, woollen, or linen. The English nation is free from the defect of carping at new inventions. Accustomed, for more than a century, to see improvements of every sort at every turn, when a new discovery presents itself, they examine it, study it, adopt the good part of it, and reject the bad. Gas has many drawbacks. If it escapes into the atmosphere without burning, it stinks horribly; if it spreads itself in a close chamber, it takes fire at the contact of a candle, and may occasion death; the gasometer (or great receptacle of gas) may explode, and do injury both to person and property. No matter!—The English carefully guard against these accidents, and, finding, in the balance of their good sense, the advantages greater than the disadvantages, have adopted gas for the beauty, continuity, and celerity of its light. Every city of ten, twenty, forty, or fifty thousand inhabitants, has a gasometer, which is singly sufficient to dispense light to all the streets and all the houses. Every shopkeeper pays so much (if he chooses) for this light, in proportion to the time and the quantity of flame, calculated according to the number of apertures from which it issues. A company conducts the business (for in England all great undertakings are conducted by an association of private resources,—that is, by a company), and their shares are shifted from hand to hand, augment the mass of circulating capital, and rise or fall in price according to the annual profits. "Gas gives a finer light than tallow candles, at one half, and even one third, the expense. The cotton factory of Messrs. Philips and Lee, at Manchester, perhaps the largest lighted by gas, was the first of all to make use of it, in the year 1808; including the wear and tear, and the interest of the capital employed in the pipes and apparatus, the annual expense amounts to 600*l.* sterling;—if they were to burn tallow candles for two hours every evening, the expense would be 2000*l.*—Vide The History of the Origin and Progress of Gas Lighting, by MR. MATTHEWS.

The English have made the great discovery, that useful inventions increase the conveniences and the wealth of nations. Thus, notwithstanding some accidents that now and then occur to the steam vessels, the English continue to avail themselves of them, because they have calculated that if they did not exist, shipwrecks would be more frequent, the conveniences of life would be fewer, and the ease and rapidity of travelling much reduced.

But the English have another remedy for the scarcity of sun. They follow the example of poets and philosophers, who, when they are deficient in riches, take to praising poverty;—not being able to praise the sun, they sing the praises of the fireside, and the delights of winter. Ovid, or rather Macpherson, the author of Ossean, instead of the sun, apostrophises the moon. He takes pleasure in describing, as if they were delightful, the whistling of the winds, and the roaring of the torrents. He compares the locks of a youthful beauty to mist gilded by the sun. Instead of depicting a valley enamelled with flowers, he spurns so soft and effeminate an image, to paint the aspect of a frozen lake, and the shaking thistles on its banks. Cowper, in his poem of "The Task," seems completely to enjoy himself in describing a winter's evening, when the rain rattles down, the wind whistles, and the wagoner growls and grumbles on his way; whilst in-doors, the fire burns, the newspaper arrives, the exhilarating tea glows on the table, and the family are all collected round the hearth. Some poet, whose name I forget, (I think it is Byron,) even gives to darkness the epithet "lovely." Thomson, the bard of "The Seasons," was a better poet even than usual, when he sung of winter. He calls the horrors of winter "congenial horrors;" and after describing the mountains of snow, that, with the roar of thunder, dart from precipice to precipice, to the bottom of the Grison valleys, destroying and burying in the depth of night shepherds and their flocks, huts and villages, single travellers and whole troops of marching soldiers, he imagines himself, with epicurean voluptuousness, in a solitary and well sheltered country-house, before a blazing fire, and lighted by splendid chandeliers, reading at his ease the finest works of the ancients.

"Now, all amid the rigours of the year,
In the wild depths of winter, while without
The ceaseless winds blow ice,—be my retreat,
Between the growling forest and the shore
Beat by the boundless multitude of waves
A rural, shelter'd, solitary scene,
Where ruddy fire and beaming tapers join
To cheer the gloom.—There studious let me sit,
And hold high converse with the mighty dead,
Sages of ancient time, as gods revered,
As gods beneficent—who bless'd mankind
With arts, with arms,—and humanised a world."

Thus all the poets have conspired to make their countrymen in love with their cloudy heavens, and induce them to believe themselves fortunate that they are born in a delightful climate. And what matters it that it is not true? Are not the tricks and illusions of the imagination, pleasures as substantial as actual realities? Montesquieu said, "If the English are not free, at least they believe they are, which is much the same." So we may say, if the English have not a fine climate, they believe they have, and that is as good. I was once praising to a young English lady, the pure, jolly, mother-of-peach heavens of Madrid, of Naples, of Athens, of Smyrna. She replied, "I should be tired to death by such a perpetual sunshine: the variety and phantasmagoria of our clouds must surely be much more beautiful."

I have quoted Montesquieu—I must quote him again, and still on the subject of the sun. In spite of Helvetius and Filangieri, who oppose his theory of the influence of climate, I could almost venture to believe, that if the English are active in business, profound thinkers, and good fathers of families, it is owing to their having so little sun. True, that with the false light by which they are almost always surrounded, the English have not been able to become celebrated painters; that they are not, and perhaps never will be so. But, in recompense for this, they can work at the spinning wheel and the loom many more hours than the countrymen of Murillo or Raphael. An English workman, some years ago (before parliament restricted the hours of labour to twelve), used to work about sixteen hours a day. Ortes, the Italian political economist, calculates the medium labour of an Italian at not more than eight hours a day. The difference is great, but I do not on that account believe the statement erroneous: the extremes of summer and winter (in some parts of Italy); very sensitive and irritable nerves; the beautiful serene sky that is ever tempting to an out-door walk; all these do not allow the Italian to give a long and steady application to labour. There is nothing of this kind to tempt the English waver to abandon his loom. He is like one of those blind horses, which are continually turning round and round in a mill, without anything being able to divert them from their unvarying occupation.

Necessity is the goad of idleness, and the constant patron of industry; the Spaniard (and so with all the sons of the sun) who has no need of stockings, of a fletcher, chief, nor a coat; who is content with his cigar and his gaspacho; who sleeps on the bare ground, and who feels no curiosity, because he believes himself the favourite child of God, placed in a terrestrial paradise. "He who says Spain, says every thing," (says the Spanish proverb), laughs at fashion, at books, at voyages and travels, at luxury, at elegance; he is a Diogenes in his tub, who wants nothing but the sun. 'The indolence, the natural laziness,' of the southern nations, (which was once conquered, and may be conquered once again, by education and political institutions,) is not a defect for which they ought to be blamed, any more than their sobriety is a virtue for which they ought to be praised: the blame or the merit is all the sun's. The Englishman, on the contrary, receives from his climate a multitude of necessities, all so many spurs to industry and exertion. He has need of more substantial food, of constant firing, of cravats, double cravats, coats, great coats; tea, brandy, spirits; a larger wardrobe, on account of the increased consumption caused by the smoke and the wet, &c. &c. &c. Comfort is in the mouth of every Englishman at every moment; it is the half of his life. My own countryman make every effort, and with reason, to obtain the pleasures of the life to come: the English, with no less reason, to procure the pleasures of the present. The word "comfort" is the source of the riches and the power of England. Idleness, in this country, necessarily leads to suicide, because it is the privation of every thing. Nature has here, as it were, denied every thing to man, but in recompense has bestowed on him the power and the perseverance to procure every thing for himself. "Either read, or walk, or play," said a good mother, in my hearing, to a little girl of nine years old, who happened to be standing idle. What the lady meant to imply was, that any thing was better than doing nothing. In Italy there is a proverb, that idleness is the parent of every vice: since vice procures us a momentary pleasure, this proverb is adapted rather to induce than to deter. In England the case is altered, and idleness might be called the parent of every misery.

"Lying a-bed and doing nothing at all," so sweet to Berni, would be frightful to an Englishman, who hates laziness as much as a Spaniard or a lazzarone hates work. It is a common opinion, in England, that there can be no happiness without occupation. I know not whether this opinion is a just one, because happiness depends so much on the imagination. The Faker, who rots in idleness with a yoke on his neck (a true picture of the idle and enslaved nations), believes himself happy, and perhaps is so. But, that idleness is the companion of poverty and ignorance, and that labour, on the contrary, is the companion of opulence and enlightenment, Spain and England are two living witnesses.

That frequent absence of the sun which makes the artisan more laborious, renders man also a more thinking animal. Who would not become a philosopher, if he was shut up in the house for so many hours by the inclemencies of the weather, with a cheerful fire, quiet and obedient servants, a good humoured wife, and silence within doors and without? The profundity of the English writers is a product of the climate, as much as the iron, the tin, and the coal of the island. The sun disperses families, and scatters them abroad; a good fire blazing up the chimney attracts and draws them together again. "The family," in cold countries, is an equivalent for our "society" and our theatres. It is one of the wants of the heart and the intellect. A national song, which is heard every where, from the splendid stage of the Covent-garden to the humblest hovel in Scotland, is called "Home, sweet Home!" (Oh casa! oh dulce casa!) and home is truly sweet in England. In the southern countries every thing gives way to public places, and public amusements. The houses, which, for the most part, are only used for sleeping in, are often in bad repair, and often very poorly furnished. Where, on the contrary, domestic life is all in all, it is natural to think of rendering it pleasant; hence the reciprocal respect, the docility, the agreement of the members of a family, the punctuality of service, the universal neatness, and the excellence of the furniture, convenient, self-moving, and obedient, almost as though it were endowed with life, like the ancient manufactures of Vulcan. The families have a form similar to that of the government; they are neither republics nor absolute monarchies. There is a head, but there is no tyrant in them. Every father is like the King of England,—limited in his powers by reason, by custom, and by the general interest. The families are not however patriarchal: that is, a mixture of several generations, in which the head is—

"King, priest, and parent of his growing state."

Here the head is only the father. The "homeborn happiness," so well defined by Cowper, is incompatible with the diversity of ages and dispositions. Every marriage forms a new family, and it is very rare to find under the same roof the implacable wives and their mothers in law, and the two placable husbands and their brothers in law:—

"Blest be that spot where cheerful guests retire,
To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire:
Blest that abode, where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair;
Blest be those feasts, with simple plenty crown'd,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jest, or pranks that never fail,
Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale:
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good."

Poetry is the painting of the English, and, instead of representing, as the Flemings do in their pictures, the holiday pleasures of their rustic fellow countrymen, the English, in their poetry, vie with each other in describing the less sensual contentment of their families, which compensates and corrects the rigours of the climate:—

"Content can spread a charm, Redress the clime, and all its rage disarm."

But the most beautiful sun of England is Liberty; this is its cornucopia. What were Mexico or Peru in comparison! Warned by a delicious sun, they were rendered barren and desolate by tyranny. England, less favoured by the great planet, is made fertile, and blessed with every good, by liberty. Addison wrote from Italy, to Lord Halifax, in 1701, in perhaps the most elegant verses he ever composed,—

"How has kind heaven adorn'd the happy land,
And scattered blessings with a wasteful hand!
But what avail her unexhausted stores,
Her blooming mountains, and her sunny shores,
With all the gifts that heav'n and earth impart,
The smiles of nature, and the charms of art,
While proud oppression in her valleys reigns,
And tyranny usurps her happy plains?
Oh! Liberty, thou goddess heav'nly bright,
Profuse of bliss, and pregnant with delight!
Thee, goddess, thee, Britannia's isle adores,
How has she oft exhausted all her stores,
How oft in fields of death thy presence sought,
Nor thinks the mighty prize too dearly bought!
Thy Liberty that crowns Britannia's isle,
And makes her barren rocks, and her bleak mountains smile.

Others with towering piles may please the sight,
And in their proud aspiring domes delight.
'Tis Britain's care to watch o'er Europe's fate,
And hold in balance each contending state;
To threaten bold presumptuous kings with war,
And answer her afflicted neighbour's pray'r!"

Almost all the divine race of poets—divine, because always enamoured of liberty—have endeavoured to console their native country for the want of a constantly brilliant sun, by similar observations to these. Even Waller, who flattered equally both Cromwell and Charles the Second, in the panegyric he composed upon the former, says:—

"Angels and we have this prerogative,
That none can at our happy seats arrive,
While we descend at pleasure to invade
The bad with vengeance, and the good to aid,
Our little world, the image of the great,
Like her amid the boundless ocean set,
Of her own growth hath all that nature craves,
And all that's rare as tribute from the waves.
As Egypt does not on the clouds rely,
But to the Nile owes more than to the sky,
So what our earth and what our heaven denies,
Our ever constant friend the sea supplies.
The taste of hot Arabia's spice we know,
Free from the scorching sun that makes it grow,
Without the worms in Persia's silks we shine,
And, without plucking, drink of every vine.
To dig for wealth, we weary not our limbs,
Gold, though the heaviest metal, heaviest swims,
Onrs is the harvest where the Indians mow,
We plough the deep, and reap what others sow,
Things of the noblest kind our own soil breeds,
Stout are our men, and warlike are our steeds,
Rome, though her eagle through the world had flown,
Could never make this island all her own!"

LONDON HOUSES.

If the sky is dark, not less gloomy is the whole first appearance of London to him who enters it by the Dover road. The smoky colour of the houses gives it the appearance of a city that has been burnt. If to this be added the silence which prevails in the midst of a population of, perhaps, one million four hundred thousand persons, all in motion (so that one seems to be in a theatre of Chinese shades), and the wearisome uniformity of the houses, almost all built in the same style, like a city of the beavers, it will be easy to imagine, that on first entering this darksome hive, the smile of pleased surprise soon gives way to a gloomy wonder. This was the old English style of building, which still prevails in the country.

But, since the English have substituted the blue pill for suicide, or, still better, a journey to Paris; and, instead of Young's Night thoughts, read the romances of Walter Scott, they have cheered up their houses with a coat of white, and have recently rebuilt the western part of the capital "west end" in a gay and more varied style of architecture. I do not mean to assert that the English have become a tribe of skippers and laughers, like the young Parisian of eighteen—they still delight in ghosts, witches, haunted church-yards, and a whole host of monstrosities. We be to him who should venture to write a romance without some apparition fitted to make "each particular hair stand on end!"

The houses are small and fragile. The first night I spent in a lodging-house, I seemed to myself still on board the vessel; the walls were equally slender, and, in great part, of wood, the chambers small, and the staircase like a companion ladder; the walls are generally so thin, that they allow the passage of sounds without interruption. The lodgers would hear one another talking, but that they are accustomed to speak in an under tone. I could hear the murmur of the conversation of my neighbour overhead,—my zenith, as well as that of the other neighbour beneath my feet, like the opposite point nadir; and I distinguished, at intervals, the words, "Very fine weather,—indeed—very fine—comfort—comfortable—great comfort!"—words which occur as often in their conversation as stops and commas in a book. In a word, the houses are ventriloquous. As I said before, they are all uniform. In a three-story house, there are three bedrooms, one over the other, and three parlours in the same situation, so that the population is as it were housed in layers like merchandise—like the cheese in the storerooms at Lodi and Codogno. The English have not chosen without design this (I will venture to call it) naval architecture. The advantages they derive from living in houses of small size and little durability are these: in general, a house is only built for 99 years; if it outlive this term, it belongs to the proprietor of the ground on which it is built. It seldom happens, therefore, that they attain to any great longevity; on the contrary, they sometimes tumble to pieces before the natural period of their existence.

The English, who are better arithmeticians than architects, have discovered, that, by building in this slippery manner, they consume less capital, and that consequently the annual interest and the annual loss of principal are proportionately less. There is another advantage: by this method, posterity is not hampered or tyrannised over. Every generation can choose and build its own houses, according to its own caprices, and its own necessities; and, although in a great measure composed of wood, all the houses are as it were incombustible, by means of the insurance companies, which guarantee the value of the houses, the furniture, and every thing else. A fire is no misfortune, but merely a temporary inconvenience to the inmates; a something to look at for the passengers, and an entertaining paragraph for the newspapers. To an Englishman, his house is his Gibraltar; he must not only be inviolable, but absolute, without dispute or fuss. He prefers living in a shell like an oyster, to living in a palace with all the annoyance of a hen-roost. Independence is the vital air of the Englishman. Hence as soon as a son is married, he leaves home, and like the polyph, which when cut in pieces make so many polypi more, goes to evolve elsewhere another family. Numerous and patriarchal families belong to agricultural communities. Among commercial nations, which have factories and colonies in all parts of the globe, when the son has received a suitable education, he abandons the parental nest, and like the birds, goes elsewhere to build one for himself.

"Hail, independence, hail! heaven's next best gift
To that of life and an immortal soul;
The life of life, that to the banquet hied
And sober meal gives taste, to the how'd roof
Fair dream'd repose, and to the cottage charms!"

The love of independence, that "life of life," as Thomson calls it in his poem on Liberty, manifests itself even in the churches, where every English family has a seat of its own, surrounded by a fence. Whoever travels in England will observe, how, even in the smallest villages, the meanest habitations are separated from one another by a hedge, a wall, or a paling. No empire can have its boundaries better defined, or can guard its independence with more jealousy.

Why are not the English good dancers? Because they do not practise. The houses are so small and so weak, that he who would cut a caper in the third story must run the risk of thundering like a bombshell down into the kitchen, which is placed under ground. This is no mere hyperbole of mine. One of the stipulations on taking a house in London, is often that no dancing shall take place in it. Why is it that the English gesticulate so little, and have their arms almost always glued to their sides? For the same reason, I believe: the rooms are so small that it is impossible to wave one's arm without breaking something, or inconveniencing somebody.

Some people are quite thunderstruck at the silence which prevails among the inhabitants of London. But how could one million four hundred thousand persons live together without silence? The torrent of men, women, and children, carts, carriages, and horses, from the Strand to the Exchange, is so strong, that it is said that in winter there are two degrees of Fahrenheit difference between the atmosphere of this long line of street, and that of the West End. I have not ascertained the truth of this; but from the many avenues there are to the Strand, it is very likely to be correct. From Charing Cross to the Royal Exchange is an encyclopædia of the world. An apparent anarchy prevails, but without confusion or disorder. The rules which the poet Gay lays down in his "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London," for walking with safety along this tract of about three miles, appear to me unnecessary. The habit of traversing this whirlpool renders the passage easy to every one, without disputes, without accidents, without punctilio, as if there were no obstacle whatever. I suppose it is the same thing at Pekin. The silence then of the passengers is the consequence of the multiplicity of business. I do not say it by way of epigram, but, if Naples should ever have a population of a million and a half, it would be necessary for even Neapolitan windpipes to put themselves under some restraint! It is only in Spain that silence is the companion of idleness. This is perhaps the perfection of idleness; idleness at its ne plus ultra.

In London I have often risen early, in order to be present at the spectacle of the resurrection of a million and a half of people. This great monster of a capital, like an immense giant awaking, shows the first signs of life in the extremities. Motion begins at the circumference, and by little and little, goes on getting strength, and pushing towards the centre, till at ten o'clock commences the full hubbub, which goes on continually increasing till four o'clock, the Change hour. It seems as if the population followed the laws of the tide until this hour: it now continues flowing from the circumference to the Exchange; at half past four, when the Exchange is shut, the ebb begins; and currents of people, coaches, and horses, rush from the Exchange to the circumference.

Among an industrious nation, incessantly occupied, panting for riches, man, or physical force, is a valuable commodity. Man is dear, and it is therefore expedient to be very economical of him. It is not as in the countries of indolence, where the man and the earth alike have little or no value. A Turkish effendi, or gentleman, always walks about with a train of useless servants at his heels. In the same manner a Polish nobleman, or a grandee of Spain, consumes a great quantity of men, who are otherwise unproductive. I was told, that the Duke of Medini Celi has in his pay four hundred servants, and that he goes to the Prado in a carriage worse than a Parisian putatche. It was the same in England when there was a foreign commerce, and no home manufactures. Not knowing in what way to consume their surplus revenues, the old English land owner used to maintain a hundred, and, in some cases, even a thousand followers. At the present day, the greatest houses have not more than ten or twelve servants; and, setting aside the wealthy, who are always an exception in every nation, and taking the greatest number, it cannot be denied that in England, and especially in London, there is a very great saving, both of time and of servants. But how can this be reconciled with the loudly vaunted comfort of the English? Thus: the milk, the bread, the butter, the beer, the fish, the meat, the newspaper, the letters,—all are brought to the house every day, at the same hour, without fail, by the shopkeepers and the postmen. It is well known that all the street-doors are kept shut, as it is the custom in Florence and the other cities of Tuscany. In order that the neighbourhood should not be disturbed, it has become an understood thing for these messengers to give a single rap on the knocker, or a single pull at the bell, which communicates with the underground kitchen, where the servants are. There is another conventional sign for visits, which consists in a rapid succession of knocks, the more loud and noisy according to the real or assumed consequence or fashion of the visitor. On this system, Parini makes his hero talk in public in a loud and discordant voice, that every one may hear him, and pay the same respect to his accents as to those of "the great thunderer." Even in London, the magnanimous heroes of fashion announce themselves to the obtuse senses of the vulgar with "echoing blows," like those of the hammer of Bronze.

This custom requires punctuality in servants, and an unflinching attendance at their posts. The price of every thing is fixed, so that there is no room for haggling, dispute, or gossip. All this going and coming of buyers and sellers is noiseless. Many bakers ride about London in vehicles so rapid, elastic, and elegant, that an Italian dandy would not disdain to appear in one of them at the Corso. The butchers may be frequently met with, conveying the meat to their distant customers, mounted on fiery steeds, and dashing along at full gallop. A system like this requires inviolable order, and a scrupulous division of time. For this reason there are clocks and watches every where,—on every steeple, and sometimes on all the four sides of a steeple; in the pocket of every one; in the kitchen of the lowest journeyman. This is a nation working to the stroke of the clock, like an orchestra playing to the "time" of the leader, or a regiment marching to the sound of the drum. Nothing can be more ingenious than the various ways in which the English contrive to mark the division of time. In some machines, for example, at every certain number of strokes, the machine rings a bell to inform the workmen of the fact. The tread-mill, introduced for a punishment and an employment in the houses of correction, also rings a bell every time it makes a certain number of revolutions. In the wool-carding manufactory at Manchester there is a species of clock to ascertain if the watchmen, whose duty it is to guard against fire, has kept awake all the night. If, every quarter of an hour, he omits to pull a rope which hangs from the wall outside, the clock within notes down and reveals his negligence in the morning.

One shopman, therefore, in London, supplies the place of forty or fifty servants: the shops may be distant, and remotely situated, without any inconvenience. The shopkeepers themselves do not remain idle, or, instead of men, in some places lads or children are employed. The newspapers are circulated from house to house at a penny an hour; the carrier is a boy of ten or twelve years old, active as a sprite, exact as time, who brings them and takes them away.

By this system, the servants remain at home, with nothing to divert them from their occupations. The servant maids, especially, very seldom go out during all the week, until the arrival of Sunday sets them at liberty for three or four hours. It follows, also, that an English family has no need of keeping any great store of provisions in the house; there is in consequence less occupation of room, and less occasion for capital, less care, less waste, less smell, and less wear and tear.

TEA GARDENS.

How to get through the supremely dull and wearisome English Sunday is always a puzzling problem. This country, all alive, all in motion, on other days, is, as it were, struck with a fit of apoplexy on the Sunday. In general, the foreigner, to make his escape from the "solemn sadness," climbs at ten in the morning upon one of the unfailing four-horse stages, at Charing Cross or Piccadilly, and contrives, at any rate, to get himself whirled away from London. He goes to Richmond, takes a quiet stroll in the beautiful park, admires the tortuous bend of the Thames,—which will appear to him a muddy or a golden stream, as he is in a poetic or prosaic humour,—and pays at an enormous rate for a dinner, seasoned with the formal bows of servants in silk stockings, who are dressed in black from toe to toe, like an advocate of Turin. Or he goes to Greenwich to admire another beautiful park, the famous observatory, and the magnificent hospital for invalid seamen; and takes his dinner in sight of the many vessels sailing past on their return from China or the Indies. Or, if he wishes for a more economical excursion, he goes to gaze on the lovely hill of Hampstead, commiserating London, enveloped in its cloud of smoke, and congratulating himself on having made his escape from it. All these are good preservatives against the bore of Sunday, but it is not in any of these beautiful, but, notwithstanding, melanchely places, nor yet at the brilliant—and serious—promenade in Hyde-park, that a foreigner must seek to acquire a knowledge of the nation. John Bull does not go to show his paces in Hyde-park or Kensington gardens, nor to feed himself with poetical beauties, and compose romantic pastorals in Windsor-forest. If you wish to see that marvellous personage, who has been the admiration and the laughing-stock of Europe for more than a century; who clothes almost all the world; who gains battles by sea and by land without much boasting about it; who works as much as three, and cats and drinks enough for six; who is the pawnbroker and moneylender to all the kings and all the republics on the face of the earth, and is yet, in a manner, bankrupted at home, and is sometimes like Midas, furnishing with hunger in the midst of gold—you must seek him elsewhere. In the winter you must descend into the subterranean taverns. There, round a blazing sea-coal fire, you will find seated the English working men, well dressed, well shod, smoking drinking, reading,—and holding their tongues. The schools of natural instruction, and the Sunday schools which are kept open gratuitously by all classes of dissenters, for the education of the poor children belonging to their sect, have made the English people well acquainted with reading, writing, and arithmetic. In Scotland, even before the mutual instruction system there existed parochial schools, in which, besides reading and writing, the scholars were taught the rudiments of Latin grammar and psalmody. It is well known that these Scotch schools produced a great number of poets,—among them, James Beattie, author of "The Minstrel," and Burns, a humble farmer, who became, without a rival, the Theocritus of modern times. For this class of readers there are published a number of Sunday newspapers which contain an abridgement of all the intelligence, anecdotes, and observations, which have appeared in the daily newspapers in the course of the week. Thus the blacksmith and the weaver are as well acquainted with the great events which are passing, as the first speakers in parliament. This is not a matter of trifling importance: it is in these taverns, and amid the smoke of tobacco and the fumes of porter, that public opinion takes its rise, and its original form,—that it reaches its first stage. It is here that the conduct of every citizen is weighed; this is the road which leads to the capitol or the Tarpeian rock; it is here that the love of country and the love of glory are kindled, that the services rendered to the public by zealous patriots are made known, that applause and disapprobation take their origin; it was here, that arose the triumph of Burdett when he left the Tower, and the curses on Castlereagh when he descended into the tomb; it is here that begins the censure or the approval of a new law; and it is here that the rewards of desert, or the rebuffs of demerit, are prepared against the time of election. The tavern is the forum of the English with this difference, that there is no dispute or contest. Whether from the climate, temperament, or education, whatever may be the reason, certain it is, that in these taverns more quietness, order, and decorum, are observed, than in our churches; and these tavern statesmen, after they have filled themselves full of beer and mixed liquors, instead of seeking for quarrels, fall directly on the pavement, "as falls a body dead."

In the summer, John Bull likes after dinner to cheer his eyes with a glimpse of the country and the green. The nation altogether has a particular love for trees and flowers. The lord has, in his parks, oaks of a thousand years' growth, untouched by the axe,—hot-houses full of exotic plants, exquisite fruits, and the rarest flowers; there is not a cottage in England which has not before it a little piece of ground for the cultivation of flowers; and even the poor town imprisoned artisan works at his loom in sight of pots of flowers, placed on the window sill (with a wind no less generous than my lord's) in order that the passengers also may enjoy the sight of them. The love of flowers is in itself a great sign of civilisation.

From time immemorial there have existed in England footpaths for general use across the fields belonging to private individuals. Some years ago the land owners, every where insatiable, endeavoured to close these footways, and deprive the public of the healthful and innocent recreation of walking in them. What was the consequence? In almost every county a society has been formed for defending the rights and recreations of the people. This will sufficiently show how nearly the people have their rights at heart,—and how dearly they love their rural walks.

In the neighbourhood of London there are a great many gardens, planted with large and shady trees, called Tra Gardens, where the workmen with their families go to take tea after dinner, or to drink the "nut-brown ale." One of the most-beautiful of these is Cumberland Garden, on the banks of the Thames, near Vauxhall. All over the gardens are scattered a number of clean little tables, around which are collected groups of four or six workmen, smoking with long white earthen pipes, (which are supplied by the landlord, filled with tobacco, for a penny,) leaning back, and throwing forth from time to time with the clouds of smoke, some imperfect sentence, just as we read Corporal Trim and the captain did, in Tristram Shandy. He who has not experienced the luxury of repose after five or six days' fatigue, cannot conceive how these men, speaking little and moving less, are nevertheless most happy in this living statue-like condition. Not an instrument is to be heard, not a single note of music,—nothing meets the ear but the buzz of the talkers, who speak in an under tone;—while the boats, full of people, keep coming and going by the Thames. On our lakes, we are accustomed to hear musical instruments, with their vocal accompaniments, and vintage songs. For the want of these the English, who are passionately devoted to music and poetry, are not to be blamed: the protestant religion does not admit of diversion on the Sunday,—it demands the consecration of it to contemplation, to seriousness, to self-examination,—without, however, denying the consolations of the bottle. In Scotland, where the religion of Calvin prevails, the Sunday is still more silent and gloomy; with some a smile is almost thought a profanation. On this day of absolute inaction, the barbers are scarcely permitted to exercise their necessary trade after nine in the morning.

On the continent there is great talk of the swearing of the English,—of their tremendous "G—d—d—n." I believe, for my part, that a Venetian gondolier or a Bolognese carrier, swears more than a thousand Englishmen put together: besides, I have observed, in all the public houses, a notice from the magistrates hung up, threatening to punish with a fine any person who should make use of an oath.

Whoever has formed an idea of the English from the finest poem of Voltaire (which I will not name, though every body has read it), would be surprised to find the rosy cheeks and robust athletic forms he talks of, changed into the pallid faces, and weak, unsteady frames, that characterise the mechanics who frequent these gardens. The spade improves a population,—but the loom spoils it. What a difference between a Scotch highlander and a Glasgow weaver! The one still retains the well knit and athletic form of the warriors described by Ossian: legs like the marble column of Leda, a breast high and ample as a cuirass, the colour of vigour in his cheeks, in all his deportment the fire and mettle of health and strength:—the other, on the contrary, is lean, ill-made, old before his time, and feeble in his gait. What a contrast between an English coachman and a Manchester spinner! The former is the very model of a lusty Bacchus,—the latter of a prisoner for life.

The deterioration of the population is a disadvantage of manufacturing states that has never yet been sufficiently considered. I made it my business to seek for some statistics of the manufacturing classes, in order to discover their maladies and usual length of life, but did not succeed in discovering any, and I believe none are to be found. It is difficult in fact, to procure any that can be relied on, from the continual removal of the workmen from place to place. Some physicians of Manchester have endeavoured to spread the belief, that the duration of life is the longest in those cities where manufactures have most increased. It is a pity Molière is not alive! He would here have a fine subject for raising a laugh at the expense of quackery!—The assertion has not gained the slightest belief from those philanthropists who are exerting themselves to provide a remedy for the damage which they are too well persuaded, his reclusive and sedentary life must do to the manufacturer. Some of these, for instance, Mr. Brougham and Mr. Hume, have encouraged the establishment of schools for gymnastics, where, in the hours of rest, the workmen may exercise their limbs in strengthening and diverting sports. The most persevering of them all, Mr. Owen, after having introduced even dancing into his stupendous manufactory of New Lanark, between Edinburgh and Glasgow, invented a new plan of labour, consisting of occupation alternately in agriculture and manufactures, and went to America to try the experiment. The classes of workmen are more or less ill-looking according to the character of their trades; the population of Birmingham and Sheffield, employed principally in forges and iron works, present a much finer and stronger appearance than that of Manchester and Glasgow, which is almost entirely imprisoned in cotton factories.

When I made some of these remarks at Liverpool, to one of the many intelligent and well-informed mechanics of that city, he informed me that in the last war with France, the regiments recruited from that most industrious county—Lancashire,—were distinguished above the rest for their bravery. This may very well be, since it is not the practice in the present day to fight hand to hand. There is no reason to believe that artificers make bad soldiers, as the Romans believed them, and as the Florentines of the middle ages proved themselves. In Persia, where the strength of an army still lies in the cavalry, a service which requires strength and peculiar dexterity, the inhabitants of the manufacturing cities do not turn out to be good soldiers. But the war of modern times, in Europe, depends on bravery and discipline; the English armies, who are in these respects exemplary, are, for a good third part, composed of artificers.

The division of labour, so essential to the rapidity and the perfection of manufactures, and so much in use in England, is injurious to the development of the mental faculties of the artisan, or even, perhaps, is fatal to it. With what ideas can his mind be crinched by that shuttle, that wheel, or that spindle, which moves incessantly and unvaryingly before his eyes twelve hours in the day? "The result," says M. Say, "is a degeneracy in man, considered as an individual. It is a sad account to give of one's self,—that one has never made any thing but the eighteenth part of a pin!" If the workmen did not enjoy the incalculable advantage of his companions' society, which in his hours of rest awakes him, electrifies him, and invigorates all his faculties, and had not always before him the endless panoramas which are constantly presented from his living in a city, he would become, at the end of a few years, a perfect automaton. In fact, instead of saying that a master manufacturer employs such a number of workmen, it is commonly said, that he employs such a number of hands, as if the journeymen had really no heads. The Broughams, the Humes, the Burdetts, the Allens, the protectors and protected of these classes, were well aware of this evil, and set themselves zealously to work to discover the remedy. They hit upon the idea of establishing libraries for mechanics in every city in the kingdom. These are only open for two hours in the evening; they contain histories, voyages, and travels, models of machines, &c. The subscription for a quarter is only eighteen-pence English. Not content with these, they founded in the most populous cities, professorships of mechanics and of chemistry applied to the arts. In London, more than 1500 operatives contribute each a guinea a-year for admission; this year a working shoemaker gained a prize of ten guineas for an essay on geometry. Some months ago a society was formed "for the diffusion of useful knowledge," which publishes and distributes every month a great number of elementary treatises on all the branches of the great tree of human knowledge. The Sunday papers, and the frequent public meetings which the mechanics attend, and where the most eloquent speakers address the multitude on public affairs, are an aliment and a stimulus to their minds. Mr. Hume, in the House of Commons, on the 13th December, 1826, declared that the stamp-duty on newspapers was far too heavy in England. In the United States, the population of which is little more than half that of Great Britain, there are 590 newspapers; while in Great Britain, on account of the weight of the taxes, there are no more than 484. He gave notice, after these details, that he should move for a reduction of the duty, at least on those weekly papers which are chiefly intended for the working classes. Mr. Brougham, who is ambitious of making that popular monument to his name, which he so wonderfully promoted a durable monument to his proposal. The influence that the press must exercise in a state where it is free, must (I would repeat it in a thousand times) be incalculable. I will venture to say, that its influence must be greater than that of religion itself! It is from these fountains that public opinion springs forth; and this is alone sufficient to correct all the errors of legislation, and restrain all the abuses of power. It is a real panacea. The newspapers are the "daily bread" of morning and evening to every Englishman. So greedy is the public for its food, that the Times, not content with printing eleven hundred copies an hour, has improved their steam-press to such a degree, that now it prints no less than four thousand copies an hour,—seventy in a minute,—but that on one side only.

Ortes, too highly praised and too much depreciated political economist, maintains that commerce enriches only the upper classes, accumulating wealth in the hands of a few, and leaving the mass of labourers always in the same state of misery. The tea gardens which I am describing are in themselves a complete refutation of this idea. The visitor observes with amazement the crowds of clean shaved artisans, dressed in good clothes, with boots on their feet, linen shirts on their backs, watches in their pockets, silk kerchiefs round their necks,—lodging in comfortable houses, sleeping in clean feather beds, taking tea twice a day, and eating wheaten bread and butcher's meat every day in the year. Were they in so good a condition when the commerce of England was neither so flourishing nor so extensive as now? The old men of the country, the current traditions, the ancient houses still standing, and many other irrefragable testimonies, prove to the contrary,—that houses, beds, furniture, clothing, food, every thing, were much inferior. The reason of this difference is manifest. When commerce is in a prosperous state, the demand for goods always increasing, and consequently favourable to the workmen, they can keep up the price of their handicraft. It is now a demonstrated truth, that the wages of workmen are not only in proportion to the price of provisions, but also to the relation between the supply and demand of labour. Besides this, machinery and the division of labour having reduced the price of many articles hitherto consumed only by the higher and middle classes, they have come to be in general use; the present wardrobe of a mechanic, although better than that which one of his class would have had sixty years ago, does not perhaps cost near so much.

It is nevertheless true, that the introduction of steam engines has already taken away from some kinds of workmen this advantage as consumers, by competing with them as producers, and reducing them to that distress which has been experienced for some years past. These vast machines, which do the work of several millions of mechanics, are so many gigantic rivals of men. While the other classes of artisans, such as smiths, carpenters, dyers, glaziers, &c., earn from thirty to sixty shillings a week, or more, the weavers and spinners, working twelve hours a day, can hardly obtain fifteen or eighteen, even at the time that trade is briskest. They are not only physically inferior to the former classes of workmen, but are also most unhappy beings. At a meeting held in January, 1835, by the cotton-spinners of Manchester, to deliberate on the best method of improving their condition, one of them rose to observe, that in the early days of cotton spinning the workmen were well paid, and quite at liberty; but that during the last fifteen years, the masters, by the introduction of steam-engines, had heaped up riches, and increased their own comforts, while the journeymen had gradually descended lower and lower in the scale of society; their wages had been diminished, and their labour increased. Then, after describing the miserable life they lead in a hot suffocating atmosphere, and the various maladies to which they are subject, he exclaimed, "Look around and behold these squalid countenances, and these emaciated bodies! Look at myself, not twenty-five years of age, yet already older than the man who stands at my side,—a sailor of fifty. See to what a wretched lot we are condemned. From the age of six, most of us are buried in a cloud of cotton dust, in a suffocating and unwholesome air; exposed to the extremes of heat and cold, denied the needful repose for our weary limbs, oppressed with intolerable fatigue, and at thirty, we enter upon a miserable old age:—our children are stunted in their growth, and our independence, sustained by untiring industry, is reduced, in some of us, to the sad necessity of asking charity; cap in hand, at the corners of the streets, of the poorest of the passers by."

This lamentable picture, in which there is much exaggeration, as in all the harangues of demagogues, ancient and modern,—over artisans dying of hunger in the very centre of a nation wallowing in wealth, brought to my mind the naked Romans, who by the mouth of Græchus, complained that after so many provinces had been conquered by the republic, they had not a spao of earth wherein to lay their bones.

"And ye, O Romans!

Ye who, with steel encumber'd, to grim death
Your lives expose each day for country-sake,—
Ye masters of the world,—who of the world
Possess but that which can't be ta'en away,
The air and light of heav'n!—roaring the fields,

Till iron-hearted hunger pulls ye down—
Ye have, to bear ye fitting company,
Your wretched wives, and naked, famish'd offspring,
Crying for bread!"

Monti, Caius Græchus, Act 3.

It would seem that empires are like men, who resemble each other in their virtues and their faults.

Some English political economists, who pay attention more to the wealth than the happiness of a country, observe, in reply to these complaints, that if it be true that these classes do not live comfortably, it is quite as true that without steam-engines they could not live at all. It is certain that Arkwright, by the invention of cotton-spinning machinery in 1765, and Watt, by the application of steam to it in 1779, gave their country a decisive superiority over the industry of other nations, although at the same time they deteriorated the condition of perhaps a million of mechanics, and gave rise to a production much greater than the demand: without these two wonderful discoveries, England would most likely have lost her superiority in manufactures, on account of the high rate of wages, which is partly an effect of the high price of food.

If, then, some workmen, as I have already observed, injure their health in the spinning factories, there are many more who destroy themselves from an unmoderate desire for gin, which induces them to labour harder than a day regard to their health would allow. Adam Smith, in his great work, observed, that where prices are high, workmen are always found more diligent, active, and expert, than where they are low; in the neighbourhood of great cities, for instance, more than in remote parts of the country. Some men, indeed, when they can earn in four days enough to maintain themselves all the week, choose to remain idle on the other three. This, however, does not happen with the largest portion. On the contrary, the industrious, when they are liberally paid, in ready money, are generally disposed to labour excessively, and so undermine their health, and ruin their constitution in a few years. "It is calculated," says Smith, "that a London carpenter does not continue in his full vigour more than eight years." It is nearly the same with some other trades, in which it is the custom to pay the workman as soon as his work is finished, and even with farm labour, when the wages are higher than usual. I have endeavoured to procure, but could not succeed, the book which the Italian physician Ramazzini wrote, in the last century, especially on the peculiar diseases produced by excessive application to one particular species of labour.

SAILORS.

Whoever wishes to acquire a knowledge of another class of Englishmen, not less interesting than the mechanics, must descend into one of those narrow by-streets near London Bridge, which lead to the Thames. The sailors, those sons of the ocean, are like the amphibious animals, which, even when on land, always keep close to the water. One day I took it into my head to walk into one of the numerous public houses which stand in these alleys, to see what metamorphoses those silent and serious beings undergo on land, in whose company I had, at various times, spent eight months on shipboard. How changed did I find friend Jack from what I had seen him at sea! No longer serious, no longer quiet, no longer silent; but joyous, noisy, and singing: the room on the ground floor, into which I entered, was involved in a thick cloud of tobacco smoke, which almost hindered me, at first, from distinguishing the dramatis personæ. I had not yet taken my seat, when one of them, with a gait any thing but steady, and reeling like a ship in a storm, with a face the colour of mahogany, from the effect of the tobacco and liquors, offered me some of his "grog;" that is, brandy mixed with water without sugar,—which is the nectar of these heroes of the deep. I accepted it without hesitation, but the pewter pot, from which my generous friend had been drinking, was empty, and the poor fellow had not perceived it. It had, in fact, so completely slipped his memory, that he had already tressed off all this ambrosia, that he made a similar offer to every body that came in. He did not on that account lose his credit with me, because I know that sailors, who are hearts of oak when they are at sea, are hearts of butter when at a tavern, and generous as Cæsar himself. The cheeks of the English sailor are not those sleek and florid cheeks which the climate naturally produces, nor are they of a tall and bulky make, like farmers of the island. Their faces are bronzed, or, to express it better with one of those evasive English epithets composed of two words braced together, they are weather-beaten.

They are in general of the middle height, but large across the shoulders; their limbs clean made and sinewy, and all their movements free and unconstrained. When they are walking, you observe in them a confidence in their own strength, and the audacity of a health proof against every thing. They traverse the streets with an indifference which is natural to them, as if cities were not made for them, or as if they were people who had seen things more wonderful than a city. Their large trousers, their open jacket and shirt collar, their round hat, or plaid bonnet, all their dress, in fact, contributes to make them appear more active, more free and easy. It is well known that they never wear boots, because they use hands and feet indifferently; they are four-handed or four-footed just as they will. Their eyes are not sparkling, but they are intrepid, and express very well the heart of oak in their breasts. Their countenance generally denotes intelligence; frankness and generosity are stamped on it; one would say, that none of these faces had ever told a lie.

In a corner of the room there was a group of these mariners, who were singing one of their sea songs, with the burden "Haul away, yoo ho, boys!" the cry with which they accompany any exertion made in concert:—

"British sailors have a kneeck,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!

Of pulling down a Frenchman's jack,

'Gainst any odds, you know, boys!

Come thence to me, right sure am I,

If we can't beat 'em, still we'll try!

To make old England's colours fly,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!

"British sailors when at sea,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!

Pipe all hands with merry glee,

While up aloft they go, boys;

And when with pretty girls on shore,

Their cash is gone, and not before,

Their wisely go to sea for more,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!

"British sailors love their king,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!

And round the bowl they love to sing,

And drink his health, you know, boys!

Then while his standard owns a rag,

The world combined shall never brag

They made us strike the British flag,

Haul away, yoo ho, boys!"

When these had finished their song, which was duly knocked down by their leathern bands, a second group struck up another of their favourite songs, "Hearts of Oak."

A fiddler, who had in the mean time entered with his creaking instrument, now struck up a reel, a kind of Scotch dance, much in favour with the lower classes in England. Of all the English, the sailors are the most galeatic; above all, when they have emptied two or three cans of grog,—

"For if sailor ever took delight in

Swigging, kissing, dancing, fighting,

Damne, I'll be bold to say that Jack's the lad!"

At this sound, as if it had been the signal for battle, all jumped on their legs, and began throwing their feet about, for I cannot say they danced. To get out of the way of this tempest of kicks, I mounted a small flight of stairs, and entered a second room, which presented another picture in the style of Teniers. It was exactly like that I had left, except that by the round hat of glazed leather, by the jacket and trousers of blue cloth, in fine, by the uniformity and superior neatness of their dress, I perceived that the seamen belonged to the royal navy. In their faces, though flushed with liquor, the impression of discipline and obedience was still visible; and although their deportment and gestures exhibited nothing of insolence, they betrayed nevertheless more of arrogance and presumption than the others, although not so much as is generally exhibited on the continent (I know not why) by soldiers of the line. They were singing the national anthem, composed by the poet Thomson, the author of "The Seasons," about a century ago,—"Rule, Britannia!"

It was thus, perhaps, in the days of their glory and freedom, that the Venetians sung in the "holds" of their gaic city, their victory over some Turkish fleet. At the present day they have substituted for those martial songs "Visto di Nina," and "La Biondina in Condoletta,"—"The Face of Nina," and "The Fair-haired Girl of the Gondollet;" even songs are sufficient to mark the revolutions of the wheel of fortune. With this melancholy reflection I left these merry mariners, and quitted the tavern.

It is to the seamen of the royal navy, well clothed, well fed, and of martial aspect, that England owes the inviolability of her coasts, her glory, and her trident. In the "Roderick Random" of Smollett (the best of his novels), where his hero is another Gil Blas, who passes through all conditions of life, some of the customs and characteristics of these sailors may be found described. The author draws from nature; he had for a long time served on board a frigate, in the capacity of surgeon's mate. The visitors to St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey are surprised at the prodigious number of monuments they find there to the memory of admirals, vice-admirals, and captains, who have gained naval victories. These magnificent mausoleums are testimonies of the national gratitude to the dead, as the superb hospital of Greenwich is the testimony of their gratitude to the living. It would have been impossible to select a more appropriate and comfortable situation for the invalided veteran. The building is on the banks of the Thames, and before it, in full sail, pass every moment the vessels which are arriving from and departing for the different parts of the world. This sight nourishes in them the most pleasing illusions and recollections, and the park, which is annexed to the little town of Greenwich, affords them solitary walks, where they can retire to mind, beneath the shade of aged trees, their past vicissitudes. English benevolence is ingenious in rendering the benefit bestowed complete, and even pleasing. The hospitals in England are, in general, placed on the most agreeable sites, as at one time used to be the case with our convents. The English poets have almost all contributed encomiums on the valour of their seamen.

I look upon the English as highly favoured by fortune, in the possession of poets, who use the magic endowed upon their craft to make every one believe his own lot and his own station the most enviable. We reproach the English with being downcast and melancholy; but we ought to add that they are not querulous. They labour indefatigably to better their condition, without whimpering and whining; and at the same time draw from their present condition all the profits and the pleasures it can afford. I say this in reference to those stanzas of Byron, in which he eulogises life on shipboard:

"He that has sail'd upon the dark blue sea,
Has view'd at times I wren a full fair sight,
When the fresh breeze is fair as breeze may be,
The white sail set—the gallant frigate light!"

This life, which to a cavalier servente, or a regular play goer, would appear more horrible than imprisonment in the dungeons of the Inquisition, or of Spielberg, is described by Byron in his Childe Harold with the same sense of pleasure with which Tasso paints the garden of Armida. The "little warlike world" collected in a frigate,—the "well-receiv'd cannon,"—the "hoarse command,"—"the humming din," when at a word the "tops are manned on high,"—"the docile crew," guided by the shrill pipe of the "schoolboy midshipman,"—"the white and "glassy deck, without a stain,"—"where on the watch the staid lieutenant walks,"—"the port kept sacred for the lone captain,"—"silent and fear'd by all," to preserve "that strict restraint" which may not be broken without balking "the conquest of fame,"—"the swiftly blowing "gale,"—"the waves that "dilly carl" before the "dashing prow,"—"the convey spread like wild swans in their flight,"—"all these objects are dwelt upon with a great and partial fondness.

This is not mere caprice or extravagance on the part of the poet. These stanzas of Byron are beautiful, because they are also true. There is not an English captain who is not in love with his vessel,—his little world, which he prefers to the Palais Royal. When, after ninety days' sail, we made the port of Dublin, our captain, instead of landing, as I did, to view the stupendous city, which he had never seen, remained on board for five or six days, with a more than philosophic indifference.

What a loss to Italian glory that so many poets have thrown away their harmonious verses on so many Lanzas and Philises, who never existed—and so many princes, who were never made to be the heroes or the themes of either verse or prose, instead of celebrating the daring naval enterprises of the ancient Genoese, or the many sea victories of the Venetians! Tasso has indeed devoted two beautiful stanzas of his fifteenth canto to Columbus,—but the discovery of a new world demands a national poem at least as loudly as the passage of the Cape of Good Hope, by Vasco de Gama, called for the Lusian Camoens! Mr. Rogers, a living English poet, has written a poem of several cantos on the voyage of Columbus; but partial as I am to English poetry, and highly as I esteem the poetical talents of that author, the flight of his muse appears to me beneath the loftiness, variety, and dignity of the subject. The poet who would sing the praises of—should have his imagination filled and fired with the martial and romantic exploits of the Genoese, from the time of the Romans to the present, perhaps the only people whose inborn and indomitable courage has not become degenerate. He should roam through those villages of the Riviera di Ponente which lie on the shores of the Mediterranean; should study the ardent and enduring character of the countrymen of Columbus, at once citizens of the world and adherers of their native land; should admire the sobriety of their lives, the tranquil resignation with which they support their extreme poverty, and the modesty of their manners; should observe their active, full nerved, vigorous limbs, their daring and vivacious eyes, which express their readiness to take to the sea, whatever the weather, without asking to what part of the world they are to go; a daring which appears the more striking from their hangy and spirited glance, the red bonnet hanging over one ear, and their half naked, brawny, leather coloured limbs. The poet will perceive that the religious spirit of Columbus is a feeling common to his countrymen; they fear none but God; but their religious sentiments are perhaps pushed a little far, so that these new argonauts are like their fabled prototypes, bold indeed, but over superstitious.

"The naked pilot, promiser of thrones,"

The sailors of the English men of war are as warriors more glorious, but as mariners less interesting, than those of the merchant service. A vessel of war is always exposed to less danger of shipwreck than a merchantman, from the strength of its build, the abundance of its stores, and the greater number of hands to man the sails. It makes fewer voyages, and sees fewer countries, because in time of peace it is often in port, and in time of war it is often for several years on a cruise, continually plunging the self-same pace of sea before the blockaded port of an enemy. Finally, on board of these vessels there is a sort of division of labour; the duty of every one is chalked out for him, or at least it is only seldom and by turns that the seamen are employed in different manoeuvres. When the day of battle arrives, although to the English sailor it is always like the signal of death, he is nevertheless inspired by the hope of glory, inflamed by the example of his messmates; and, if he survives, mutilated by the bullet or the steel of the foe, he sees before his eyes the splendid hospital of Greenwich, which awaits him for his reward, like the palace of the Hours, promised by Mahomet to the brave who die in battle. Very different indeed is the fate of the seamen of the merchant service. A vessel of 300 tons goes to the end of the world, with a crew of nine or ten men. It is impossible to imagine the activity and courage they must exhibit in a storm, the fatigue and peril they must undergo, sometimes for a whole day—for two or three days together. Here is the glory, herein lies the superiority of the English seamen over all other European sailors. Others may have as much courage; the Greek is quicker, the Genoese more sober, but the Englishman is supreme in the terrible tempest of the sea: the rain, the hail, the wind, the whole fury of the waves, may rage and rave against him, but he resists and fulfils his duty: his strength seems multiplied a hundred fold, and he places his glory in conquering nature! He seems made of the rock itself! I was one day admiring the beautiful white biscuit, the juicy slices of salt beef, the unlimited number of potatoes, which, every day, with a little variation, form the dinner of the sailors, who have, besides their tea morning and evening, a plate of salt meat: the captain, who saw my surprise, observed to me, "In a storm my crew pay me this again with interest." This class of mariners make more voyages than the others, and see a variety of different countries:

"He travels and expatiates as the bee,
From flower to flower; so he from land to land;
The manners, customs, policy of all,
Pay contribution to the store he gleans;
He seeks intelligence in every clime,
And spreads the honey of his deep research

The craving for variety becomes such a habit in seamen, that it is a rare thing for one of them to make two voyages in the same ship and under the same captain.

When, in a few days, he has squandered in taverns all the hard earnings of ten, twelve, or fourteen months, he offers himself to some captain on the point of sailing, who throws a glance over his certificates, and examines his whole person most attentively, that he may not be deceived as to health, strength, and agility; and the agreement, simple in its conditions, is signed. The wages, in time of peace, are from forty to fifty shillings a month, besides the victuals, to be paid altogether on the completion of the voyage, or in half or third portions at the place of the vessel's destination. Scarcely has the vessel returned to England, and discharged her cargo, before the sailor pockets his pay. From a poor man he suddenly finds himself a rich one, in the possession of fifteen or twenty pounds sterling. His long privation of pleasure changes the public-house, in his eyes, to an enchanted palace. This money seems to him an inexhaustible treasure, like that called forth by the lamp of Aladdin. He apparently renounces all his former virtues, he forgets all, he abandons himself to the most extravagant caprice, he buys every thing he sees,—a turnip, a watch, a warming pan, or a pair of spurs; and, ignorant of the snares which beset his every step upon land, unmindful of himself, of his relations, of the future, of his most urgent necessities, he dissipates, in a few days, all the gains of a year of exertion. It was a saying of Charles the Second, which has become proverbial, that "Sailors get money like horses, and spend it like asses." At length the dream ceases; he looks around,—he finds himself ill clad, without a friend or a relation; he presents himself to a new captain, and starts for another part of the world, under a new sky, amid another sea, surrounded by new and unknown companions.

The seaman is a sort of Robinson Crusoe; afloat, he practises almost every trade. Of all mechanical professions, this is the one which affords the most instruction, and develops in the highest degree the moral and physical faculties. Besides the smattering of astronomy which he acquires,—besides the foreign languages and the foreign manners with which he becomes acquainted, the mariner learns how to mix paint for the boats and many articles on board, mends the ropes, sews the sails, and must, on occasion, play the part of carpenter, blacksmith, butcher, cook, and washerman. He is perpetually in motion, and exercises equally all parts of the body, arms as well as legs, feet as well as hands; he is bent when he rows, or reefing and unreefing the sails; he stands erect when he guides the helm; he runs when the vessel is to be tacked; he balances himself on the mast-head; he ascends and descends the shrouds with the rapidity of a squirrel. There is no system of gymnastics which develops so impartially the powers of all parts of the human frame, the eye included,—as the art of navigation.

The order, the regularity, the discipline, which prevail in the narrow space of an English merchant brig, are wonderful. The face of the captain is always severe, the tone of his voice always sharp and imperious. No seaman may speak to the captain first, unless on a point of duty; no seaman is allowed to make remonstrances or observations on the captain's orders. A smile never passes over his countenance; nor does a word of approbation or encouragement ever escape him. The men are confined to the fore-castle, and woe to them if they step on deck, except upon duty,—it is the sanctum sanctorum of the captain and the passengers. The most profound silence always reigns among them, except that you occasionally catch a gentle whisper. Without this inexorable severity, how could the captain, second only by his mate, exact, in the very middle of the ocean, a prompt and blind obedience? Even in spite of it, conspiracies and revolutions sometimes occur among the nice or ten individuals shut up in so confined a space, so impracticable is it to govern the human species! An English captain always keeps his crew busy about something or other, even during a calm. This is also an expedient to prevent their taking disgust to their occupation. Captain Parry, as soon as he had seen his vessel made snug for her winter station of five or six months, when on his voyage to attempt the discovery of a north-west passage, hit upon the idea of erecting a theatre, giving concerts, and setting up a school for teaching reading and writing to his hardy mariners; so anxious did he feel to provide remedies for weariness, and to keep the minds of his crew constantly occupied.

It was not till after I had witnessed the effects of this strict order and discipline, and the continual handling of the sails, that I felt the full force of the maxim, that without a merchant navy a maritime force cannot exist. It is universally admitted in England, that the best sailors on board the English fleet are those who have been bred up in merchant vessels. They have had a school of greater suffering, industry and experience, than those brought up on board a frigate. Between these two kinds of sailors there is the same difference as between a regiment of the line and a band of guerillas; the soldiers of the line dazzle the most, because they often decide the fate of empires,—the guerillas acquire less glory, although individually they possess more bravery, and are much more exposed to fatigue, to famine, and the sword.

Sunday is, if possible, observed by the English wherever they may be. On that day, the silence even on board ship is still more gloomy than ever; every one is shaved, every one puts on a clean shirt, every one endeavours to display more neatness than usual in his dress. Some read a few pages in the Bible; religion is a comfort to their minds, rather than a terror. The Englishman has no other intercessor with the Supreme Being than his own prayers. He hopes for no other miracles than those which spring from his own courage, and the discharge of his duty. In a storm, the Spaniard, and even the Greek, although a good sailor, throw themselves on their knees before some image, to which a light is continually burning, and in the mean time the sails and the vessel are under the control of the winds and waves; the sighs and signs of contrition of the devotees only serving to increase the confusion and dismay. The Englishman, on the other hand, fulfils his duty, displays all his firmness of mind and strength of body, struggles with death even to the last moment, and only when he has exhausted in vain all the resources of his skill, and all the energies of his frame, gives himself up to his fate, raises his eyes to heaven, and bows to the will of Providence. They are not indeed so thoroughly devoid of prejudice as a philosopher of the eighteenth century; some believe in ghosts, in hobgoblins, and prophetic voices which rise from the hollow of the deep,—but in the hour of danger they no longer recollect these illusions, and see nothing but the reality before them, and see it without affright. I read in the "Mariners' Register" (which is a collection of official reports made to the Admiralty of shipwrecked vessels), miracles of constancy, patience, and intrepidity, displayed by seamen to save their ships, and afterwards their own lives. One feels a proud complacency in seeing man in contest with the monstrous force of ocean, and generally triumphant over it; in seeing him, when struck upon a rock in the middle of the deep, calculating on what day the frail bark will be entirely swallowed up, and in the mean time labouring at the construction of a boat; and, when the hour of the total submersion of the vessel is arrived, descending into his fragile skiff, and, with a scanty supply of provisions, commencing a voyage of six hundred or a thousand miles, and then arriving at some inhospitable land. Another time you behold him in the Pacific ocean, in a little boat, after having lost his vessel, steeping his cloak in the sea, to protect himself from the scorching rays of the sun; then, for want of water, extending his sails and collecting in them the rain which kind Heaven sends him. A poet of some reputation in England, but in my opinion of very mediocre talents,—Falconer, has written a poem entitled "The Shipwreck." It is a cold story of a vessel which, sailing from Cyprus to Candia, near Cape Colonna (the ancient Saseum), is thrown by a tempest on the rocks, and dashed to pieces. There is a minute description (in some degree the general defect of English poets, great and small) of all the manoeuvres and expedients employed by the English captain, without any of those great strokes of the pencil such as Virgil gives, when he describes the sea storm which overtook the wandering Æneas, whose ships now rise to the summit of a mountain wave, now sink to the very bottom of the sea; and without that interest which Homer excites for Ulysses, when alone on a raft he is thrown by the wind here and there, up and down by the raging sea,—at one time cast on the waves, then catching hold of his raft again, till at last he commits himself to the waters, and, cleaving them with his breast and both his brawny arms, clutches at a rock with his outstretched hands,—

"And then Ulysses on the rock the skin
Of his strong arms did leave;"

and afterwards get upon land breathless and speechless, spouting water from his mouth and nostrils.

There is much more poetry in the true statements of the "Mariners' Register," than in the fiction of Falconer. This Register was to be found on board of every ship I ever sailed in; at first it seemed strange that a sea captain should like to read so funereal a chronicle, in which, as it were, his own fate is described; but I have since reflected, that, just as land officers read with interest the accounts of battles and sieges, and instead of being cast down by them, are inspired with courage, and inflamed with emulation, so may a seaman learn from these narratives not only to die with intrepidity, but to use all the various methods for his own preservation.

On an occasion of some peril, I had an opportunity of witnessing in my own person the bravery of this race of men. In coming from Smyrna, after three thousand miles of pleasant sailing, and seventy-three days of weariness and impatience, as we were entering the port of Carlingford, forty-five miles north of Dublin, (where the vessels are sent to undergo quarantine,) in the dusk of the evening we struck on a bank: at the shock of it, striking, and the long grating screak that announced it, the nine English sailors who were on deck turned pale, but remained firm and collected. Not a cry, not a complaint was heard: all had their eyes fixed on the captain, whose orders they awaited; he slapping his hands on his thighs exclaimed, "What a joke!"

The first remedy was to spread all sail to the wind, to try if this would release us from the rock to which we seemed to be nailed down; in vain. The second expedient was to cast an anchor, and attempt by means of the capstan to move the vessel; still in vain. The third resource was, not to despair. As we did not yet know whether the banks were rocky or not, a trial was made with the pump to see if the vessel made any water. Fortunately, it did not. Our hopes were now placed on the next tide; the hour of its rising was anxiously looked for: it comes; every inch is observed, is measured, but the tide does not rise high enough. The ship, however, still continues tight and sound. The second tide is expected with still greater anxiety; a higher flow favours us, and with anchors and capstan we at last work ourselves off this bank of evil augury, after forty hours of exertion. The captain, an excellent man and a skilful navigator, was all this while indefatigable; but when we had got out of the danger, he fell ill of a fit of the gout, through the anxiety he had suffered, and several times bled at the nose. The vessel belonged to him, and, with his property, he would have lost his reputation also. Again we set sail, and went to take our post on quarantine. What a horrible thing is quarantine on board ship! A dirty yellow flag warns others of the disease with which you are perhaps infected; men fly your breath, your touch; they watch from what quarter the wind blows to speak to you; instead of the friendly hand, the boatman extends towards you an iron clasp to receive your letters; in the night, a small light burns on the mainmast, to warn other ships to avoid you, like a rock or a whirlpool; two sentinels come on board, to keep you in strict confinement; three times a day the quarantine officer summons all on board before him, to ascertain that no disease is concealed. The quarantine is a temporary exile from the world and from mankind. It was in these fifteen days, of which every minute was counted, that I learnt from the captain many particulars of the life and manners of seamen.

In time of war, among ten English sailors, it may be reckoned one is married, and in time of peace, one in eight. This proportion is much greater in all other nations, varying according to the extent and distance of the commerce they carry on. The Italian sailors of the Mediterranean, and the Greeks of the Archipelago, who very rarely leave behind them the pillars of Hercules, are for the most part married, because their voyages are of short duration, and they can often return to the bosoms of their families; but the English, who by the immensurability of their commerce are citizens of the world, would, if they were married, too seldom enjoy their home. Hence very few lay by for an event they do not think of, and in old age do not hope for. How could they feel affection for their families, whom from infancy they have abandoned? Besides, when they are on land—

"A girl and fiddle always make a sailor glad,"

Hence if through disease, or some other misfortune, one of them becomes invalided, he has no other resource than to beg through the streets, singing with a voice harmonious as that of Boreas, "The Crippled Tar," or "The Lullaby," or some other of the countless naval ditties of which the English people are so fond. The poet Crabbe, still living, the truest painter of the manners of the English vulgar, has, in his tale in verse, "The Brothers," painted to the life the miserable end of a sailor, who, having in his best days improvidently squandered his gains, finds, when he has lost a leg, nothing but contempt and insult in the house of his own brother, who is married to a fury of a woman, and at last dies of anguish. This same painter-poet, in another little poem, "The Justice Hall," introduces a wretched street-walker as coming before the justice, with a baby in her arms; she has been by turns the concubine of two sailors, father and son, and implores no other favour from the magistrate, than to listen to the series of her crimes and her misfortunes, which are in truth of such a nature that they make one shudder with horror. Crabbe is entirely the reverse of Cowper; they are like Heraclitus and Democritus, "Jean qui pleure, et Jean qui rit." Cowper sees every thing of the colour of roses; all is virtue, all is happiness in England, according to him; Crabbe sees every thing with a jaundiced eye,—all is wickedness, misery, and vice. If, therefore, the stranger lends an ear to each of them, he will find the truth more easily by their combined assistance. Crabbe is like the party of the opposition, for, to hear him, England has the worst laws, and administration of them; Cowper is like the minister, when he speaks of the reign of George the Fourth, and paints it as though it were that of Saturn. Both are exaggerators; but poetry, it must be remembered, is not history.

THE OPPOSITION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Between the hall of the house of commons, and those of the representative bodies of the other nations which I have seen, there is the same difference as betwixt the house of a rich man of yesterday, and an old established gentleman of family. In the former, all is new and glittering; in "good taste," and of the last fashion; in the latter, every thing is antique, but solid and massive, of a piece with the walls and the age in which it was built. In the former, you discern the ostentatious showiness of that which is new and not customary; in the latter, the negligence of riches, and the habitude of long possession. The chamber of deputies at Paris, the halls of the Cortes at Madrid and at Lisbon, were new, like the institutions themselves; the English house of commons is old, like the liberty that inhabits it. Happy that country where liberty can boast of ages for its ancestors, and dwells from age to age in gothic edifices. If the house of commons were as old as the Druids, the members of parliament ought to dwell in the trunks of trees, like that ancient priesthood. He who enters the hall of the English parliament with the idea that he is about to see a Milanese or Neapolitan theatre, will be deceived in his expectations. There is not a choir or refectory of Franciscan friars which is not as elegant and majestic as this hall, or perhaps more so; but if he enters it, on the contrary, with the idea that he is visiting one of the oldest of the temples of liberty, he will contemplate every object with that veneration with which we behold the heavy columns of the temple of Pæstum, or the dreary catacombs of Rome.

Fashion, luxury, pleasure, conventional beauty, are powerful in England, but they are not triumphant. Over elegance has not yet spoiled that taste for nature, which is the prevailing characteristic of the nation. Dress and manner, compliments and salutes, all, even to the conclusion of letters, is redolent of simplicity. The English are, perhaps, the best horsemen in the world; that is, the firmest in the saddle; yet they make no show of it. They are the lightest motioned of all in gymnastics; almost all of them can, like their horses, leap hedges, ditches, and gates, yet when they dance, they scarcely raise their feet from the ground. They are, perhaps, or even without a perhaps, the best extemporaneous orators in the world; yet they never study either gesture or declamation. In February, 1838, Mr. Brougham delivered a speech in parliament, on the reform necessary in the civil laws of England, which lasted six hours and four minutes. Be it remembered, that four columns of an English newspaper are reckoned equal to one hour. There is no example, either among the ancients or moderns, of so long an extemporaneous speech of the deliberative kind.* We all know that the Romans studied declamation as we study music, and that Caius Græchus had a man with a pitch pipe behind him, who gave him notice when it was necessary to change the modulation of his voice. Our actors often go to study attitude and drapery in the statues of the ancient orators: Cæsar, when he fell wounded to death, did not forget nobility of position. Although the Spaniards were not accustomed to public speaking, it was beautiful to see the noble gesticulations of the eloquent Martínez de la Rosa, and the movements of his large black eyes; and to hear him change with exquisite art the tones of his strong and most sonorous voice. Galiano, too, another of the eloquent members of the Cortes, gesticulated so theatrically, that his enemies said he tried his speeches beforehand at a looking-glass. Why not? Cicero took letters from Roscius, Roscius took lessons from his mirror,—or the equivalent of a mirror, as all good actors do. There is none of this elegance or this affectation, which ever it may be called, in England; they rise dressed just as it happens, gesticulate like a windmill, or perhaps not at all, like a phantom; and for several hours change the modulation of the voice no more than a Scotch bagpipe. The minister, Canning, in the heat of speaking, used to thump with his right hand on a small wooden box which stood before him, like a blacksmith raising up and bringing down his hammer. His rival, Brougham, tall, thin, couched in the muscles of his face, crosses when he speaks both arms and legs, exactly like one of our houseless fantoccini. Not even their actors, for example, the chief of them, Keen, employ those architectural attitudes which the actors of other nations make use of. Their artifice consists in following, not the dictates of art, but those of nature. I confess, however, that, in my opinion, the members of parliament ought sometimes to embellish nature a little.

It is well known that in the English parliament an orator never reads, but always improvises. Every thing is spontaneous, every thing shows the man, every thing belongs to the speaker. But what, perhaps, is not so well known, is that the orators have not a ridiculous repugnance to retracting what may have escaped them, in spite of themselves, in the warmth of debate. An Englishman is not ashamed to unsay an injurious expression which he never had any intention to say. It is an act of justice which does him honour before both friend and enemy. The English regard duelling as the last and desperate remedy of inexorable honour. In the famous parliamentary debate on the 12th of December 1826, respecting the war between Spain and Portugal, Canning had allowed himself to be carried away by the torrent of his eloquence beyond the prescribed bounds. In a few days after he undertook the publication of his own speech, and omitted that part which in cold blood he, perhaps, would not have uttered. The retraction so surprised me at first, that I could not help saying, in the presence of an English gentleman, that "I had thought only philosophers and drunken men retracted what they had said;" the gentleman replied, with the national imperturbability, "These recantations are just and proper, because the extemporaneous speaker is in a state of excitement, which often carries him beyond himself."

He who arrives for the first time in England, and goes to the house of parliament, runs the risk of forming a very erroneous idea of the opposition party, as occurred in my own case. All the surrounding circumstances conspire to lead him into error. In the first place, he sees a hundred or a hundred and twenty opposition members against four or five hundred. It appears therefore as if there were an insuperable arithmetical barrier. He hears an excellent speech, but it produces nothing but the sarcasms of the opposite party. Weak and always overpowered by numbers, the members of the opposition are condemned to serve the nation without station and without public honours. The chorus which derides their efforts is that, too, which continually sings the praises of the ministers. It is, then, a useless martyrdom, voluntary and senseless as that which the Fakers impose on themselves. For what does the opposition sit?—for the pleasure of saying "No." It is at best a mere professorship of eloquence. This is what every one says to himself on his first view of the party in opposition. But he soon changes his opinion when he studies more profoundly the national organisation of England, and becomes familiar with the history of parliament. In the first place, he perceives that if the opposition does not conquer, it at least hinders the enemy (whoever he may be, liberal or not) from abusing his victory, or consummating an unjust conquest. It is like the dike of a river, which cannot assist its current, but keeps it in, and compels it to follow its course. The advantage of the opposition does not consist so much in the good that it effects, as in the evil that it prevents. It keeps awake the attention, the patriotism, the distrust of the people; it propagates in general the right opinions, it is the born protector of the injured and the oppressed, the harbinger of all improvements, of all liberal institutions. Suppose that, by accident, the opposition is composed of persons in favour of absolute power: to procure adherents, they will be obliged to mask their sentiments, to hold the language of justice and freedom,—like those proud and tyrannic Roman patricians, such as the Appii and Opimii, who, to gain their suffrages for the consular dignity, descended to mix among and to flatter the common people; or like Dionysius, who, when on the throne, crushed out the very blood of the people, and when he was hurled from it, played the buffoon to the populace, and got drunk in the public taverns. But the action of the minority is not immediate. An opinion cannot be formed and propagated and popularised in a few months, nor sometimes in a few years. The abolition of the slave trade cost Wilberforce twenty years of persevering application. Every year repulsed, every year he returned to the assault, printing pamphlets, convening public meetings of philanthropists, collecting notices and documents on the barbarous cruelties practised on board of the vessels engaged in the horrible traffic, and thus exciting the imaginations and melting the hearts of his fellow-citizens, he broke at length with the multitude into the temple of justice and triumph. At one period, Ireland could not carry on a direct commerce with the English colonies. How many strenuous and how many fruitless attempts were made before Grattan, in 1779, obtained the abolition of this unjust exclusion! How many times, from the days of Adam Smith downwards, was the principle of freedom in commerce, now begun to be followed by the present ministry, brought forward by the opposition! Thus, parliamentary reform, proposed originally by Pitt, in the first days of his career, when he found himself in the ranks of opposition, is now beginning to make proselytes within the walls of parliament, after having made many without. Thus catholic emancipation is probably on the point of being conceded, after so many unsuccessful endeavours to obtain it. Thus the abolition of colonial slavery is another laurel which the opposition sees at no great distance, and will gather in no great length of time. The English opposition, in this point of view (let it be well observed), sets an example to all nations, all sects, all philosophers, and—all authors, for without constancy, few of them can hope for success.

When a cause is just at the beginning, we should never despair, however often we may be repulsed. Under the blows of perseverance fell the Aristotelian philosophy of the scholastics,—fell the torture and the inquisition: under the same blows tyrants will fall, in every nation, without exception.

It is not true, either, that the opposition is always unrewarded; the Irish made their countryman Grattan a present of fifty thousand pounds. Fox has statues, anniversaries, and a club, called after his name, which celebrates every year with a banquet and brilliant speeches the day of his birth. When Sir Robert Wilson was deprived by the government of his rank of general, his party indemnified him with an annuity for his own life and that of his son. Sir Francis Burdett, when he quitted the Tower after six months' imprisonment, found prepared for him by the people a triumphant procession more enviable than that of the ancient Romans. When Mr. Wilberforce passes through the crowd on the day of the opening of parliament, every one contemplates this little old man, worn with age, and his head sunk on his shoulders, as a sacred relic, as the Washington of humanity. This is a reward worthy of such a man, and far beyond all possible golden fleeces, or all the strange beasts that were ever set in brilliants.

Often, too, (without any need of deserting, as Burke did), the march of events carries into power the members of the opposition. When peace was to be made with the United States, in 1783, the ministry which had sustained and prolonged the war, was obliged to give place to those who had always opposed it. In the same manner, at the peace of Amiens, with the first consul of France, Pitt, the fortunate, the eloquent Pitt, had to yield the curule chair to his opponents. The resistance of the opposition is not useful to the nation alone, but to the government itself. Without it, every administration would soon corrupt, and degenerate into infamy; and its existence would be threatened, either with a slow consuming, or a rapid and violent destruction. Napoleon, at the time that every will bent before him, was compelled, in order to get at the truth, to take sometimes the advice of the opposition in his council of state, rather than that of his own ministers, as will appear upon consulting the sittings of 1809 respecting the liberty of the press. In December, 1835, when Mr. Brougham informed the ministry, that he intended to propose a revision of the law of libel, a newspaper attached to the government, which was then opposed to him, expressed much pleasure at the circumstance, observing, that between the two contrary opinions of two first-rate statesmen, such as Brougham and the secretary Peel, there would be found a third, which would reconcile the interests of the liberty of the press with the claims of justice for the repression of its licentiousness. While the nation continues to prosper under the principles of the ministry, the opposition does nothing but prevent its wandering too far from the path; but when it feels itself in a state of suffering and decline, under the existing management of affairs, the nation finds other principles at hand, other men and another party already matured, and prepared to guide the vessel of the state in a different direction. All republics, both ancient and modern, have been perpetually agitated by the two contrary winds of the aristocratic and democratic tinctures, and although the former at every step passed from the hands of one of these parties into those of the other, they went on prospering for several centuries, in the midst of the oscillation produced by these changes. In a free government, the shock of two parties, and the apparent discord, are in reality only a contest which shall render the country happy. Filangieri says that this emulation is at bottom nothing better than the love of power, but as this power can never be attained nor preserved except by promoting the general good, it can be no very great concession to call it patriotism. The two opposite forces, which oblige free governments to run along a middle line, are like those which regulate the motions of the celestial bodies: opposition produces the same good effects in the moral world. All governments deteriorate into tyranny without it: in the absence of criticism, which is their opposition,—what would literature and the arts become? We should still be under the yoke of the commentators on Aristotle;—we should still have the atoms of Epicurus in physics, and the crystal heavens of Ptolemy in astronomy. If the Winklemans, the Mengsies, and the Milizias had not kept bad taste within its bounds, painting would have become a caricature, and architecture a heap of crudities. Except for criticism, the Gorgon would still hold the foremost rank in Spain, the Mariveaus in France, the Marinis in Italy: without Baret's "literary scourge," the Arcadia of Rome would probably be still in higher esteem than the French academy, and the Italians would have become so many Arcadian shepherds, with their pipes hung round their necks. Without the struggle between duty and sacrifice, would there be any virtue or heroism in the world? What is England itself with regard to the rest of Europe, but "the opposition," which always throws its weight into the scale on the side of the weak and oppressed, in order to preserve the equilibrium?

ENGLAND, THE REFUGE OF THE OPPRESSED.

In London, as well as in almost all the country towns, there is a society which has for its object to provide a lodging for the homeless. Where is the wonder, then, if England is herself the asylum of all the unfortunate? Venice, in her days of glory, was the sanctuary of all the oppressed, whether by kings, by princes, by republics, by popes, or by antipopes. England, which, in the importance of its commerce, and its dominion over the sea, is the Venice of our times, displays the same universal hospitality. Either from justice or from policy, or from a sentiment of generosity and a feeling of her power, she collects under her vast ægis all the conquered and the wrecked wherever they may be. There is scarcely a single nation in Europe which is not her debtor for protection afforded, at one time or another, to a number of its people. When commerce decayed in Italy, and the usurping princes persecuted the wealthy merchants, many of these sought refuge in England; and a street still remains called "Lombard street," because they took up their residence on that spot. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, (more fatal to France than the battle of Blenheim,) thousands of French Hugonots took refuge in England, and carried thither, that of silk stuffs. He who does not disdain to study the history of human vicissitude in the dwellings of filth and poverty, should go to Spitalfields, where he will still find many French names among the weavers, and a street still called after the fleur-de-lys (flowers but too thorny for these poor emigrants.) In the more recent political storms of France, England afforded shelter to almost all the French nobility and princes; and a few years after to the constitutionalists, the republican and the adherents of Napoleon, in their turn exposed to persecution. And let it be observed, that an asylum like this, which is granted not by favour or caprice, but by a perpetual law of free states, to all the oppressed, is another beneficent gift of liberty, which, as the common mother of mankind, wipes with an impartial hand, the tears from the eyes of all her children, and thus assuages the ferocity of man, which would become still more cruel by desperation. Among the Italian republics of the middle ages hospitality was so common a virtue as to draw from Machiavel the maxim, "Where banishments deprive the cities of men of wealth and industry, one state grows great by becoming the asylum of the banished."

In 1823, London was peopled with exiles of every kind, and every country: constitutionalists who would have but one chamber, constitutionalists who wished for two; constitutionalists after the French model, after the Spanish, the American; generals, dismissed presidents of republics, presidents of parliaments dissolved at the point of the bayonet, presidents of cortices dispersed by the bomb-shell; the widow of the negro king Christophe, with the two princesses, her daughters, of the true royal blood, "black and all black"; the dethroned emperor of Mexico; and whole swarms of journalists, poets and men of letters. London was the Elysium (a satirist would say, the Botany Bay) of illustrious men and would-be heroes.

What must have been the astonishment of one who had seen the parliament of Naples, and the two cortices of Madrid and Lisbon, to find himself at the Italian Opera in London, with General Pepe, General Mina, the orators Arguelles and Galiano, with the presidents Isturiz, Moura, &c., jostled and jostling in the crowd with the ambassadors of their adverse governments? It was, in truth, a sort of magic vision, worthy of the great necromancer Merlin himself. Often, in the course of that winter, did the London Opera house bring to my mind the enchanted palace in Ariosto, where so many paladins, friends and foes of each other, ran up and down the staircases, without being able either to get out or to fight.

At their first arrival, some of these wandering cavaliers attracted a good deal of attention from the English public. The people is every where the people; that is to say, boobies, ninies. The newspaper writers ran to their lodgings to get the flag end of their lives at least, with some anecdotes. The fashionable took a delight in exhibiting a new "lion," which is the name given in England to any person of celebrity who is invited to an evening party, to be shown as the wonder of the day to two or three hundred persons, squeezed together like anchievs in a barrel, so that one can neither speak nor move. This diversion is called a roulé; but some prefer to call them "living skeletons."

How soon did this curiosity pass away! The exiles, lions and all, were speedily buried in oblivion. There is no tomb so vast as London, which swallows up the most illustrious names for ever: it has an omnivorous maw. The celebrity of a man in London blazes and vanishes away like a firework: there is a great noise, numberless invitations, endless flattery and exaggeration, for a few days, and then an eternal silence. Paoli and Dumourier, after having at their first appearance made a crash like thunder, when they died excited no more attention than a falling leaf. General Mina, when he landed at Portsmouth, was carried to his hotel in triumph, and deafened with applause, for a month together, at the theatre in London. He was more famous than the Necman lion. What then? He fell very soon into oblivion, and the grave closed over his name. The English people are greedy of novelty; childish in this alone, it makes no great distinction between good and bad;—they want only what is new. They pay for the magic lantern, and pay well, but they always want fresh figures. To feed this insatiable whale, that always pants with open jaws,— toil incessantly journalists, engravers, historians, travellers, philosophers, lawyers, men of letters, poets,—ministers with schemes for new enactments, the king with schemes for new palaces and buildings, and the liberals with schemes for parliamentary reform. One honour that none can refuse to the constitutional exiles, was the poverty in which they were all plunged, not excepting those who had occupied posts of importance, and handled the public money; Sciorio Galiano, who had been minister of finance at Cordova, and the organ of the government in the Cortes for above a year, I often met in the streets on his return from a walk of four miles to give a lesson in Spanish; to preserve the independence of his spirit, he had the national pride to decline the pension offered by the English government. A friend of mine one day surprised poor Arguelles in his room in the act of mending his trousers,—that Arguelles who had been thrice a member of the cortes,—in 1812 and 1823, and had filled the high office of minister for foreign affairs; on whose "divine" lips it may be said that Spain depended, so great was his political wisdom, and the fluency of his eloquence. I had seen these two representatives of the Spanish nation, on their leaving the cortes of Madrid, the day they answered the threatening notes of the Holy Alliance, born in triumph to their carriages on the shoulders of a people, intoxicated with joy and admiration!

"And after meals is hungrier than before."

In the next spring the widow of General Riego died in London, consumed more by grief than by the English climate, which was nevertheless too severe for her weak state of health. All the emigrants were invited to her funeral, which took place at the catholic chapel in Moorfields, within the city of London. I fulfilled with a sentiment of pity this last sad office towards a family with which I had been connected in the bonds of friendship. I shall always remember with pleasure having been the bearer of some letters from Cadix, written to this virtuous lady by her husband, the hero and martyr of the Spanish revolution. Four ministers of the constitutional government held the pall; very few among the constitutional exiles had been able to provide themselves with mourning; and this in England, where the very poorest of the people are able to show this great mark of decency and respect. On this occasion, however, the poverty of the mourners, if its cause be taken into consideration, formed the most appropriate and affecting ornament of the ceremony.

To bring about a revolution requires such sacrifices, such acts of courage, such enthusiasm, that those who undertake it must be gifted with an imagination and with feelings far above the common level. Hence it is, that in those great events which present, as it were, a nation in convulsion, so many prominent and striking characters are produced. Without revolutions, the lineaments of the great families called nations, would be more uniform, and less expressive. The strongest marked physiognomies of these families appear in violent tempests. The revolution called the reformation, in Germany; that of the parliament in England, the last in France, &c., have formed entire galleries of characters perfectly new and original. I had an opportunity of verifying my observations among the brothers in exile with whom I was acquainted. In the composition of persons who have been engaged in a revolution may be discovered, in a greater or less degree, much imagination, a quick sensibility, a high ambition, vanity still higher than true ambition, and extreme inquietude and irritability. It is no wonder, therefore, that where such elements abound, we should find differences, quarrels, and disputes without end, excessive lamentations over disappointment, instances of heroism and extraordinary virtue, unheard-of crimes, and inexplicable changes from fidelity to the falsest treachery. I will here sketch some of the more remarkable characters, of whom I acquired a better knowledge, during their adversity in London, than I could have done when their passions were in full fervour.

Sciorio Franco of Valencia is a Spanish patriot who, to be useful to his country, and to acquire that influence over his fellow-citizens which neither birth nor riches nor extraordinary talents conferred upon him, devoted his life to virtue, and,

"Under the shield of conscious purity," carried about his poverty in triumph. Humble, indeed, though always decent in his dress; sober, although sometimes giving way to indulgence at the table of some opulent friend, or occasionally at another; as a judge bold, decided, and inexorable. Six years of exile consumed in attempts and stratagems to prepare that mine which was destined in 1820 to spring, and demolish the absolute government of Ferdinand the Seventh, were remunerated by the cortes with a pension which was his only patrimony. Of strict honour in all his dealings, of inviolable secrecy, scrupulous to an extreme of injuring the reputation of others,—his testimony was often admitted to be decisive even by his enemies. He was sometimes selected as the arbiter between two contending factions, and when the good of his country was concerned, would, like a second Friar Savonarola, fulminate his wrath even against his bosom friends. Full to the brim of love of country, he harangued at dinners, in the theatre, in the streets, and in the shops, at once inexhaustible and indefatigable; and, as his passion for liberty was the only spirit that could actuate him,—as he was always free from interested views, from every kind of ambition, his speeches sparkled in every part with original, picturesque, and fiery expressions. Knowing at the time of the war of independence the obstinacy of the prince, he had advised his countrymen to offer the throne to the duke of Wellington, adducing the example of Sweden, which at that very moment was placing the crown on the head of a marshal of France. To get rid, if possible, of Ferdinand, he went to Rome to offer, in the name of his fellow-citizens, the sceptre of Spain once more to Charles the Fourth upon certain conditions. By the force of this Cato-like spirit alone, he had attained to an importance among his countrymen to which many others, with more ambition, and superior means, had not been able to arrive. After the fall of the constitutional system in Spain, I saw him again in London, with the multitude of other emigrants, not in the slightest degree crest-fallen. Nothing in London took his attention; it seemed as if his mind still remained in Spain. He ran through the streets of London as though he were still in the Calle de la Montera at Madrid. Beggared, but not begging, except sometimes a trifle to pay for his bed and a porringer of milk,—almost his only nourishment,—forced to lie a-bed in winter because he could not afford to pay for firing, this virtuous tribune of the people did not yet believe his mission ended; he harangued when he could, and as much as he could. His eloquence was heightened by the events and misfortunes that had occurred. But when, from these sublime raptures he returned to himself, and, retiring from the theatre of the world, to which his fancy carried him, cast his eyes on his dress, on the cold and naked walls of his chamber;—when he was constrained to extend his hand for the wretched pension of the English government, that he might eat and live,—passionately then did he exclaim, "Thanks be to religion, that ordains every sacrifice, and rewards me for all. Without that, I should long ago have spurned virtue from me: see where this syren has for a second time conducted me,—the shipwrecked sailor of revolution, without friends, without assistance, without even fame!—in the midst of a foreign nation wallowing in wealth, and valuing only riches and prosperity. Without religion, I should have flattered a thousand times in the path of duty, for virtue alone was not a sufficient compass to direct my course of action in the midst of a sea of contamination!"

To feel the greater interest in this man, one should know that before the revolution he had been a friar. He left his cloistered prison because the gates were thrown open to him, but he preserved his fidelity to his vows, and to God. He lived amongst the disciples of Rousseau and Voltaire without restraint or mistrust, and, without reproving them, did not blush to avow to their faces the religious sentiments which he so deeply felt. He would have sounded the praises of religion before Diogenes, or Spinoza, or Diderot. I recollect another affecting reflection being made one day in the midst of the pressure of poverty. "It is noble," said he, "to suffer on a great theatre where the applauses of spectators, the trumpet of fame, encourage you to endurance. Every torture then brings with it its consolation and its reward; but the true, the most poignant, the purest sufferings, tempered by no relief, are not those of the hero, or the illustrious martyr, but of such obscure atoms as I, who suffer such heart-aches for liberty in obscurity, forgotten by all the world!"

Those who are accustomed to behold with admiration the stoic impassibility which will lead to death without even breathing a sigh, will perhaps think these lamentations not consistent with philosophical decorum. These on the other hand, who admire the heroes of Homer and the Greek tragedies, who now weep like children, now fight like Gods, will find these bursts of nature full of truth, and think him perhaps more interesting, who complains indeed amid the throes of grief, but still triumphantly pursues the path of duty.

The first time I saw at Madrid the silver-tongued Galiano, he was dressed in a green camel-cloak, a straw hat, a pair of dust coloured shoes, and I know not what else. He seemed as if he had copied the toilette of a parrot. I went to the hall of the cortes to hear him, and he appeared to me a second Cicero. He speaks extemporaneously with the same elegance and facility with which a member of the Spanish academy would write. I met him a second time, and examined him more narrowly. I found him a little, lean, short-sighted man, unsteady on his legs,—a very devil-on-two-sticks. I went that evening to hear him from the people's gallery, and he appeared to me a giant that with the thunder of his eloquence might have shaken Olympus. Two months afterwards I met him in London, uncorrupt, inaccessible to every kind of seduction, unchanged, and unchangeable; he seemed then a 'Cato.' This man is a species of Sphinx; he is a mixture of beauties and defects: vainglorious in the altar of his country; given to pleasure, yet of a candid mind, and free from offence. The English government granted a pension to all the members of the cortes; he was the first to refuse it. In the meanwhile, he honestly sold his pen to the literary journals. One of the great leaders of Spain was the first in London to bow to the yoke of fate, and became a teacher of languages rather than bow to the yoke of man. He is a boaster, but I never heard him boast of the sacrifices he had made to his country. To give oneself up to one's country, is in his eyes a bare duty, not a virtue. I never heard him either lament over, or sigh for, the comforts of this—

"—life more overcast than 'tis serene,
This mortal life, of direst envy full."

He seems invulnerable either by fortune or by man. Another exile with whom I was long acquainted, was the Count Santorri di Santa Rosa. His name had been connected with the Piedmontese revolution, but the nation which admired the few acts of his ministry, had not time to appreciate his virtues as a citizen, and his talents as a statesman. Whoever lived under the same roof with him, could not avoid being the better for it. The very judges who pronounced sentence of death upon him, would have revoked it, if they had known the purity of his heart. He was one of those men who are born to fascinate all around them, and to make followers. Eloquent, of a cultivated mind, brought up in a camp during the first years of his youth, under the eye of the colonel his father, but a lover of solitude, that he might give himself up to study and contemplation, he joined a military frankness to the holy enthusiasm of the hermit. A good companion, a warm friend, an excellent host, he created around him more genial merit, with no liquor but water, than others, assisted by all the inspiration of the bottle. Although he held no higher rank in the army than that of lieutenant-colonel, yet all eyes were fixed upon him as a man who would go to unheard of things. His mind was as pure as his life. He loved liberty, not only for its effects, but also as a sublime and poetical state of existence. At the same time, nevertheless, he loved monarchy; he wished, so to speak, to worship liberty in her temple, with a king for high priest. In Constantinople he would have adored liberty alone, as in Philadelphia he would have voted for a king; he loved a king, through his love of liberty, because he believed a king to be the guarantee of liberty with order. He was enamoured of the history of his country, and a warm admirer of the military monarchy of Piedmont, not that he would not have corrected its Gothic defects; but he admired it as one admires an old suit of polished steel armour, which is no longer useful, but still dazzling. He felt for the diminutive kingdom which he was born, the same affection which is shown by the citizens of small republics. Thus, although he could speak both French and Italian with singular elegance, he delighted to commune with his fellow countrymen entirely in the Piedmontese dialect; it was his Ranz des Vaches. It will, therefore, excite no surprise that he was inclined to an aristocratic constitution. When I saw him for the first time in Turin before the revolution, he was in favour of two chambers of representatives; I said to him, "Let us defer that question till after the triumph; in the mean time, rest assured of this, that, till the talisman of the Spanish constitution is displayed, the majority of the Italians will not stir." After a short pause, he replied in a resolute tone, "If it be so, let us defer this important question to a better opportunity, and grasp the Spanish constitution only as a lever to raise degraded Italy from the wretched slavery in which she is plunged." There are few examples of so mainly and generous a sacrifice of individual opinion to that of the many.

England was for him an inexhaustible field of observation; he studied her institutions as the ancients studied the laws of Crete, and they pleased him the more, that the aristocratic principle being predominant in them, their success in practice was a splendid confirmation of his political speculations. Nor would he perhaps have abandoned this land of liberty, nor that fire which is never quenched, had not hearts, formed to strive for fame, awakened him from his life of repose at Nottingham, to combat for the liberation of Greece. His intense love of liberty was inflamed by a tincture of religious enthusiasm; he went to Greece with the courage and the devotion of a true crusader. If he had been able to speak the language, he would have inoculated his followers with his enthusiasm; he had a cross always hung round his neck, and he astonished the pallieri with whom he went to Navarino, by flourishing his sabre with one hand, and displaying his cross in the other, while he translated for them the verse of Tasso—

"For country all is lawful, and for faith."

He died as he had lived, a brave man, with arms in his hands, face to face with the Egyptians, as they landed in the island of Sphacteria. He could not have had a more honourable death nor a more honourable grave. The slaughter of the Turks and the Egyptians, soon after at the battle of Navarino, the 20th of October 1827, was a hecatomb which expiated his death, and the conflagration of that barbarian fleet the noblest funeral pile that could be reared to his unburied bones!

ROADS.

The prosperity and civilisation of a country may be estimated in a hundred different ways. Some measure it by the population, some by the quantity of money in circulation; this by the state of its literature, and that by the state of its language. David Hume said, that where good broad-cloth is made, astronomy is sure to be known, and the sciences to be cultivated. Sterne, from the hyperbole of the barber who dressed his wig, and the finery of the Parisian gloves, deduced two qualities of the French nation, one amiable, and the other ridiculous. Pangloss, when he was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal, drew the inference, from the sight of men hanging in chains, that he was in a civilised country. Why may we not also draw an inference of the civilisation of a country from the condition of its roads? Where there are no roads, or but few, however magnificent, we may take it for granted that there are few or no books, few or no manufactures, many and unjust laws, few legislators or only one, a great many friars and very few learned men, many miracles and little money. Whoever has travelled in Europe, must have seen with his own eyes the truth of this doctrine. Russia, Poland, Turkey, Greece, Transylvania, Hungary, Croatia, Bukovina, Spain, and Portugal, which are certainly the least civilised portions, are also those which have the fewest roads. In the Peloponnesus, where, when poems, tragedies, and histories, were written, there were so many roads and cart tracks, there is now no longer a carriageable road; not in the whole kingdom of the king of men, Agamemnon!—

"Of countries vast the ruler sole-supreme,
The best of kings, in war supremely brave!"

who had Automedon for his charioteer, the best chieftain in all Greece. From Velez-Malaga to Grenada, in the once wealthy kingdoms of the Arabian dynasties, there is no other road than a precipitous mule track. From the city of Mexico to Guatemala, there is nothing that can be called a road. To get over the twelve hundred miles of intervening distance, the deputies from Guatemala, when that republic was united to Mexico, were obliged to undertake four months' disastrous travelling. From Omoo to Guatemala it is the same:—to traverse these three hundred and fifty miles, takes sometimes from six to seven months, in the case of the transportation of merchandise on the backs of mules. The other Spanish American colonies all alike had overgrown roads, and over-much wretchedness, ignorance, and superstition.

On the contrary, France, Germany, and Italy, have more roads and more civilisation, and England has more roads and canals, than all the rest of Europe put together,—and more civilisation. I remember seeing in M. Dupin's work on England, that the total length of its roads and canals, in proportion to its extent of surface, is very much greater than that of the roads and canals of France. Does not the comparative civilisation of the two countries stand perhaps in the same scale? Let the same comparison be made between the roads and canals of the north of Italy and those of the kingdom of Naples, and the same result will be obtained.

This is not a mere casual coincidence,—it is an un-failing effect of an infallible cause. From the want of easy communication, men remain disjoined and isolated; their minds grow cold, their spirit slumbers, they feel no emulation, they experience not the spur of the necessity for satisfying new desires, have little moral development, energy, or activity. This is the reason why the republican, or the citizen of a free state, is of a fervid, animated, and enterprising spirit, because he lives and moves in a multitude; while the subject of an absolute monarchy, where the population is usually scanty, and scattered over a large surface, becomes dull and drowsy, not more from the terror than the isolation in which he lives. When men are brought nearer to each other, by means of roads, canals, steam vessels, suspension bridges, rail ways, and (would fate consent) air balloons, they will waken up, their ideas, their desires will multiply, and their energy and intelligence in proportion. Why is a countryman necessarily less active and intelligent than a citizen? Why the inhabitant of a small town less so than the inhabitant of a great capital? Because the mixing and rubbing together of men is less. It would appear that the development of the human mind is in the combined proportion of the mass of men, and the velocity of their intercourse. I will quote, in illustration of this, two beautiful similes of Verri in his Meditations on Political Economy (now at length known and esteemed by the English).—"A blade of common grass moved down in the meadow is a piece of inert matter, while it remains isolated, or only collected in a small mass; but let a large heap of these blades of grass be piled up, and a fermentation will be observed to take place,—heat will be unfolded,—a motion propagated throughout the mass, which will at length take fire, and blaze up till it illumines the horizon."—"A bunch of grapes, by itself, or with only a few others, discharges itself of a mere dreggy matter; but when a large quantity is compressed, the mutual impinging of the infinite volatile particles agitates the whole mass, effervescence is everywhere produced, and a liquor distils from it which fills the atmosphere with fragrance, and the veins of him who drinks it with life and youth! Such is the picture of mankind." For the lovers of similes, I will add another. Men, those pebbles of Deucalion, are exactly like flints, which never throw out fire until they are struck together.

Straight roads and symmetrical cities, betray a despotic power, caring little or nothing for the rights of property. An unrelenting right line is like the sword of Alexander, with which cut the Gordian knot, when he found it impossible to untie it. Turin and Berlin, the two most regularly built cities in Europe, rose under the word of command from two military monarchs; and who does not discern in the interminable straight roads of France and Poland, the arbitrary hand which must have made them so? On the contrary, in England, that ancient land of liberty, the streets are crooked, full of ins and outs, and most of the cities are mere heaps of habitations, built without a plan, as necessity or caprice dictated, not composed of files of houses, drawn out in line with the regularity of so many battalions of soldiers. Yet the English love order, celerity, and economy; true,—but it appears that hitherto he has above all these ever respected the rights of property. So numerous are the windings of the public roads in England, as to render a deduction necessary to be made, in strict justice, in favour of France, from the proportions laid down by M. Dupin, to which I have before adverted.

The footpath that always runs along the sides of the streets in the towns, and many of the roads in the country as well, shows that the people are respected and respectable. There are canals for merchandise, the middle of the highway for those that ride, and the footpath for those who walk. The footway is the triumph of democracy. The lower class is not, as in other countries, quite disinherited; it has its own portion, small, indeed, but inviolable. On the continent, instead, the roads seem only made for the rich and for the horses.

Which is the best method of obtaining good roads, that is, not only highways, but also cross-roads, that, like the veins of the human body, run in every direction, and conjoin in one whole, the largest cities with the remotest villages? Is the system of tolls, or that of a public superintendence supported by the taxes, the better? Verri says, "Every payment imposed on the passage of roads, or the transport of goods, such as tolls, taxes on carts and carriages, has the effect of retarding the population, and rendering parts of it more isolated. Smith, on the other side, maintains the utility and the justice of turnpikes, observing that this tax, or toll, though it is advanced by the carrier, is finally paid by the consumer, to whom it must always be charged in the price of the goods. As the expense of carriage, however, is very much reduced by means of such public works, the goods, notwithstanding the toll, come cheaper to the consumer than they could otherwise have done; their price not much raised by the toll, as it is lowered by the cheapness of the carriage. The person who finally pays this tax, therefore, gains by the application more than he loses by the payment of it. His payment is exactly in proportion to his gain. It is, in reality, no more than a part of that gain which he is obliged to give up in order to get the rest. It seems impossible to imagine a more equitable method of raising a tax."

However discordant these two opinions may appear, they may both be correct in different cases. That of Verri is the just one in a country of little activity, and little commerce and resort. If the passage of carriages and merchandise be rare, how can the turnpikes pay the expenses of the construction and maintenance of the roads? Instead of this, they would lessen, or perhaps completely annihilate the little intercourse already in existence. England itself in those few districts where transit is rare, does not follow the general system of turnpikes, but sets in motion that of parochial rates.

The opinion of Smith also is just, in reference to a country like England, from a survey of whose condition he constructed most of his theories,—where the internal communication is so vast, that in a few years it refunds, by means of the tolls, all the expenses of making the roads, and keeping them in repair.

I am perfectly well aware that Lombardy has, since the reign of Joseph the Second, been in possession of a very provident code of laws for the formation of roads; the English laws, nevertheless, are perhaps no less excellent than our own in this particular, as may be gathered from M. Dupin's work, in which they are all given. As these do not come within my scope, this reference must suffice.—I resume my former subject.

I repeat that the whole of the English roads are not made and maintained by means of turnpikes. Those which serve only for communicating between village and village would not in some cases pay the gatekeeper for the trouble of taking the toll. These, therefore, are maintained as economically as possible. Those, however, running between cities of large trade, and much frequented by travellers, are kept up by means of farming out the tolls. The erection of turnpikes is optional on the part of the municipal authorities, but it is not to be wondered at that they all adopt them, because by their operation a share of the expense of the roads is thrown upon the goods and passengers that make use of them. The consent of parliament is indispensable before this tax can be imposed, and, when this consent is granted, it is always accompanied by the condition that it shall cease within a certain time after the proprietors have reimbursed their outlay, with interest. These tolls are consequently temporary, and liable to rise or fall as is found necessary.

Why, it may be asked, does not the government maintain the principal roads, and afterwards repay itself with the tolls? Because, by this method, it is to be feared that the tolls would become a perpetual tax, and, instead of being only a transitory imposition to pay a debt, it would become a source of peculation. Where a government has no other direct interest than those of justice and impartiality, it takes care to set impassable bounds to its concessions. It fixes unalterably the toll, and the time it is to be kept up. All the great roads, bridges, and canals in England, were made and paid for by means of tolls. The government has done, as it were, nothing; but it has done the best it could do—it has "let things alone." All the canals, which in England are innumerable, were constructed by companies, of which there have been more than fifteen within the last sixty years. These have dug and opened canals in every direction, on the faith of the toll they were to be allowed to take. The shareholders have gained almost double the usual rate of interest; commerce an increased facility, and a great saving of time; the public a great convenience; and the whole country incalculable wealth. It cannot be pretended, however, that the turnpike system is altogether free from drawbacks. The greatest is the number of unproducing persons obliged to be employed in taking the tolls, and the inconvenience to which the passengers are put, in having to stop and pay at every turn (the stagecoaches, however, and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, pay weekly, on Saturday); there are also frequent embezzlements by the receivers, and sometimes immoderate profits are made by the farmers of the toll, or the trustees of the road: but the advantages to be placed in the opposite scale overbalance the others most decidedly.

In the first place, the expenses of the road are exactly distributed among those who make use of it, according to the extent of their traffic. The mountaineers of Wales, for example, who hardly ever leave their native province, do not contribute a farthing towards paying for the beautiful road from London to Liverpool, which they neither use nor wear out. This way is also steady, and independent of state favouritism or state events: if the expense be made to fall on the government, it may, perhaps, alter its policy, may be more partial to one province than another; now it may be too active, now too indolent; at one time too profuse, at another too sparing; or, which happens oftener of all, it may injure by caprice, or devote to other purposes, the funds intended for this department. Even the best constituted governments may be forced, by an unforeseen war, or a thousand other accidents, to employ the money otherwise than it ought to be. Charles III. of Spain made some magnificent roads,—his successors neglected them. When the roads are under the charge of the government, they get better and worse several times in a century; when they are under the control of those who make use of them, there is no reason why they should be allowed to fall into decay.

When a government undertakes these matters, utility is too often sacrificed to display. What is the use of those ample roads in France, which, as M. Say wittily observes, "are twice as wide as they ought to be, and lead to a capital whose streets are not half so wide as they ought to be?" Charles III., with the money he spent on the great road from Irún to Madrid, and from Madrid to Seville, might, if he had spared something of their Castilian pomp, have opened a carriageable road to Corunna, which is still wanting, and levelled the precipitous road that leads to Portugal.

When the roads are made by the public, there is no tinsel, no flattery about the thing. Every one pays, every one is interested, every one points out what is wrong, every one is on the watch. When they are made by the government, they are baptized with the name of some prince, and what is, in reality, contributed by the nation, is spoken of as the free gift of "the powers that be." Many may complain, but few are heard, and rarely, indeed, is the matter looked to.

The aid of government is necessary until the traffic on the roads is risen to a moderate height. Up to that moment, I agree with Verri, it can and ought to make the roads; but as soon as things are in a proper train, and the traffic is sufficient to repay the expenses within a certain time, I agree with Smith, that the system of tolls is preferable.

When they are once established, the benefits arising from roads will soon become immense. Scarcely have they become smooth and commodious before carts and coaches change their forms, and take others more airy and elegant; lighter and more handsome horses are used, because the roads do not fatigue them so much. More commodious inns are set up, and furnished constantly with fresh provisions, because intercourse is more frequent, and consumption quicker; better sheltered stabling will be necessary, more skilful and attentive groomings. An English stagecoach, which carries eighteen passengers, skins along, drawn by four excellent horses, with a coachman dressed like a gentleman. It makes the spectator tremble and wonder at the same time, when he sees such a mountain of "men and things" rush by, on a very ticklish balance. If the roads were bad, instead of good, all must change; the scene I have just described would disappear, because, on a bad road, a carriage so loaded would break down or upset, before it could stir a step; the friction would be much greater; it would be necessary to have more and heavier horses. All these ameliorations are a chain which depends on a single link, and that link is—the road. All who travel in Spain fly into a passion at first, and afterwards cannot help laughing, at being jolted about in a vehicle with beams of timber for shafts, axle-tree, and springs; and is drawn by six mules, after the fashion of a twenty-four pounder. The fashion of these carriages, which are built like ships, must not be attributed to the bad taste of the Spaniards, but to the steepness of the roads in Arragon, Estremadura, and Galicia. When the roads have become smooth and solid, and the other successive improvements are brought to bear, the intercourse between province and province, between relations and friends, becomes more frequent; marriages, adventures, incidents, every thing multiplies, and a new world is created. In England, they go three hundred miles to hunt; owing to the conveniences, friends pay each other visits, although at the distance of one or two hundred miles; old men and young ladies, sucking babes* with their mothers, all travel without annoyance, inconvenience, or impediment. At every inn on the road, breakfast, dinner, or supper, is always ready, a fire is burning in every room, and water always boiling for tea or coffee. Soft feather beds, with a fire blazing up the chimney, invite to repose; and the tables are covered with newspapers, for the amusement of the passengers. The English inns would be real enchanted palaces, did not, at last, the bill of mine host appear, to dispel the illusion. Throughout the island, king, ministers, and members of parliament, are all in perpetual motion, on horseback, in gige, or in carriages; on their way to dinners or horse-races, assemblies, concerts, or balls. At the balls given three or four times in the year in each county ("the county balls,") families who live twenty, thirty, or forty miles off, make their appearance merely to pass away three or four hours. By means of these vehicles, this constant coming and going, comfort wealth, and new inventions, are diffused equally over the whole surface of the country. It is not fluids alone which have a tendency to come to a level: let the dikes of the inquisition, the police, the spies, the custom houses, be thrown down; let human knowledge spread itself, and flow without obstruction, and it will soon be seen that philosophy, literature, constitutional liberty, will also tend to a level over the whole surface of Europe.

In the midst of this concourse of travellers, thieves disappear, every body knows that, only sixty years ago, it was not uncommon, on a journey, to make up a purse for the highwayman, so much were the roads then infested with them. At the present day, the instances of such an occurrence are most rare: a highwayman must make as much haste about robbing a coach, as a pick-pocket in stealing a watch. At every hour of the night, stagecoaches full of travellers arrive and depart, with horns blowing to announce their approach; with lamps (sometimes of gas) that throw a light a hundred feet around, dashing along at a regular breakneck pace. It is impossible to calculate how much time England has saved, and how much it has shortened its distances, by means of improved roads, in the last forty years. To go from York to London, that is, two hundred miles, used to take six days: by the mail it now takes twenty hours, by the other coaches twenty-four. From Exeter, fifty years ago, they promised "a safe and expeditious journey to London in a fortnight." Private carriages now accomplish the hundred and seventy-five miles between that city and the capital in eighteen hours. Before the invention of steam vessels indeed, the post from London to Dublin took at least six days:—in a stormy winter, in one instance, no less than forty-two. Now, whatever the weather, it takes no more than three. A sailing vessel lately arrived at Liverpool in sixteen days from the United States, and brought some venison fresh from the other world! When steam vessels cross the Atlantic, which they will do at no great distance of time, American game will be a dainty any thing but rare.

All this quickness of communication would increase still faster, if England would adopt, in her roads, the despot straight line, which perforates, like a cannon-ball, houses, parks, gardens, and pleasure-grounds. A mathematician might find diversion in reducing the superficies of England to the proportion which the present velocity of travelling makes it bear to that of forty years since. The result would probably show, that England is reduced to a tenth of its size at that period. Exeter was once (in relation to time) sixteen times more distant from London than now. One thing compensates for another. The discovery of New Holland and the interior of Africa makes the world grow larger and larger to the eye, in the same way that the velocity of communication, by drawing its parts nearer together, reduces its dimensions, and makes it grow little once more. I cannot help laughing at the efforts of despotism to arrest the progress of liberty, while liberty passes on, by the help of civilisation, in a thousand ways. The despot put me in mind of the stupid peasant of Metastasio, who runs with eagerness to stop the torrent:—

"In vain he wastes upon the sands
His labour and his care,
For if in one place he withstands
The torrent's force; lo here! lo there!
Lo! in a hundred streams it breaks its way!"

and imprisoned, civilisation comes in along with commerce: it is, to obviate this, they adopt the prohibitive system, roads, roads alone are sufficient to bring the minds of men into contact and fermentation. There is no despotism so consistent in its means and ends, or, if I may be allowed the expression, so enlightened, as that of the Turkish government, which permits neither printing nor universities, commerce nor roads; yet even the coffee-houses of Constantinople were by themselves sufficient to create an opposition to the Grand Seigneur, notwithstanding he is own brother to the sun and moon!

TIME.

Idleness is the luxury of the Spaniards, and a great luxury it is, for it is all waste. It is a universal luxury, which is enjoyed by all, from the highest grandee to the most miserable water carrier. The luxury, however, consists in the spending of an article of little or no value in Spain. The Castilian, who keeps so religiously to his word when his honour is in question, is never punctual to an appointment; because an hour more or less, in the life of a Spaniard, is only an hour less or more in eternity. If you propose to a Spaniard to set his hand to a thing at once, he answers you, however he may be interested in it, "To-morrow." Fatal to-morrow, which is repeated so often from day to day, till your patience is worn out! Fatal to-morrow, that has reduced the kingdom, once seated on a throne of gold, and crowned with precious stones, to rags and a dung-hill! The very mantle in which the Spaniards wrap themselves up, and which impedes every motion but that of sleeping, displays their indolence, and the little value they set on time, as the laziness of the Turks is shown by their wide trousers and loose slippers. When the Spaniards are better taught, more industrious, and less prejudiced, they will wear the mantle no longer. Superstition is usually the companion of sloth. An active people cannot afford to pray away whole days at church, or throw them away on processions and pilgrimages. An industrious people prefer growing their "daily bread" with their own hands, to asking it thirty or forty times a day as alms from heaven. When I was first in Spain I was surprised to see, that none of the lower classes, and but few of the more respectable, had watches; yet it is natural that it should be so. What has he who has no occasion for the division of time, to do with the measure of it? Their noon is the same as that of the horses and dogs, the emptiness of their bellies; the sicsta is, perhaps, the business of the greatest importance they have to do during the whole day. It is esteemed such an indispensable necessary of life, that a poet, I think the tender Garcilaso de la Vega, singing the delights of the Aranjuez, tells us that the nymphs of the Tagus, at a certain hour of the day, give themselves up to the sicsta.

The journey from Madrid to Seville, which is not accomplished by a galley in less than sixteen days, would be got over in England in two. But what of that? In these sixteen days the Spaniard would not have produced a skein of thread. For this reason, in Spain, and in all countries where indolence is in vogue, there are no machines for the abridgment of labour. Four years ago, the coaches of the King of Spain were in the same state as when coaches were first invented. In some provinces the carts have wheels which do not turn on their axles, but with them, making all the while an infernal creaking. The Spanish people, formerly so great, and who might yet be so, are rendered by despotism like the inhabitants of the Castle of Indolence, described in Thomson's poem, who, deceived by the perfidy of a tyrannical magician, slumbered on in the delusion that they were living in a terrestrial paradise, while they were in reality surrounded on all sides by desert wastes, and fétid marshes, and eaten up with wretchedness and misery.

On the contrary, in England, time is a revenue, a treasure, an estimable commodity. The Englishman is not covetous of money, but he is supremely covetous of time. It is wonderful how exactly the English keep to their appointments. They take out their watch, regulate it by that of their friend, and are punctual at the place and hour. English pronunciation itself seems invented to save time; they cut the letters and whistle the words. Thus Voltaire had some reason to say, "The English gain two hours a day more than we do, by eating their syllables." The English use few compliments, because they are a loss of time, their salute is a nod, or at the utmost a corrosion of the four monosyllables "How d'ye do?" The ends of their letters always show more simplicity than ceremony: the have not "the honour to repeat the protestations of their distinguished regard and profound consideration" to his "most illustrious lordship," whose "most humble, most devoted, and most obsequious servant" they "have the honour to be." Their very language seems to be in a hurry; since it is in a great part composed of monosyllables, and two of them, again, are often run into one; the great quantity of monosyllables looks like an abridged way of writing, a kind of shorthand. The English talk little, I suppose, that they may not lose time: it is natural, therefore, that a nation which sets the highest value upon time, should make the best chronometers, and that all, even among the poorer classes, should be provided with watches. The mail coach guards have chronometers worth eighty pounds sterling, because they must take care never to arrive five minutes past the hour appointed. At the place of their destination, relations, friends, and servants, are already collected to receive passengers and parcels. When a machine is so complicated as England is, it is essential for every thing to be exact, or the confusion would be ruinous.

In England there is no bargaining. The price of every article is fixed. This custom is not the product solely of competition and confidence, but also of the necessity of saving time. Thus a child may go to buy without being cheated! how otherwise could the shopkeepers manage on market-days, when, from noonday till nine or ten at night, their shops are crowded with customers?

The greatest traffic in England, that is, that of the public funds at the Stock Exchange, is founded altogether on good faith. A broker effects sales of thousands and tens of thousands by means of a few figures in a little book he carries in his pocket. Without this laconism, or saving of time, how could it be possible to effect in a few hours so many transfers of the funds, and so many insurances? Insurances to the amount of ten million pounds sterling may be procured at Lloyd's coffee-house, in a single quarter of an hour.

Why does no one travel on foot in England? Why do the meaneast workmen travel with four horses, in the style of the proudest nobility on the continent? Because the infinite number of machines, which, in manufactures, multiply a hundred fold the work of man, may be estimated according to the saving of time they occasion.

When it is said that the cotton spinning machine does the work of two hundred spinners, it is the same as saying, that it does, in one day, the work of a spinner for two hundred. These machines have been imitated, or have been made known by means of drawings, on the continent; but how many others remain unknown, which, in the farms, in the seaports, in the warehouses, and in the shops, are employed by the English to save time and trouble!

The Englishman does not expect to make his fortune either by the lottery or by miracle. Luther has deprived him of the latter resource, and the government of the former, having recently suppressed it. Hence he places his hopes and confidence in nothing but time; his wish is not that of Midas, to become possessed of mountains of gold at a stroke, but for an opportunity to work, and make money. Double an Englishman's time, and you double his riches.

In conclusion, with respect to industry and labour, it is no flattery to say, that the Englishman is better than the Spaniard, since he is a man in the image of God, who is always doing. So thought Thomson, when he put into the mouth of Idleness this apostrophe to her followers—

"Ye helpless race,
Dire labouring here to smother reason's ray,
That lights our Maker's image in our face,
And gives us o'er our earth unquestion'd sway;
What is the adored Supreme Perfection, say?
What but eternal never resting soul,
Almighty power and all directing day,
By whom each atom stirs—the planets roll—
Who fills, surrounds, informs, and agitates the whole!"

ENGLISH MARKETS.

"Fairs and markets belong to a state as yet little advanced in public prosperity, in the same manner that commerce by caravans belongs to a little advanced stage of commercial relations; yet even this imperfect kind of relation is better than none at all." I do not know how M. Say, an author generally so judicious, came to forget, when he wrote this passage, that England, without question and in every respect the richest and most populous of states, has more fairs and markets than any other. It proves that political economy is not a cosmopolitical science, but something like that of medicine, in which the aphorisms that will apply to all cases are but few,

There is no town in England which has not one or two markets every week, and two or three fairs for horses, cattle, cloth, cheese, &c. in the course of the year: the city of York alone has no less than fifteen horse and cattle fairs every year. Every English almanack contains the names of above three hundred market towns, as these are called. To these markets resort not only the peasantry, but all the farmers, great and small, of the country side, for at least ten miles round. It forms an interesting and animated scene: from earliest dawn to mid-day the roads leading to the town are covered with droves of cattle, flocks of sheep, foot passengers, tilted carts, and countless numbers of mounted rustics. The country folks use little covered carts, in which all the family, dressed in their best, sit at their ease. The dog, the most constant friend of man, follows the caravan, and takes charge of it, when the family leave it to do what they are come about. Most of these carts have no springs, because, if they had, they would have to pay the tax to which spring-carts are liable, according to the spirit of the English laws, which imposes taxes on an ascending scale, from comfort to luxury, and from luxury to superfluity. The head of the family, however, if he is a farmer, goes to market on horseback. It is pleasant to see these English farmers, mounted on fine strong horses, in little troops of five or six, well clothed and fed, taking their way to the town at a brisk trot or full gallop, and in the evening, returning to the village, still rosier and jollier than in the morning. Their wives and daughters are often to be seen on horseback, riding with such elegance that they could not be distinguished from ladies, if they were not betrayed by their round anti-sentimental full moon faces. The farmers are in almost every country the finest race of men, and in England this appears most strongly, from the contrast between them and the numbers of the population whose look is spoiled by the manufactures. There are as many races of men as there are different professions: what a difference between a sedentary watchmaker, in a heated atmosphere, peering through a microscope at a hair's breadth of gold, and a farmer of England (or Lodi), with plenty to eat and drink, and continually in exercise in the wholesome open air!

In Yorkshire, which produces the finest horses in England, I have often seen farmers mounted on animals that on the continent would be worth a hundred guineas. In some countries (and the custom used to be more general) the farmers carry their choice better halves seated behind them on the crupper: the Englishman puts the lady in the place of his portmanteau, while the Spaniard, more respectful, as well as more gallant, when he rides double, places the lady before him, supports her with the left arm, and in the attitude of a Roman at the rape of the Sabinas, admires and talks to his Dulcinea. Enquiring within myself what could be the advantages of this general use of markets in England, it occurred to me that they might be as follows: in the first place, the English towns are open, and at none of them is there a tollage or impost to be paid at the gates (if there were any). Hence it arises that there are no stoppages, no petty peculations, no loss of time, no vexation. The Englishman would rather let his goods rot to pieces, than submit to be searched and pulled about every moment by a set of wretched hirelings, placed at every gate of the town, as inspectors of his breeches' pocket. The maxims of commerce are diffused through all classes in England; even the farmers know that free competition is advantageous to both buyer and seller. Instead, therefore, of waiting patiently in their village for the coming of the butcher or the recattone, to buy their chickens, their potatoes, their cows, and their cattle, or that of the pedlar to sell them the little articles necessary for their wardrobe, they prefer to go themselves to market, and thus escape the monopolists to whose grasp they would, in other countries, be subject.

This custom arises also partly from another cause: cultivation being confined almost entirely to the meadow and the corn field, turnips and potatoes, leaves the farmer plenty of time to go to market. In France and Italy the cultivation of the vine, to say nothing of the rearing of grain, grass, mulberry and other fruit trees, and Indian corn, takes him at liberty only a few days in the winter. This custom depends also in some degree on the use, which is made of horses in most countries, instead of oxen. In Nottinghamshire, oxen are so rarely employed, that, when yoked, they become an object of curiosity. Lord Middleton keeps three pair of oxen for the labours of his park.

"Wide-fronted and arch-bonned," and beautiful as Homer's oxen of the sun, the inhabitants of Nottingham go to see them, by way of amusement, when they are ploughing, yoked in an elegant harness.

The use of horses permits the farmer to go a good distance to market without wasting much time. It should be added, that the breeding of horses is a branch of rural industry all over the country.

Beccaria, in his "Lessons on Political Economy," demonstrated, by comparing the strength and longevity of horses with those of oxen, that in many provinces it would be an improvement to substitute horses for oxen in rural labour. This calculation is corroborated by some other considerations: time would be saved, horses doing every thing quicker than oxen; there would be more activity and traffic, because, by the aid of horses, intercourse is accelerated; the breed of both horses and oxen would improve, the first from the greater number that would be required, and their importance to the farmer; the second, because they would scarcely ever be bred for any thing but consumption, as in England, where the beef is superior to any other in the world; there would be better cavalry for the army; men and horses, fit for the purposes of war, would easily be found. In the last struggle with France, England had a splendid mounted national guard of forty thousand strong. The young men of the Lodigians and Lunellina were the finest cavalry soldiers of the ex-kingdom of Italy.

This is not altogether a vision of my own; Berra, a well informed and diligent observer, having, in his travels, studied the advantages of the English artificial meadows, and explained and recommended the cultivation of them to his countrymen, in an excellently written little work. Does not his advice, which tends to the substitution of a more useful and constant crop for that of grain, which is always uncertain, and in Lombardy has been declining, year by year, from 1818 downwards, coincide with these thoughts of mine? England, sixty years ago, was in the same condition as Lombardy at present: it produced more grain than was necessary. Finding no longer a convenient vent for the surplus, the landholders diminished the culture of grain, and took more to increasing the pasture, and the rearing of horses and cattle; and they find this more profitable than if they had kept the whole of the land arable. If the advocate Berra would imitate the perseverance of the senator Dandolo, and join practice to precept, he would confer a distinguished service on his country; by getting a greater produce from the land, by liberating the country from the obligation of importing horses from abroad, as it is now forced to do, not only for the luxury of the great, but for the necessities of agriculture. In Lombardy itself, as appears from Verri's book on corn, 218,920 perches of arable were converted into meadow, in the country around Pavia and Lodi, from 1753 to 1768; at which, if I recollect right, Verri, zealous for the cultivation of grain, expresses his regret, without reason, in my opinion, for surely agricultural, as well as manufacturing, industry ought to follow and to second the vicissitudes of commerce and consumption. If Lombardy can no longer find an advantageous vent for its corn, why not plant vines (where they will thrive), why not make artificial meadows, since there is invariably an annual balance of trade against it in wines and foreign cattle?

England has, in all undertakings relating to mining, manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, a considerable advantage over the other countries of Europe, in the pecuniary assistance of the country banks. These, either on mortgage, or simply on personal security, advance capital for every sort of enterprise, in notes which circulate throughout their own country. There is hardly a farmer in England who takes an estate on lease, who does not assure himself beforehand, that, in case of decay in his own funds, a neighbouring banker will assist him with a loan, to be repaid when the fruits of his improvements are gathered. One of these banks alone had at one time one million pounds sterling lent to the farmers and tradesmen of a single county. It must not be thought, however, that England is El Dorado; all these portentous sums are à paper.

An English market or fair would not be a good subject for the picture of the Flemish school, like most of the country markets in Italy. In vain would a painter seek for the capricious dresses of the Alpine women, who descend to the market of Varallo, those little hats, carelessly thrown on; those ear rings, those coral necklaces, and bright gold buttons; in vain would he look for the women of Fobello, their wild goats in their arms, with short petticoats, and dresses of the most sympathetic colours in the world, white, red, and blue; in vain would he wish to delineate the bacchanals of the fair of Imbervera, the jumping, both-(and-gum)-drawing games, the groups of specifying country toppers about a barrel set abreast, the singing, the quarrelling, the dancing of the villagers to the sound of the pipes. In vain would the poet, like a Lorenzo di Medici, seek for a Alcinea da Barberino:—

"And two such eyes she has—'tis quite a feast,
When she uplifts them and toward you glances,
And in the midst, just to a lair between
